I said that the danger arising from the present system was two-fold; that it includes the danger of losing the land to the settlers, there was another; that of losing it to the new states. This danger grows out of the contest which now agitates us between the new and the old states. It is a danger which itself grows out of the nature of things. The man who lives on the land sees it daily, and feels an interest in it which those at a distance never can feel, and hence the policy which may to others appear greedy and grasping in the farmer, may be truly probably wise, and calculated to avert still greater evils. But the old states very naturally consider all who desire what they consider as their undoubted right, as prodigal and unprincipled. Hence arises a contest between the two sides; and extreme measures will ultimately be resorted to. The new states will seize upon the lands. They can do this if they wish to do it; for the next census will show that they will then possess a majority of the population of this nation, and will of course have command of the government, especially in the other branch of congress. Ought we not to foresee such a posture of things and provide for it in time? If no remedy can be provided, the danger of losing the land to the new states is great as if we were to lose it under the existing system. I would throw round the cession all the guards which can be given in the forms of the constitution, and would throw it under the jurisdiction of our courts of justice, and would have the courts be inclined to enforce the contract the courts may correct them.

The only remaining point to be considered is, whether the proposed measure will not be attended with too great a sacrifice of the public domain, and will now proceed to prove that, so far from sacrificing the pecuniary interests of the government, it will go to increase the means of the treasury. We are in the habit of regarding the future value of the public domain the same as it is now, overlooking the fact that time exerts the same influence on value as distance exerts on apparent magnitude. We overlook this. But if we would rightly view the matter, we must bring the public lands to their present value in land.

Mr. CALHOUN here entered into a train of reasoning to show that, as it would be only at a remote time that the government price would be obtained for all the lands lying in the new states, (resuming them at 160 million dollars, and that the value of each acre can only be estimated at what amount they would command in reference to the distance of time at which they would be available. By this process of reasoning, Mr. C. arrived at the conclusion that, after deducting the expenses of survey and estimating the sales at two and a half millions of dollars a year, at which rate it would take eighty years to dispose of them, they might be worth a sum to hand of twenty-six or twenty-seven millions of dollars, and that the government, who had such a sum of money at his disposal, and wished to purchase the whole, could afford to give more for them, it as much.

Mr. C. went on to apply the same process of reasoning to the proposed graduation system. Suppose, with the committee of last session, that the lands would be exhausted in 35 years, and that equal sums will be received in equal times, (which is far from being correct), what will the government get? Allowing an average of 100 million dollars as the amount of sales, the 160 millions of acres will bring 165 millions of dollars. Divided by the 35 years, and the proceeds will be found to be 4.7 millions of dollars annually, which is equal to a value in hand of twenty-six or twenty-seven millions, instead of twenty-six or seven millions, as before shown: so that, by adopting the graduation principle in place of the present system, the government, instead of losing, will be an actual gainer. (Mr. C. pursued these statistical statements and calculations still further, with a rapidity of utterance which rendered it impossible for the reporter to follow him.)

I have now met the two only possible objections to the measure of cession. I have demonstrated that it will make our tenure of the public domain more secure, and that it will be a better for the government in a pecuniary point of view; and is not this all I am bound to do in order to show that it ought to be adopted?

I will not present a single view more of the subject, but I address a few remarks to the friends of the new states. I cannot doubt that they feel this measure to be more favorable to them than the present bill; but they feel apprehensive that it may not pass, and hence some may vote against it. I think the ground of their action is erroneous. It is not probable that any measure in relation to the subject will pass at the present session of congress. It is known to every one that the plan of graduation has always had to encounter great difficulties; the measure has been twice voted on before congress, and to this day no bill has ever been passed. Can gentlemen expect better success now? I apprehend not. We can only hope, at this time, that the measure will be rejected. This rejection will be the whole. If I thank gentlemen of the new states whether they have the slightest hope the measure will pass under the new administration, which is just coming into power? I know not, and they need not to graduate under the present. I am aware of it; but so far as the mind of the new administration may be known, I feel assured that if graduation and pre-emption be pressed alone, it will be the certain means of inducing gentlemen on the other side to push the antagonistic principle of distribution.

If the senators from the new states shall, from feelings of liberality or political party spirit, support the plan of graduation and pre-emption, it will present a contrary feeling in the Atlantic states, and they will immediately press the plan of distribution; there will be a sort of see-saw; as one side pushes the one measure, the other will insist the more strenuously upon the other, and in such a manner, the time will pass away. It will be difficult for a man to sustain himself in voting upon local questions, unless he can elevate his mind into a higher region, and take enlarged views of the general principles of national policy. But should the friends of graduation and pre-emption men will confine themselves to a narrow view of local interests, then a measure of the most dangerous character and tendencies will be in a fair way to succeed.

On the distribution scheme I shall not now enter; I presented my views of it fully at the last session. The measure is either idle, or unjust, or foolish. The distribution of five millions of dollars will produce a deficit of five millions, which must be met by taxation to bring it back into the treasury. If, then, the government gives out just what it gets back again, this measure is idle. If the government gets less, it is unjust; if it gets more, it is foolish. It can have but one effect, viz. to enable the friends of the cession to get the measure through congress, and collect that successively which they are afraid to take collectively and by a single act.

I have now concluded what I had to say on the amendment I have proposed, save in regard to a few of the objections which have been made over the way. (Mr. LINN, who has suggested a most honorable and high-minded application of the proceeds of the public domain, namely, that it shall be set apart as a fund for the support and increase of the public schools, and that the government be rejoiced to hear him bring forward a proposal of this character. It shows in the mind of that gentleman a high and just feeling of regard for the value of that fund of national strength; let regard our gallant navy as a branch of the public service in respect to which it is difficult to say which portion of the republic has the deeper interest in its existence and prosperity. To the north it is every thing—it is indispensable to the protection of the coast, and to the south, it is the only barrier against the spread of certain fatal principles, it has become more important. To the west it is not incalculable value as a means of protecting the great outlet for their products, and of keeping open a passage to the Gulf. On the ocean our commerce is in jeopardy, it is in a process of diminution. A power is about there greater than our own—a power whose character has become essentially military, is daily increasing, and in reference to which we are constantly multiplying points of contest. Nothing can protect us from the dangers to which we may be ultimately exposed, but an early attention to this branch of the national defence, and I thank the senator from Missouri for bringing forward the measure he has proposed. I hope he will follow it out, and I accept with the greatest pleasure the amendment he has offered as a modification of my own.

Mr. C. now moved his amendment, and demanded the yeas and nays on the question of its adoption. Mr. CALHOUN also demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment he had proposed.

The question being about to be put first on Mr. CALHOUN'S substitute—

Mr. CALHOUN said that, before the question was put, he hoped the senator from Missouri would declare whether he was willing to modify his amendment by uniting it with that which had been offered by himself.

But this, after some conversation was objected to, and the question was about to be put, when

Mr. CALHOUN rose and observed that he had hardly ever felt more surprised than in listening to the amendment proposed by the senator from South Carolina. In offering the amendment which he himself had proposed, he had not intended that the purpose had been merely to put on record the views he entertained, and what he was willing to do on this subject of pre-emption. He had been desirous that his views should not be misunderstood or perverted, and he had drawn up his amendment in the language of showing that he was willing to go for pre-emption if it was combined with a just distribution among the states of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. For these two measures of distribution and pre-emption, he had been desirous of putting this on record, and that was his whole purpose in offering his amendment. For the audacity of making such a proposal, said Mr. C.—no, not I—but my proposition itself has been denounced in the vain empty epithets which the eloquence of the honorable senator could supply. It has been pronounced to be "idle, unjust or foolish."

This was the sententious condemnation passed upon it by the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN) and the senator from Missouri, (Mr. BAXTER) had directed against it a storm of epithets yet more puerile. According to the thunder of that gentleman's eloquence, the proposition was "enormous," "monstrous." So monstrous, that it was not to be considered, and all attempts at defending it, and the honorable senator did not wonder! Now these argumentative epithets of the senator will, I rather imagine, make no very great impression on the understanding of his constituents. Does the senator think it is right to epithetize those gentlemen, high as they may believe themselves to stand, can put down measures in this body. Great as may be their power of animadversion, it is not on that power that the fate of this measure is to depend. The gentlemen may suppose I shrink from the very thought of defending my amendment, because I do not choose to occupy an hour or two in debate—on what? On a measure now before the senate! Not at all! The bill before us is to grant a prospective pre-emption on the public lands. Did the honorable senator expect I was about to take up the time of this body in unfolding the advantages and disadvantages of a measure of this kind? To him, at least, all such questions are of no importance, and I am sure it is unprofitable. Pre-emption and graduation have been abundantly argued, both now and heretofore; there remains but one more proposition to be considered, which is distribution. Is that to be decided by the yeas and nays? I do not think it is right to carry to debate that question with the vain hope of carrying it now? Surely not yet, because I have obtained from him, I am accused of shrinking from the defence of my amendment. I thought I would have said, I am not prepared to undertake it if I should attempt such a thing. And though, from the manner of the honorable senator from Missouri, my frankness must have surprised the senate, he has multiplied a repetition of his thanks for my proposal of a measure perfectly stale from repetition. The propositions have been repeated for years. What is there about them that is so "monstrous"? Is it pre-emption? Is that so atrocious? Is it distribution? Is that "idle, unjust or foolish"? If it be, let the honorable senator denounce it on himself. Pre-emption law we have passed again and again, and a bill for distribution passed both the senate and house of representatives by triumphant majorities, and would have been the law of the land, if it had not been for the extraordinary and unparalleled instance of executive interposition. Was this the measure that was so "monstrous," "so enormous," "so outrageous," as to deter any gentleman from even an attempt at its defence?

But the honorable gentleman from Missouri seems to consider this proposition so monstrous and so outrageous, as a measure of outraging, that I will now say a word or two on that point. It is, on my part, no cunning proposal. I have very little of that quality in my composition; it is a thing I know not to say to public houses, to wit, to the people, and I think I leave to older and more practised politicians than myself. It was not my purpose or design to do any thing cunning when I offered the amendment to the present bill; and I do not intend to put my exact position on record, that all might see it. I do not see any thing very "cunning" in this. I knew, before I had said a word, that all who will not yield their unquestioning assent to depositions on the public lands calculate on being denounced here as enemies of those hardy and adventurous men who are our precursors in subduing the wilderness. I never was their enemy. I am the son of a pre-emptor, and was myself born on pre-emption; and if I have been restrained from going the full length with gentlemen on this subject, it is from no enmity towards the pre-emptors, but from a sense of duty to the union, as one of the trustees to whom has been confided the management of their common property. I do not mean to find that there is now a way in which I may at once gratify my sympathies with the industrious and hardy settler, and at the same time do my public duty to all the states; that I can make a compromise between the rights of the settler and the rights of the union. I am now ready to concede to the pre-emption right of three hundred and twenty acres of the public land to every real bona fide settler who is not worth over one thousand dollars. I am prepared to meet the gentleman from Missouri the host of rich and grasping speculators who, under the pretext of your pre-emption law, and under the deceptive mask of an intention to settle and improve your lands, are seeking to get the public domain into their hands, that they may convert it into an engine to enrich themselves. Is there any thing in this proposition so very unreasonable—so "monstrous"—so "enormous"—so "outraging"? If we are to have a pre-emption at all, for whose benefit is it to be granted? Is it for the benefit of the speculators, demanding our sympathies and ask our loyalties for the poor and needy. This proposition meets their sympathies and complies with their demands: it holds out a bounty to the poor and the needy—a bounty to the needy and the poor, and it proposes to give; and all it asks is a guard that this bounty shall not be given to the rich. Is that "monstrous"? What do gentlemen desire? What would they have? Do they want to give pre-emption to the rich? To make the territory a monopoly? Why do they reject my proposition? Mine has the very essence of a pre-emption law; and it is the only sort of a pre-emption law which can be honestly vindicated. Few men worth over a thousand dollars seek for themselves a home amongst the distant wilds of the public lands. Very small, indeed, is the number whom such a restriction will exclude; but it will shut out the men who make their wealth out of the public plunder. Do gentlemen resist it on that account?

I would not occupy a moment of the senate's time were I not bound to show that I am not ashamed of the measure I have proposed, and have no thought of "shrinking" from its defence. What objection can be made to my offering this amendment which proposes to annul with the pre-emption the principle of distribution? It would be idle at this time to repeat the history of the collision to the union of the public domain—on which the states rested the right of the territory to participate in its proceeds. These lands were ceded, be it remembered, in 1784, at a time when the old confederation was the fundamental law of the union—when the treasury was supplied by requisitions on the states according to the ratio of population in each state; it was ceded with the express purpose that it should be and remain for the common benefit of all the states. The proceeds were to be divided according to the quota furnished by each state to the expenses of the general government, and how was that quota regulated? According to an estimate of the amount of improved lands in the several states. But is that the rule of the states confederation now? If the proceeds of the public lands go to the treasury, do they go in the same way as now in this proposition? Not, unless the taxes were in exact proportion to the lands in each state. The rule has been altered. You have changed the means of taxation. But you cannot change the basis of the acts of congress which divide the public lands; and the only way to fulfil the intent and meaning of that cession is to go according to the terms in which it is expressed. The revenue from the public lands is not like the rest of the revenue under the constitution. Those lands were ceded to us, not under the constitution, but under the confederation; and the purpose of the cession can only be fulfilled by as near as approximation to the very words of the deed as circumstances now render possible.

This proposition is very "dangerous." The honorable gentleman from Missouri, reminds us that when, some years ago, we were about to distribute the surplus then in the treasury by depositing it with the states he uttered the prophecy that the states would be ruined by the distribution; and he said, if the states once began to lap that blood it would eventually become their common food; that the general government would be stripped of its revenue; that the states would seize upon the money in the treasury and would have the general government to cover the deficit as it could; in a word, that the states having once got the taste of blood, would fasten on the general government like so many vampires, and would drain its veins of the last drop of its vitality. Well, the honorable senator just now seems to change his mind. I concur with him that it would be to reposit the fullest confidence in the good faith of the states, and rely without hesitation on their fulfilling all their contracts. But what does the honorable senator think of the states? Confidence in the fidelity of the states! What a magnificent compliment has the honorable gentleman paid to the states of this confederacy! In his opinion, they are no many vampires—they are no states that would devour the general government upon its strength and suck its veins. Why what is the general government? Is it not their own offspring? And is the parental sentiment so weakened, so destroyed, so reversed, that the parent will devour the child? The states are not to be trusted; they are a set of vampires; they will lap the heart's blood of the government, and drain its veins. That is the senator's opinion of them. I believe no such thing, but he does; and we were told all this, and a great deal more. The states, if they once get their hands upon this money, will apply it to unwisdom purposes; it will corrupt them—destroy their dignity and sense of independence! In our pure lands alone there is no contamination. The states are a pack of idle spendthrifts—made by the sight of money, intoxicated by the touch of their own property, corrupted by its possession, and led into all sorts of folly and mischief; therefore, we, as a sort of wise guardians, must keep these our pure lands away from the states, and keep them from them from themselves, by—keeping their independence! [Laughter.]

The states have a right to demand this distribution; and if they have, their circumstances render it desirable that they should have what is their due. They have debts to pay; and under such circumstances, think you that they do not, like private individuals, like to receive what is due them? We are their debtors; we owe them this money; and they ought to have it. If it is their just right, then it is no argument to say "we need this money; we cannot spare it; our treasury is at a very low ebb, and if we take out this amount to pay it to them, we shall have to lay taxes to make up the deficiency." We have no right to use their property for our purposes. We possess ample modes of raising funds that the states do; and if paying your just debts leaves you with a deficit, it is much easier for you to supply it than for the states to tie out of their property. I have already said that the states, and all he says about the monstrosity of my proposition.

It is said to be "idle" to pay over this money to the states if by taxation we must raise an equal sum. It is idle to give property, and to receive an equal distribution is to be regulated by the principle which prevailed under the old confederation, and not according to the ratio of taxation established by the federal constitution. The principle of distribution is to be regulated by the ratio of population, and not general; it is regulated by the terms of the original cession, which was made while the confederation was yet in force; but we have gone very wide from the rule then laid down. Give this money to the states, and every man in the state, rich and poor, will share in the benefit. It is their right, and they ought to enjoy it. I might stop there, without going into any question of consequences. But if, by distributing to the states the proceeds of the public lands, we are to give property, we are to make up the deficit, have we not ample means?—Are there not luxuries on which a very small tax will be sufficient for this purpose, without reaching the poor man at all? Lay your tax on these luxuries, and you tax the rich only. This you can do if your treasury is in straits. I hope, too, that the abstraction of this money may operate to bring back the government to a just and economical administration—such an administration as gentlemen all profess to desire. But how has it been administered during the expiring dynasty? Has the little stream of money flowing in from the sale of the public lands had any other effect than to increase the extravagance of the government? More than thirty millions a year has been expended during the late Bureaucratic administration. It would seem that this landed revenue of which we boast so much in Missouri takes on so solemnly, has done little but feed their extravagance. There is nothing, rely upon it, that so promotes extravagance in expenditure as to feel, partly at least, in one's pocket—[A laugh.] I wish it to have no money flowing insensibly into its possession. I want it to have none but what it gets by taxation—so that the people may know and feel where the money comes from. Give a government an income independent of taxes, and the people do not feel what they are paying. Such a mode of filling the government coffers must be dangerous. I do not desire it to continue; and I hold, therefore, that justice and expediency alike require that this great subject of the public domain shall be settled as soon as possible. Give the simplest provision you please to the poor bona fide settler; I do not object to it; I am ready to be understood, and to stand by it, until while I do this, I would at the same time do and discharge my duty to the states, by giving their just shares in the proceeds of the whole domain.

I hold this to be greatly preferable to the scheme of cession which has been proposed by the senator from Carolina. I was, I confess, greatly surprised by many of the demonstrations of that honorable senator. He reduced the value of one hundred and sixty millions of acres of the public lands, lying within the states of this union, to six millions of dollars! He reverses the position that each acre of that land is worth a dollar and a quarter, and holds, on the contrary, that not an acre of it is worth that price. [Mr. CALHOUN here explained. He had meant to be understood that the lands were worth of them worth a dollar and a quarter cash in hand value; and that none were worth that but such as could now be purchased in market.]

The senator thinks that he can reduce the total value of the public lands to the value of a sum in interest, will bring us more than the lands will. Why, what is the value of land covered with the ocean which no man can drain? Or what is the value of land which no man can cultivate, or enjoy the fruits of it? What is the value, in hand, of land so situated! Yet the senator concludes that, in case such land is of no value now, we ought to let it, now, for nothing. That is the substance of his argument. What is the selling price of land under the sea, not drained, or land at present inaccessible to settlement? No man can get at the one, or wants the other—and, while things so remain, it has no present value at all. But would a prudent man, or a prudent government, therefore, part with it for nothing? The value of a thing consists in the use of it—that is the value of land, and that only. Its value depends on the demand for it. Till the demand advances, we must content ourselves to wait. When it comes to be wanted, then it will have its value.

It is disgraceful to witness the manner in which matters are now proceeding—to see the sale of valuable lands proceeding as it has lately been. The sale is made in the face of a cold and a chilling inclement weather, and when this is completed of the secretary then writes a most gracious letter declaring that, though he is in very great want of money, yet he will condescend to put off the sale a little longer. The secretary then writes a letter and does not know where to go to it, until it is time to get up a pre-emption law; then Mr. Secretary in haste advertises the lands for sale, at a time proper or improper, no matter. Just as a speculator has time to sell a good article, and then he is obliged to pay for the extravagance of yesterday, and to get what he needs for more extravagance to-morrow.

The whole basis of the honorable senator's argument is perfectly idle and visionary. To talk of the present value of 160 millions of acres of land, when every body knows that not more than fifty millions of it are wanted in a year! What demand is there for 160 millions of acres of land? What the price such a tract will bring it put up to sale? Had we not better sell it at a low price, and sell it by little, as it is needed? Can we not hold the property and sell it off for homes to settlers as homes are needed? Can we not keep it for posterity, when they will want to use it? This is not a subject to which to apply the calculus of the day. The value of land is not wanted now, and therefore, there is no ground on which to calculate its value at this moment.

But this is an able scheme of evasion is to remove at a stroke all our evils. This to put an end to our angry debates; this to put far away the danger of the lands falling into the hands of the settlers, or of the states. No more jealousies are to be felt between the states and the federal government; no more treasure in this body or elsewhere; no more lands and bribes are to be offered by ambitious seekers of the presidency—nothing of all this is to be felt any more—all, all is to be an end, and the ground for your lands is to be brought up to the ground for your lands!—[A laugh.] Now, I differ entirely from the learned senator in all these calculations. I will show you how it is. He makes the land profitable to the states, and the states to the land. But the land would fetch if set up at auction when one wants to buy, and then contrasting this with what we are to get for it from the states to which we are to cede it. But will this remove our solidities? Will this remove our debts? Will this remove will be our debtors, and they are to promise to pay. Can the gentleman's perspicacity see no possible matter of controversy in the interpretation and in the compliance with the laws? Will this remove the laws? Will the states be taken as for graduation and pre-emption laws, and it produces a vast deal of prolonged and angry debate; if we substitute money for land, will that diminish the debate? Shall we have a new state? Shall we have a new state now? And more! No, the general government acts on individuals; it grants pre-emption to A and B, and it has them in its power; and yet he says this is the utmost danger of resistance, and of our not paying the debt. But he says, let us have the state land, and then all will be peace and quietness. Why, will there not be as much danger when all who might oppose our authority are consolidated into one, as when we could deal with them as individuals? Will there not be as much danger when we make with more effect than on a single man? Is it so easy to deal with states and to compel them to fulfil their engagements? Was it found so in the days of the confederation? Under the confederation we had states on states who had made promises; and did the plan work well? Was it perfectly easy to raise the respective quotas of the states, even under the most urgent pressure of the necessities of all? No; it was found to be a contest of government against government, and it was found that governments are not as likely to pay as individuals; and, if they refused, it was much harder to get them to pay than if they were individuals. It was enlarged; and our revolutionary fathers were so "idle, or unjust or foolish" as to think they gained by the exchange and the federal constitution a monument of their wisdom in this day. But we have seen the result. We have seen the complete failure of the old exploded confederation! We are to give up the land which is ours, and in the sale and management of which we have to do with individuals only; and we are to have to do with the land-lord's creature, to the debt of particular states. I do not distrust the honesty of the states, or their good intentions; but we know that it is not always convenient to pay to-day. Do debtors never allow themselves to be taken by the nose? No; they will not. These lands, are we perfectly sure they will never become a subject of controversy? May the states not say the progress of graduation is too slow? It keeps our people waiting too long; give us a constitution, so that we may get the land at nine pence the acre so much sooner? His peace-making proposition only changes the ground of controversy; it does not remove it. The whole people are to be taken by the nose, and we are to be taken by the nose, and look out for new seeds of discord as present unknown. Shall we leave the ground we have so long tilled, and with every foot of which we are familiar, to plunge into a new and untried one? Shall we leave it to them? And then we are to purchase all this trouble at a price.

A few years ago the proposition of the honorable senator was to give up half the public lands. Was this fair, to surrender by cession to the use of a few that which is equally the property of all? To pacify the enemies of nine states, shall we give up one-half of 160,000,000 acres of land? Is not such a price rather high? And have we a right to pay it? I hold we have not. The entire scheme seems to me to be one of the wildest, most wasteful, most visionary conceptions that ever entered into the brain of a statesman.

But the object of the shrine is to get rid of executive patronage. Now, I am not an advocate of executive patronage. But, let me ask, what a vast patronage will there not be exercised by giving away, in one single act of generosity, an entire moiety of the public domain. Seldom, indeed, is one individual so fortunately placed as to be able, by a single net of inaccuracy, to make a present of eighty million acres of land—a vast and royal donation, to be sure. Yet the honorable senator, while making this popular largesse of eighty million acres of land—belonging to the whole union, is ferriily opposed to the same thing when it comes to the individual "States," that, if we refuse to make this gift, the States will be able to seize and carry off the whole property in a body, against the will of the other seventeen states. The "demonstration," I confess, is a very poor one. But I do not think I can believe these states will ever be so unjust, so rapacious, so prodigal, as to attempt thus to seize upon the property of their fellow citizens. But if there is such great and imminent danger that these states will do this, I think it is very probable that, if we then, can not the honorable gentleman suppose, on the same ground of reasoning, that the States may tear up his bonds if we do cede in—? If he considers them so utterly unprincipled, so impotent, so unworthy, that he thinks it necessary to strip themselves lands which belong to the whole, family of confederated states, what will there be to restrain them from vacating their bonds after we have surrendered the land into their possession? One party will be all virtue and good faith, the other all rapacity and violence. There is great danger, imminent danger of our losing the whole domain, and we must give it away before the states take it by force; but, in the shape of a bond, then these states are to be all purity, all honesty, all fidelity. For my part it seems to me that if we cannot depend on these nine states for their fulfillment of their constitutional obligation to pay for the land, why should we ever voluntarily engage them they may now reject into.

I apprehend no such danger. I do not call upon the senate to cede the public domain on any such ground. If that is to be the ground of our procedure, I say let the lands go. I will not be one to encourage the spoilers. I will never be one to say this thing must be done and will be done. On their own heads be it. I will take neither part nor lot in the responsibility.

I repeat that I have no objection whatever to consent to pre-emption, provided the rights of all the states can be respected. That is all I ask.—That was all my amendment proposed. I am sensible that I have not been able to convince the senate, but, challenged and called out as I have—en as one who had offered a proposition so outrageous, so enormous, so monstrous, that I shrink from all attempt to defend it, I could not refrain from saying that I am not a hypocrite, and that on every subject I know is perfectly safe. Not a whole can be said upon it that has not been better said already. Yet, as my proposition was pronounced an enormity, I wished to show that I did not mean to be so, and that I was not guilty of the guilt of which I have been guilty is a simple act of obedience to the instruction of my state legislature. The plan is before the country, and denounced as it may be, I can no longer resist it. I am called, it may be, to such a contest with the public opinion as I have never before engaged in, and I will fight wherever I have been. My own state has passed a solemn resolution giving the seal of her approval. In offering it here, I have but obeyed her voice, and I have no other apology to offer. I have not returned aside from the course she has marked out for me to pursue. She understands her interests; she judges calmly; she asks nothing but her plain recoiled right, and I ask nothing more in her name. Mr. BENTON rose in reply, and noticed in the faces of the audience the expression of surprise and indignation. "I am not a politician," which he appeared to consider as personally aimed at himself. If the phrase had been so intended to apply, it was a great error. He had been a politician for more than thirty years, and he had enjoyed the honor of a seat on the floor of the senate, he recollect-ed reading with great satisfaction the printed speeches of the honorable member from Kentucky, and he had been the oldest politician in this body, the oldest sitting member of the senate was then upon his right hand, (pointing to Mr. KNOTT, of Rhode Island)—a man who had been a senator for twenty years, and he had enjoyed the honor of a seat in the senate of his own state for 23 years. There was but one example here present of an older politician than the senator from Kentucky himself, and for that the senator must look to the honorable member from New York. Mr. LARSON, the honorable gentleman (said Mr. B.) suggests that I make use of the word unwilling in application to him. I did make use of that term in what I said of the honorable member from New York, and I will not use the word. But if I did, I freely admit that, it was applied to that honorable senator, it did him injustice. I will treat that frank and magnanimous gentleman as I would any other senator, and there is nothing in his character which deserves such an epithet. So far from that, the defect in his character (and in every character, however excellent, there must, it seems, be some alloy) lies in the opposite direction. So far from deeming him cunning over-much, his defect lies in not being cunning enough, as is manifest in the present case; for he has not had sufficient cunning to prevent his being made sponsor on this floor for a child of which he is not the father. [A laugh].

And now to the epithets of which the honorable senator seemed so much to complain. I have never aimed, in any poor speech, at more than one quality, and that is intelligibility. I have never aimed at the language of the rhetorician, but have aimed at the language of the philosopher. In the present case, however, it seems that even in this I failed; for the gentlemen from Kentucky do not seem able to take in that feature of his proposition which drew from me the epithet which I employed. The proposition itself—I mean that part of it which says that the land of the living is a better place than the land of the dead, always bad. It was this I characterized as enormous, and as outrageous. As it has been denounced by me from the first. But, odious as it is in itself, it has a feature a thousand times more odious than it ever exhibited before, and that is its date in its chronology—the time when it is offered.

It proposed at a time like this, and to the existing state of the treasury, to withdraw one-fourth of the public revenue, and it is to be followed by what has been distinctly intimated to-day, viz: the imposition of a tax upon the French silks and the gentleman's amendment—the withdrawing one-fourth of the revenue and supplying the deficit by exercising the tax levying power—that I denounced as an enormity. I denounced it. I denounced the proposition. I denounced the enormity. I denounced the revenue. I never say the proceeds of the public lands, nor do the gentlemen on the other side of the question ever speak of the landed revenue. I always speak of the revenue, and never of the proceeds of the public lands. I never speak of the violation of the constitution to give the revenue we have got to the states, and then to levy other taxes to supply the deficiencies. It is in principle the same thing. I do not say that for that purpose. This feature of enormity is not a new one. I do not think it more odious. The gentleman has let out to-day a little more of the policy of the coming administration than he did yesterday. He did not believe in the proposition, and he has now been proved by withdrawing the existing landed revenue to be made up to the treasury. But to-day he has come out more boldly, and has avowed his plan to be to lay a tax upon luxuries. I then felt him that he was not a gentleman, and that he was not a man to lay a tax necessary of life, if the tax is laid for unconstitutional purposes. It is as unconstitutional to lay a tax upon silks and wines as upon sugar and salt, if the tax is levied to supply a deficit caused by the withdrawal of the revenue of the treasury for several states. And as to the plan of taxing French silks and French wines, I am prepared to show not only that it is unconstitutional, but to demonstrate that a tax on French silks and French wines is a tax on our Southern States. I am prepared to show, although Southern cotton and western tobacco are willing to pay their honest share of the constitutional revenue of this country, yet they are not willing, and they are not prepared to pay the unconstitutional portion of them. I will show that France has fifteen to sixteen millions worth of Southern cotton, and receives from this country four-fifths of all the tobacco which is consumed in her kingdom; and in consequence of this, she is enabled to show us how can you cut off her products by your tariff, and not at the same time cut off the export of America tobacco? I pledge myself, on this subject, to go through all the complex mazes of commerce, and to show that France is not to be taxed, and then to follow the course of the French silks and the French wines as they return in exchange for it; to trace them to South America, where they are exchanged for sugar, and then to follow the course of the sugar, and to show how it replenish the treasury and to augment the constitutional currency of the country. I am ready; I will meet the gentleman at any time; I am prepared to show that the proposition of the gentleman's argument, not with a sylph, but with a sword, which have been published and annually submitted to congress for nineteen years. I have kept these documents; I am in the habit of keeping them, not only for the purpose of showing the gentlemen that they and have traced every branch of your commerce, and see how it operates on the relative interests of every country in the world. I dismiss the subject now, repeating the opinion that the non-acceptance of the amendment is not a clear violation of the constitution.

But the gentleman is pleased to remark on the language employed in speaking on the consequences of this distribution. I said that when the proposition was first introduced, I opposed it on the threshold, as tending to a seizure of the revenue of the country, and that I then predicted that if we once brought the state to this blood, if they once learned to lick this blood, and to lap up this blood, they would go on until they sucked out the very last drop of the life-blood of the federal government, and drained its veins, till at length they were satisfied with this blood, and were full; I said these words; I wrote them down at the time; yet there they stand in a volume of Gales & Searson's Register of debates; and though for attesting them I encountered such a shower of denunciation on the ground that it required some personal courage to ride down to my lodgings, yet I have not any of them. Whatever may have been said then, or may be thought now, I feel a conviction that the time is coming, and coming more rapidly than I then thought, when the current revenue of the government will be seized on. And I have now made a proposition to do that very thing. The senator from Kentucky (Mr. CATTENDEN) has brought into this body, and urged on this floor, a proposition I denounced four years ago. Yes, the time has come, the measure is proposed, and we are about to hang the twenty-six states of this confederacy on the breast of the federal government, to suck the life-blood from its veins. Here is the realization of what I then said, that if the states once get the taste of this blood, they would be satisfied with no other food. "It is my pride and glory to have sold out," I have stood up nearly alone, (murmurs of "solitary and alone,") or with only four or five companions, against a stream of popularity which overturned all opposition. Yet, sir, I said this, and then uttered the prophecy which I have now seen fulfilled. I see this exercise the privilege of a man who has had a seat for twenty years on this floor (though I am not the oldest politician in this body) of saying, when my friends have gone wrong, "I told you so," yet I am not quite so bold as the old lady who is accustomed to utter this expression, who, when she was told that the cow had swallowed the grindstone, exclaimed, "I told you so." I am not quite so bold, but what I told them was true. I could not see far enough into futurity to see 1839, or even to see the present day, yet I denounced the proposition as being the old requisition of the confederacy reversed. It was the states calling for money on the general government, instead of the government calling on the states, which was the very thing which reversed the old confederacy. I could not then foresee that only four years after the words were uttered, we should have had a proposition brought in here to take the current revenues of this government and distribute it among the states. I said another thing at that time, I said that the money which was called a surplus, and deposited with the states, was gone. It was gone forever. That point is now given up. There was one thing which I did not foresee, that the government, being stripped of its revenues and forced to issue treasury notes, and, therefore, failing to make its last deposit of this surplus, would be accused of a breach of faith towards the states, and charged with not paying a debt it owed them. That I did not foresee. When I denounced the measure of distribution, as it became a public man to do, and I warned the senate, that in no operation of this kind, once begun, it was "the first step which cost" all, I did not foresee that, within six months from that time, a fortification hall to receive the defenders of the country was to be broken and laid under a proposition for another distribution.

Why do I recur to these facts? It is for the purpose of justifying what I said as to the enormity of the proposition of the senator from Kentucky. It is to support myself in the course now proposed, we shall be going on to the destruction of this government; marching towards it at full gallop. Who talks about public defenses now? My honorable colleague over the way, (Mr. Who else? Nobody.) I said that we had our difficulties with Europe! Many gentlemen; but on that subject I have never opened my mouth. And why? Because I was afraid to let my sentiments be known upon it? No. But I will tell you why. Because the country was not ripe for it. The public mind was not ripe to hear them. It was the womb of evil contained. Because I could not go into the subject without touching on what I see a few years ahead. But what has become of the whole idea of the public defenses? From the time that the distribution scheme was proposed, the whole idea vanished at once from the minds of our politicians, (I do not say from the minds of the people.) As chairman of the military committee I was cried down on this floor for bringing in the fortification bill. So keen were gentlemen to get hold of the public money and divide it among the states that not a dollar could be got for the public defense. All was given up, and distribution! distribution! was the cry, and that is to be the whole policy now. I set my face against it from the beginning, and the remembrance of it is one of the convictions I now carry with me from public life. I see this government reverting to the condition in which it stood under the old confederation, though by an opposite process, and I foresee that this appetite for the federal revenue will grow by what it feeds on. I thank you for putting me in mind that I said then what would be the effect, if it was not the object, of the proposed deposit with the states, namely, to break down the deposits banks. I say that the money would be an evil present to every state that received it; that it would operate as a curse; and I now appeal to senators from every state to say whether that has not been the effect of it. I ask every state whether they do not condemn the measure at this day; whether they were not like a public enemy and a degraded man, who, when he won a prize in the lottery, rushes at once into a hundred extravaganzas, the very first of which soon swallows up the prize. The states felt, when they received this money, as if they had gotten hold of an intermediate supply, and with one accord they all rushed into experiments, for scarce one of which they were ripe. It was only the first instalment they received, they had not got the rest, and the expenditure was worse than useless. They are involved in debt, and they are some here who may pay the instalment, but it is to have 26 states rushing on to this feeble government to suck out its vital blood; bad as this is, it is a trifle to the evil of bringing upon the banks and capitalists of Europe to influence our elections, and change our executive government, that they may thereby raise the price of American stocks. It has brought us to what all the genius of Sheridan never foresaw. We have seen monarchs of Europe despoiled, and kingdoms seized, to pay a note of hand. We have seen rajahs and empires the descendants of the great world, torn from their thrones, and their kingdoms seized and ravaged, to pay a note of hand; and yet all this is but a trifle to the degradation suffered by the American people in witnessing the election of a president, and the seizure of the stock jobbing operation on the London exchange. All this was more than I expected, but it is upon us, and we must endure it. But so long as I hold a seat upon this floor, I shall be found fighting for the general government against the states, and against the stock jobbers, and the bankers and capitalists who have changed the executive of the American government to augment the price of stocks.

Mr. CATTENDEN. The senator has based his whole reply to my remarks on the assumption, that the states do not possess the right to demand of the general government a distribution of the proceeds of their common estate in the public lands. I went on the assumption that they have that right. That is not denied; and has not been disproved. True the money has to pass through the treasury, but still it is their money. This point the senator has not touched; every thing has been argued but the principle point in the argument, on which all the rest hangs and turns.

The honorable gentleman in his concluding remarks made a very extraordinary assertion indeed. Alluding to the late presidential election, and the influence of foreigners in this country, he ascribed the change in the executive administration of this country to the bankers and capitalists of England and in this country. Can this be possible? Sure I am that if such an influence does exist, it has not reached the part of the country where I reside; nor can it have operated where the honorable senator resides, in the state of Virginia. I thank Mr. Van Buren conclusively proves. It is not at that end of the union, then; and I am sure it is not in the centre; where, then, is this dangerous and irresistible influence which has revolutionized our whole political history? Where I ask has it been? Where have been collected representatives of every portion of the entire union, then; to each senator I put the question. Was it your state whose vote has been controlled by the tricking, stockjobbing capitalists of Europe? Which of the states is it that lies under this influence? Or if it branched on the foreign side, of the whole American people? Is this entire republic to be considered as justly charged with this dishonor? Is it true that the 2 or 3 millions of voters who constitute that majority whose votes have brought in a man, who has been in the service of the slave, bought up with FOREIGN MONEY—the meanest and basest of all influences. Where is the evidence that fixes a blot like this to the American name? For my self and my constituents, for the noble and beloved state I represent is not on this floor; I put the charge far from me. If there has been such an influence at work, it has not been among us. Not one man of the twenty-six thousand majority of vote cast in Kentucky for Gen. Harrison has acted, as I in my soul believe, from any such base, unworthy, degrading influence. Let me, I do believe that, and I feel free-born American citizen has acted so unworthily of his name; and his birthright. And again, I ask where is the proof? Does the senator believe that proof to be found in a correspondence between an agent in the Missouri and some financiering gentleman in England.

[Mr. BENTON, across, "A director of the bank of England."]

Well, a director of the bank of England, with respect to the sale of a portion of the Missouri stock? Is that what the senator relies on? The agent here writes to his correspondent in England as to the influence likely to be exerted by public evas in this country on the price of American stocks. Is there any thing so wonderful—any thing "so monstrous," so "outrageous" in this? Can any thing be more natural, more in course, than such a correspondence on such a subject and purpose? Is it any more of the price of stocks, he might be heard writing about the probable price of cotton, might he not have referred to a probable change in our financial system as likely to affect that article of trade? Does not every body know that the very fluctuations in public affairs have an effect on the commercial world, and immediately affect the state of the prices in the market? And why should not this be mentioned in regard of stocks, as well as any thing else for sale in the market? Is it not the price I have heard in support of this nighty charge about British stockjobbing influence in American elections.

No. I will tell the honorable senator what has produced this astounding political change. The gentleman shall not escape from the argument—from a fact so notorious. It would indeed be a melancholy consolation to the gentleman and his friends to ascribe their defeat to the dishonor of their entire country. Were I in their situation, sooner than cast a stigma like this on the land of my native land, I would rather cast it on the heads of my countrymen. I would admit that my party had mismanaged public affairs; or that at least the people thought they had; or, somehow or other, they had lost the public confidence. Never, never since the foundation of this republic, did I see a more American freemen cast their votes with one spirit and specific understanding as to the grounds of their united action. That is my opinion. The result of the late election is not the effect of British gold, but the sense of the American people as to the management of the public affairs, and the policy they expressed. Let not gentlemen attempt to get out of the position in which that election has placed them, by stigmatizing the people of the United States with corruption. No, no. This expression of opinion comes from the large number of republican stock who set up the government; it is a spark from the old revolutionary fire, and it has blown the gentlemen sky high. Let them not, now that they have reached the ground, and are rubbing their bruised and broken limbs, try to disguise from themselves the truth as to what hurt them. Strange indeed would it be, could the magic wand of British gold be applied to produce such a result. All the natural causes, on that subject, seem to point the other way. We might expect that kings, and presidents who try to be as good as the king, and who go down the path with each other. They do not seek to put down the throne to raise the cottage. If the real truth could be come at in the matter, I verily believe that there was more foreign sympathy than republican opposition. There is not a state, no, not a county, through this wide union, that was swayed in its late vote by any influence from the London exchange. Gentlemen are sadly puzzled to account for the result of the late election, and it was all the work of British gold. Others say it was nothing but the senseless cry about log cabins and hard cider." All sorts of devices are used to disguise a fact so appalling. Some say it was all the effect of cotton. [A laugh.] And one very distinguished intellectual gentleman was so assured as that, if the principles of the whig party were to be carried out, they would lead only to this, that we should put down this magnificent capitol, the proud hall of American legislation, and build in its place a log cabin, with a few shingles for cov- [Laughter.] But the gentlemen do not—or will not—understand what they say. It is no cry about log cabins or hard cider that has thus moved, as one man, almost the whole American people. It was something greater, higher, deeper. I know that the election of William Henry Harrison is to the politicians a stumbling block, and to the Van Buren men footstools; but to any unbiased, candid intelligent observer, it must appear to be the wisdom and the power of a great people. I can tell the gentlemen that it is not so very politic to sneer at log cabins. They are the emblem, the visible type, of the power of the people. Log will continue to be dear to them as a remembrance of the fact that they were able, by a powerful feat of their will, to take the man they loved from a log cabin, and set him in the place of their dominion. It is the practical, visible, tangible symbol of their power—which may God preserve! Think you to see their favor by sneering at their great deliverer? You forced it on us by your taunts; you laughed at our candidate as the inmate of a cabin; and you have seen, and you now feel, the effect of your own will; and, if I am not very much mistaken, you will never need another lesson to teach you the danger of sneering at log cabins. The people are coming, on the 4th of March, to show you what it is to set your foot upon them. They are bringing the man of the log cabin, and they mean to place him in your midst as a household god, and to be ready to account for it; and we will work out the plan for you.

Mr. BENTON. I have not attributed the result of the late presidential election to any one cause, though I did say that it was the result of the bankers and stockholders on the London exchange. The two letters on that subject to which the senator from Kentucky alluded are but as two grains to a mountain in the mass of evidence on that point. But I did not ascribe the result to any one cause. I acknowledge it to be perfectly inconceivable to me. [A laugh from many senators.] I profess myself to be without any belief on the subject.—[Laughter.] I see and hear a thousand opinions on every side. I give my ear to them. I give them the weight they are entitled to; but still I am left without a belief on the subject. When I see the gentleman who has been deposed receiving 570,000 more votes than at his last election, when I perceive that he got 450,000 more votes than ever General Jackson did, and yet see him beaten by 130,000 or 140,000 votes, it is, I own, inconceivable to me. While I did say that I felt the degradation that European capitalists should hang in our political struggle, and control our elections; and while I did say that it is humiliating to see the election of an American president made a stockjobbing speculation on the London exchange, yet I did not attribute to that influence the majority of its voters who have been elected to our executive office. I acknowledge that result is inconceivable to me. I cannot yet see how it was done. [A loud laugh on one side of the senate.]

The question now recurring on the amendment moved by Mr. CALHOUN.

Mr. CLAY, of Ky., resumed the senate that the amendment contained a blank which should be filled before the vote was taken.

Mr. CALHOUN said he left the blank to be filled by the senate as it might think proper. If the amendment should prevail, the blank might be filled afterwards.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said there was no need of filling for blank at this moment.

Mr. FULTON said the amendment was one of importance, and he requested a little time to reflect before he voted upon it; and he thereupon moved that the senate adjourn. The motion prevailed, and the senate adjourned.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—24 SESSION.

SENATE.

January 27. The following memorials and petitions were read and referred to the proper authorities.

By Mr. HALLER, a document in relation to the claim of the village of Carondelet, in Missouri, to a certain tract of land.

By Mr. ROGERS, from citizens of Maine, asking that there may be a repeal of the fish bounty law.

By Mr. BEYD, from citizens of Philadelphia, asking the erection of a new custom house.

By Mr. FULTON, from the legislature of Arkansas, asking an appropriation for a road from Helena to Custer.

Also, from the same, for a donation for the River turnpike company.

By Mr. PORTER, from citizens of Michigan in favor of a bankrupt law.

Mr. WELL reported a bill for the relief of the New England Mineral Land company.

The senate then took up the unfinished business of yesterday, being the disposition of the memorial from the tobacco planters of Prince George's county, Md. when Mr. MERILL spoke in reply to the remarks of Mr. CALHOUN yesterday, showing the justice of the prayer of the petitioners.

Mr. CALHOUN replied—though favorable to the tobacco interest he was opposed to retaliatory measures, and thought the memorial should be referred to the committee on foreign relations.

After some further debate, in which Messrs. CALHOUN, Rogers, Preston and Linn participated, at the suggestion of the latter gentleman, the memorial was referred to the committee on agriculture.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the special order, being the pre-emption bill. Mr. CALHOUN, Johnson and Wright addressed the senate—the latter gentleman, at 4 o'clock, P. M. gave way for a motion to that effect, when the senate adjourned.

January 28. The vice president laid before the senate, a letter from the president of the United States enclosing the annual report of the president of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, presented a joint resolution of the legislature of that state, instructing their senators and requesting their representatives in congress to oppose the repeal of the sub-treasury law, at as early a day as possible.

After some remarks by Mr. SMITH, the resolution was read, laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, presented the report and resolutions of the legislature of that state relative to the controversy between Maine and Georgia, on the subject of the delivery by the former of certain fugitives from justice.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and referred to the proper authorities.

By Mr. TALLMAGE, from citizens of Poughkeepsie and Whitesboro', N. Y. and from an association in New York, in favor of a bankrupt law.

Also, a remonstrance from the chamber of commerce of New York against the repeal of the pilot law.

Also, a petition from citizens of New York in favor of tea and coffee being substituted for the opium in the navy.

By Messrs. ALLEN, of Ohio, and NARRELL, of Michigan, from citizens of their states, in favor of a bankrupt law.

On motion of Mr. TALLMAGE, the committee on the subject was instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing house rent to officers attached to navy yards, where no houses are provided for their accommodation.

Mr. PINCE moved a resolution inquiring into the propriety of reducing the rates of postage on newspapers.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON it was resolved to appoint a committee on the part of the senate, to join a similar one of the house, to count the votes for president and vice president of the United States, and to certify the persons elected to their election.

Mr. PRESTON introduced a bill to secure to dramatic authors their right of property therein.

The senate then took up the bill relative to pre-emption rights; when Mr. WRIGHT rose and closed his remarks thereon. He was followed by Mr. CLAY, who, after speaking some time, gave way for a motion to that effect, when the senate adjourned.

January 29. Mr. WHITE rose and presented the resolutions of the general assembly of the state of Indiana, in favor of a national bank with certain regulations, and gave his own views upon the subject, and concluded by moving that the resolutions be printed and laid on the table, which was accordingly agreed to.

Mr. NARRELL and TALLMAGE presented petitions, from citizens of their respective states, in favor of a bankrupt law.

Mr. GRAHAM, on leave, introduced a bill to ascertain the practicability and probable cost of re-opening a direct communication between Albemarle sound and the Atlantic ocean. Mr. G. spoke at some length upon the subject.

Messrs. PRESTON, HUNTINGTON and HUBBARD were named as the committee, on the part of the senate, to count the votes for president and vice president, and to certify the persons elected to their election.

A bill increasing the pay of certain officers of the revenue cutters, while serving in the navy of the United States, was considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed.

The senate then took up the pre-emption bill, which being further discussed, the senate adjourned.

January 30. Certain communications were received from the president and laid before the senate.

Mr. TALLMAGE presented the credentials of the hon. W. C. RIVER, senator-elect from Virginia, who was duly qualified and took his seat.

Mr. KNIGHT presented the credentials of the hon. JAMES F. SIMMONS, senator elect from the state of Rhode Island, from the 1st of March next, which were read and placed on file.

Mr. ROGERS presented the petition of citizens of Maine, remonstrating against the repeal of the fishing bounties.

Mr. PRESTON reported a bill amendatory of the act granting certain relinquished lands in the state of Alabama, and for the purpose of improving the navigation of certain rivers.

Mr. ALLEN reported a bill extending the time for continuing Virginia military land warrants.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the pre-emption bill—when Mr. CALHOUN delivered his views thereon.

Messrs. MANGUM and WEBSTER each, replied at some length, to Mr. CALHOUN.

Mr. YOUNG moved, as an amendment to the bill, the proposed substitution of Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, which had been rejected some days since.

After some remarks from Mr. CLAY, of Ala. and Mr. YOUNG, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, Jan. 27. Mr. CRABO, of Alabama, under a suspension of the rule, presented a memorial of the legislature of that state, paying to be reimbursed $150,000 expended by them in the late war with the Creek Indians—referred to the committee on military affairs.

The treasury note bill was then taken up in committee of the whole—Mr. CAREY, of Illinois, in the chair.

Mr. POPE, who was entitled to the floor, concluded his remarks at half past 2 o'clock, when the chair gave Mr. HAY, who yielded it to him, for the purpose of personal explanation to Mr. W. C. JOHNSON, who said that, in the report in the Globe of last evening of a discussion which arose in this house yesterday, the following language appeared as having been used by Mr. DUNCAN:

"But that not being done, he denounced its author (pointing to Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson) a base liar, a contemptible puppy, a scoundrel and an infamously coward."

All that I have to say (continued Mr. J.) is, that this language was not used by the member from Ohio, (Mr. DUNCAN), as will be remembered by every gentleman who was present. The member had stated yesterday, most untruthfully, that the statement in the "Intelligencer" was false; and he also stated in this report that "Globe" had not heard my remarks made in the day preceding. I did not feel disposed to enter into discussion on that point, but I was determined not to be deceived by the report. I had in view by epithets or interruptions of any kind. That object was, in the first place, to show the language attributed to me in the report of the "Intelligencer," and, secondly, to prove that what I had stated was true, that the member had not appeared in the "Intelligencer." This latter remark had not appeared in the "Intelligencer." I did not wish to go into a discussion as to whether the member from Ohio heard the remark I made or not. He says he did not hear me; and yet he replied at the time to the first part of the sentence, declaring that he had charged general Harrison with cowardice. It was a little curious that he should have heard the first and not the last words, when those last words were uttered in a louder voice than the first. The chairman (Mr. CRABO) said that he did not hear me; and he said that it was not strange, as they were heard all over the house, and in the galleries, and by every one else, except the member from Ohio and the then chairman. I must have had some power of omniscience, as I picked up every voice over the chamber, and into the galleries beyond him.

I say, as regards this statement in the "Globe," that it is false; that the language imputed to this member from Ohio was not used; and that there is no member here of that name, who will rise and assert that it was used; that it is not my purpose to engage in a personal controversy with him; and that I shall never resort to the use of Billingsgate myself, nor allow myself to be governed by it. But I will not suffer the manifest injustice which is done in this matter to be changed, and which was practiced upon a fact for which I was ready to vouch, and of the truth of which I yesterday gave abundant evidence to this house. I say, in conclusion, that I have no objection to be the subject of the remarks of a member on this floor as depriving him of the rights of a gentleman—wherever, as in this case, I had directly and unequivocally assailed such a man—I should not take the ground that he was not a gentleman, however I might know such to be the fact. But I repeat that the language which I have read was not used; and if it had been, I certainly should not have noticed it. I have not been taught that an insult, direct and unequivocal, was to be revenged by Bellingrege words; and if the member is satisfied with that revenge, he is altogether welcome to its enjoyment.

Mr. Wise then took the floor, and addressed the committee. He directed his remarks, in the first place, to a certain matter of fact, which he had stated on a former day, in reference to an outstanding debt for public land donated at Old Point Comfort, and to the verification of the statement he then made by the introduction of evidence of the fact.

Messrs. Johns and Mallory, of Virginia, made brief statements in favor of the point.

Mr. Wise then proceeded in his argument, which was addressed, in the first place, to an explanation of the grounds on which he intended to vote for this bill, and which he stated to be three:

First, he said he would vote for the bill as a friend of the coming administration, and with a view to supply that administration with the immediate means to carry on the government after the 4th of March, knowing no other means of meeting the exigency. Secondly, to prevent an extra session.

And, thirdly, to prevent, during the year 1841, a premature agitation of the compromise act.

Mr. W. proceeded for about an hour, when, giving way to a motion for the purpose, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. Boardman obtained leave to introduce the following resolution; which was read and adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to communicate to his house an abstract of the report of the marshal of the district of Connecticut, showing the number of slaves within and subject by the census of 1840. And to ascertain and report to him house whether the captives from the schooner Ananias were included in the said number of slaves.

Adjourned until to-morrow.

Thursday, Jan. 22. The speaker laid before the house various reports from the post office and war departments.

Sundry bills from the senate received their first and second reading, and were referred as follows:

To provide for raising evidence in the District of Columbia and in the territories of the States, in certain cases. Referred to the committee on the judiciary.

To confirm claims to lands in the district between the Potomac and Sabine rivers. Referred to the committee on private land claims.

Confirming certain land claims in Louisiana. Referred to the committee on private land claims.

The house then again resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the report of the committee, Mr. Carey, of Illinois, in the chair, and took up the treasury note bill.

Mr. Wise having taken the floor, in continuation of his remarks of yesterday—

Mr. Duncan rose and spoke to the gentlemen from Virginia to yield the floor for a moment, for the purpose of personal explanation.

Several voices were heard in dissent; but,

Mr. Wise remarking that, as he had yielded the floor yesterday, for purposes of explanation, to the gentlemen from Maryland, (Mr. Johnson), it was but an act of courtesy that he should now yield it to the gentleman from Ohio, for a similar purpose, took his seat.

Mr. Duncan then rose and reiterated the statement which appeared in the "Globe" of a previous day, in relation to certain language stated to have been applied by him to Mr. W. C. Johnson, and announced his intention, that there might be no mistake, to republish that statement under his own signature.

Mr. W. C. Johnson (who was not in the hall when Mr. D. commenced his remarks, but who entered it at the close) said that he had not heard the remarks which had just fallen from the member from Ohio, but that he had been informed of their tenor and abusive character. If he had heard them, he should not have replied. His only object in rising now was to do an act of justice to the reporter to the "Globe," who had yesterday addressed him a letter, which he (Mr. J.) would send to the clerk's table to be read, showing that the remarks published in that paper had been prepared by the member from Ohio himself.

The clerk then read as follows:

House of Representatives, Jan. 27, 1841.
Sirs: As an act of justice to myself, I thought the liberty of stating, that the reported proceedings in the Globe in relation to certain language which you deigned to apply to me, were by Mr. Duncan previous to their going to press. Very respectfully your obedient servant.

W. HUNTER, reporter to the Globe.
To the hon. W. C. Johnson.

Thus (continued Mr. J.) it will be seen not only that the member from Ohio has been branded with cowardice, but that he is now doubly branded with falsehood. Now, I appeal to honorable gentlemen whether, in this state of things, it is possible that I could notice this member from Ohio.

Mr. Wise then rose and said: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I ever will give way, while I have the floor, to another scene of this sort. The anti-duelling bill is producing its bitter fruits—it is making this house a sad "hot-bed of war." Here, with permission of the chair and committee, and without a call to order from any body, we see and hear one member (Mr. Johnson) say to another (Mr. Duncan) "when he is on the floor, stand on your feet, and do not be afraid of the other say back that 'he is a liar!'" And, thus, their matter will stop—there will be no fight.

Mr. W. then resumed at length his argument from yesterday, which was directed to the two latter reasons then assigned by him as governing his vote he intended to give in favor of the bill under consideration, namely:

To prevent an extra session.

And to prevent a premature interference with the tariff question during the year 1841.

Mr. W. had not concluded, when at half past 3 o'clock, he gave way to a motion that the committee rise; which prevailed.

And the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

After the committee of the whole had risen, Mr. Proffit, of Indiana, obtained the floor and said he hoped the house would take some action upon the bill which had long been the subject of debate, and which he had made up his mind to do. Mr. W. had heard long lectures delivered on the subject of wasting the time of the house by gentlemen who were now occupying two or three days each, discussing the question of the tariff, and a hundred other irrelevant questions; and now, when the session was rapidly drawing to a close, without any thing beneficial to the country having been accomplished, we were adjourning at three o'clock, apparently mindful of nothing, but our personal comfort. He (Mr. P.) was anxious to render this subject of importance to its state—the bill confirming a grant of land to the Wabash and Erie canal—and would move that the house now resolve itself into a committee of the whole on that bill.

The question being put, the house was found to be without a quorum, and then adjourned.

Friday, Jan. 23. Mr. Burke asked leave to introduce a resolution to revive a committee appointed at the last session relative to contracts made by the government for fuel for stations, &c. which motion was rejected.

Mr. Culcary Morris asked leave to introduce a bill (notice of which he had given at an early period of the session) to repeal the sub-treasury law; but several members opposing, he moved to suspend the rules, and called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays being taken, the house refused to suspend the rules by the following vote—yeas 79, nays 87.

On motion of J. Q. Adams the house granted the use of the hall on Monday morning next to the pupils of the deaf and dumb asylum.

Mr. Pickens made an ineffectual effort to introduce a resolution calling upon the president for certain information or correspondence in relation to reports of the search of American vessels upon the coast of Africa.

The house then, on motion of Mr. Johns, went into the consideration of the bill to authorize the issue of five millions of dollars in treasury notes, Mr. Carey, of Illinois, in the chair.

Mr. Wise having taken the floor for the purpose of resuming his argument of yesterday, Mr. Rett requested him to yield it for a moment to enable him to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia. Mr. Wise having yielded, Mr. Rett said he had understood that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) had said yesterday, that a member of the convention of South Carolina, (now holding a seat on this floor) had in that body (so high had the excitement run) proposed a dissolution of the union. As he (Mr. R.) was the only member of the convention on this floor, he supposed the gentleman must have referred to him.

Mr. Wise was understood to say that he did allude to the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Rett); that such was the impression then prevailing in the hall, and that if the newspapers at that time were to be believed, a dissolution of the union was actually proposed or talked of in that convention.

Mr. Rett said that the gentleman was entirely mistaken. Neither he nor any other member of the convention ever proposed a dissolution of the union, nor was any such proposition ever made or discussed in that convention.

Mr. Wise was understood to say he was glad he had made the remark, because it had afforded the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Rett) an opportunity of contradicting it. He hoped, so far at least as South Carolina was concerned, that that section of the country would stand vindicated from the charge forever.

Mr. Wise then resumed his argument from yesterday, and concluded at half past 3 o'clock; the floor was obtained by Mr. Hubbard, when Mr. Johnson moved that the committee rise, but there being no quorum, the committee rose and reported itself fact to the house.

On motion of Mr. Slattery, the house again resolved itself into a committee of the whole, when Mr. Hubbard addressed the committee until nearly 5 o'clock, when, on motion of Mr. Fanderford, which prevailed, and so the house adjourned.

Saturday, Jan. 24. The special order on the treasury note bill was announced; when Mr. Pickens, by consent, obtained leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president be requested to communicate to this assembly, last and in compliance with public interest, any information or correspondence he may have in relation to recent seizures or search of any of our vessels upon the coast of Africa; or elsewhere, by British or other ships, and the circumstances of such search or seizure, and the authority under which they have been made.

Mr. Johnson moved that the resolution be added thereto the following:

"And also copies of all correspondence between the government of the United States and of Great Britain relating to the slave trade, since the 3d of March, 1837, and of despatches from Mr. Calhoun, P. Forrest, consul of the United States at the Havana, to the department of state, relating in any way to the said African slave trade."

Mr. Pickens accepted this amendment as a modification of his resolution.

And, as thus modified, the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Cushing, the following resolution, received from the senate yesterday, was taken up, read, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join such committee of the senate as may be appointed on the part of the house of representatives, to ascertain and report the results of examining the votes for president and vice president of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

The speaker then laid before the house a communication and report upon the subject of the survey of the northern tier boundary, proposing an additional appropriation of 75,000 dollars to defray the expenditures of the current year for that object.

The report was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Johnson, a communication from the secretary of the treasury in answer to a call, giving the amount of treasury notes and drafts issued since Jan. 1, 1841; also in relation to the deposits of treasury notes in bank, the amount and description of funds received for such deposits, and whether the money was left in deposits or transferred to the sub-treasury; which was laid on the table.

The bill from the senate for the settlement and payment of the claims of Alabama, arising out of the Creek war, was twice read and referred to the committee on military affairs.

The house then went into committee of the whole, Mr. Carey, of Illinois, in the chair, on the treasury note bill, when Mr. Hubbard concluded his speech, Mr. Jeffrey gave notice of an amendment which he intended to offer to the treasury note bill, restricting the amount, interest, and time of redemption, and then addressed the house for two hours; chiefly in reply to Mr. Wise.

Mr. Jeffrey, having concluded, Mr. Fanderford obtained the floor, but yielded it momentarily to Mr. Cushing, who explained the policy of the north with regard to the tariff—they wished for a tariff because they believed the alternative to be direct taxation.

They wanted a discriminating tariff, and not a high protective tariff with extravagant duties. They desired a policy of conciliation—a policy of compromise, in which a just regard should be had for the welfare of the whole United States. They desired a discriminating tariff, in that a moderate degree would maintain the interests of all parts of the United States, and it would be in no degree beyond the wants of the general government.

Mr. Fanderford then took the floor, but gave way to a motion that the committee rise.

After the committee had risen, Mr. W. C. Johnson, on leave, presented a memorial, claiming indemnity for French spoliation prior to 1800. The house then adjourned.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The packet ship Emerald, capt. Howe, arrived at New York on the morning of the 7th inst., from Liverpool, bringing dates to January 9th, her day of sailing.

The state of Paris was tranquil; the emute which was expected when the North America left Liverpool, had not broken out.

The important news from China, which was brought by the North America, and which reached London by a telegraphic despatch over land, viz. Marcellus and Paris, was doubted by many mercantile men in Paris. The "Courier Francais" says that if the Chinese have agreed to pay the English 65,000,000 francs, 35,000,000 of this sum may go to pay the opium merchants, leaving only 30,000,000 francs to defray the expenses of the war; whereas the war will cost England double that sum.

The same paper adds, that admiral Elliot could not have any authority to make a treaty with the Chinese, unless he thereby obtained some permanent advantage to the British government, which was not spoken of in the late news.

The "Courier Francais" further says, that they are assured upon the highest authority that the British government will positively insist, (as an ultimatum) to their reconciliation to the emperor, if they shall be allowed to have a resident minister constantly at Peking.

In Paris, M. Thiers had not made any further progress. M. Guizot was strengthening himself and endeavoring to preserve pacific relations all round. The comte de Pontou and M. Cochelet had not been recalled from Constantinople and Alexandria when the Emerald left.

Great dissatisfaction still existed in the public mind in Paris, relative to the state of the Egyptian question but no further demonstration had taken place in the chambers.

The weather was still very cold in Paris. The fortifications around the city were progressing slowly.

Herre coffee market, Jan. 9. The market remains nearly the same. The arrivals of the week have been large, but the holders not being anxious to press the sales, the prices have been well maintained to the close.

THE GERMAN CONSPIRACY.
Frequent mention has been made lately, in the English and continental papers, of the military league for mutual defence, comprising almost all the European powers except France and Russia, and bearing the general title of the German confederation. This prominence has been given to it in consequence of the threatening position assumed by France; and as the possibility of a war in Europe is not yet entirely removed, it may be interesting to our readers to know of what elements the league is composed, and what power it could bring into the field against the Gallic nation.

The army of the confederation consists of 10 corps, seven of which are united, and three mixed or composed of the combined complements of several different states. During peace it is not required that the whole amount of each contingent shall be in active service, many being away on leave, but it is requisite that one-sixth of the foot and two-thirds of the cavalry should be always engaged. Those on leave, however, must present themselves each year, and be exercised for six weeks.

The following is the exact quantum of troops supplied by each state, according to the last arrangement made by the diet in December, 1830; no state is state required to supply more than was at first settled, although since that time, (1831), the population in some is considerably increased:

Corps No. 1, 2 and 3—Austria contributes three army corps, amounting in all to 94,822 men, with 192 pieces of cannon.

Corps No. 4, 5 and 6—Prussia contributes three army corps, amounting in all to 79,234 men, with 160 pieces of cannon.

Corps No. 7—Bavaria contributes one army corps, amounting in all to 35,690 men, with 72 pieces of cannon.

Corps No. 8—Württemberg, Grand Duchy of Hesse and Baden, together, contribute one army corps, amounting in all to 89,159 men, with 60 pieces of cannon.

Corps No. 9—Saxony, Electoral Hesse and Nassau, together, contribute one army corps, amounting in all to 21,718 men, with 44 pieces of cannon.

Corps No. 10—Hanover, Holstein, Luebeck, Brunswick, Oldenburg, Schaumburg, Schaumburg, Steilitz, Oldenburg, free towns of Luebeck, Bremen and Hamburg, together contribute one army corps, amounting in all to 29,038 men, with 56 pieces of cannon.

The remaining confederate states, instead of forming any army corps, are required by the last arrangement to form in common a body of infantry reserve, which amounts in all to 11,396 men. In order to the maintenance of these several forces, each state is required to contribute a certain sum to the general fund.

The grand total amounts to 300,928 men, and 534 pieces of cannon. But it must be observed that the numbers above given are only the required minimum of each of the confederate states, and that in case of need the force actually contributed might probably be doubled.

SOUTH AMERICA.

The slave trade at Rio Janeiro. An officer of the United States ship Palmetto, writing to the editor of the Delaware Free Press, gives the following picture of the slave trade at Rio:

The slave trade has never been prosecuted with more vigor and success in Brazil, than during the past five years. Angola is the port in Africa which chiefly supplies this market. The difference in price between a negro in Angola and Rio, is but one hundred dollars—selling for one hundred and fifty dollars in Angola, and two hundred and fifty in this place. Indeed, it is said to be common for vessels to bring slaves, as passengers, from one port to the other, for one hundred dollars per head. This shippers can afford to do, as insurance can be effected on a cargo, for ten per cent. ad valorem.

Some years since government took measures to suppress the trade, but they have not been or are not now very sincere in their professions, or more might have been done towards affecting it. In 1838 there was a colonization society founded by the United States, for the purpose of inducing individuals of the purpose of returning all freed negroes to Africa, (I think Liberia), but I do not know that any good whatever has resulted from it. One cargo, I am informed, was despatched, but were not allowed to sail. It is supposed the whole number (6000) were captured by a slave and taken to Cuba. It is however, most probable the agents betrayed the confidence reposed in them, and instead of taking them to Africa, shipped them to a slave trading country and sold them.

From Buenos Ayres. By the brig Cadet, captain Babson, at Boston, from Buenos Ayres, a file of the British Packet has been received by the Boston Daily Advertiser. The only news of importance is the subjoined extract, of Nov. 28.

Letters from Santa Fe relate the particulars of an engagement which took place on the 16th inst. between a body of 200 men of the confederated army and a considerably superior force commanded by Lavalle in person. The action commenced about sun set at a place called Tres Intes, and lasted till dark. Lavalle's troops are represented as not having long resisted the shock of their opponents, having fled in all directions, leaving upwards of 400 killed on the field of battle, including officers, whilst the lost of the victors is stated as comparatively small, although embracing two officers. Lavalle is said to have escaped, accompanied only by four adjutants; his carriage, however, was captured. The victorious troops appeared to have been exclusively composed of a division of Santafecinos, under the command of colonel Andrade, and some squadrons of the Guardia del Monte militia of the province.

It is affirmed that Lavalle's troops have evacuated Santa Fe and that such are their privations from their supplies being cut off, that only one head of cattle is allowed for the daily ration of 100 men. Governor Lopez is still in the province at the head of the troops. President Urbe continued in the command of the combined army.

TEXAS, MEXICO AND GREAT BRITAIN.

The London Morning Chronicle of a late date contains some interesting information which appeared in this country, in relation to the treaty recently made between Mexico and Great Britain, and the more recent acknowledgment by the latter power, of the independence of the republic of Texas. Lord Palmerston is reported to have said that the Texas government agreed to take upon itself $1,000,000 of the Mexican debt. It is added, that a deputation that waited upon the minister upon the subject, expressed a wish that provision should be made for giving the bondholders the option of receiving part of the debt thus recognized by Texas in land, with a view to colonization. Lord Palmerston, requested the deputation to put their views in writing. From the same source we learn, that it is expressly stipulated in the Mexican convention that 100,000,000 of acres of the vacant lands in the departments of California, Chihuahua, New Mexico, Sonora and Texas, shall be specially hypothecated in the payment of the principal and interest of the national consolidated fund until the total extinction of the bonds; and, by the decree of the Mexican congress confirming the terms, it is declared, in addition to the general hypothecation, that 25,000,000 acres of government lands in the departments of the north, in communication with the Atlantic, shall be specially set apart for cession to the bondholders, and for the purposes of colonization.

On the same occasion, a communication was read from the London agent of Mexico, stating that the plan proposed for the consolidation of the overdue coupons has been approved by the Mexican executive, and was under the consideration of congress. The whole of the custom warrants sent out, during the year 1840, were paid off by the end of the present year, leaving the 1/5 part of the custom revenues available for the payments of the dividends. The Mexican converted debt is about £3,506,415, one half of which is an active five per cent. stock, making the difference presently payable equal to £2,250,000 per annum.

TEXAS.

The steam ship New York at New Orleans from Galveston, brings Texas papers to the 22d January. The congress was still in session, but no important matters were under discussion, and the latest advices from Austin contain any additional intelligence from the Mexican frontier.

There have been great floods even in Texas.—Buffalo bayou, near Austin, has been so high, causing much devastation. People living on Bray's bayou were obliged to climb trees, to escape drown-

George Strobel, to be consul of the United States for the port of Matanzas, in the island of Cuba, in the place of D. W. Courts, resigned.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. The election of president and vice president of the United States to serve four years from the 4th day of March next, was on Wednesday consummated by the opening and counting, by the vice president of the United States, in the presence of both houses of congress, of the votes given by the electors in the respective states. When the votes had all been counted, the vice president proclaimed, in audible and distinct tones, that,

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, of Ohio, having received a majority of the votes of the electors, is elected president of the United States; and that

JOHN TYLER, of Virginia, having received a majority of the votes of the electors, is duly elected vice president of the United States. [Nat. Int.]

PROGRESS OF GEN. HARRISON. We copy from the correspondence of the Baltimore Patriot the interesting account of general Harrison's journey, meetings and salutations of the people, &c.

Pittsburg, Pa. Jan. 30. In my last communication I informed that general Harrison had made an engagement to meet the ladies of this city, at a Concert Hall. Scarcely before the hour, an immense concourse of individuals were assembling in the neighborhood of the building. The room of the hall was soon thronged with the beauty and fashion of the town. From my own observations, and from what I could collect from others, I suppose not less than three thousand whig young ladies were present, exhibiting the most beautiful and animated spectacle I ever beheld. Within an hour of three arrived, the old hero alighted from the carriage, and accompanied by his distinguished aide, and the hon. Harmer Deany, he entered the hall amidst the exclamations of the admiring crowd—amidst the shouts of "the conquering hero come." The general rose, evidently much affected by this homage, thus paid by such a fascinating audience, addressed the ladies, in a few brief and eloquent remarks. During the delivery of this speech, the general took the liberty of making a beautiful episode in his observations, of the most deeply interesting character. He feelingly alluded to an incident that occurred in 1794. He observed that he had to have been in a Pittsburg wig; that in 1794, he exchanged locks of hair with the ladies of this town. The lady with whom the general had the good fortune to meet in 1794, happened to be present, and she (Mrs. A.) forthwith advanced to the general and tendered him her congratulations. The meeting exhibited much interesting behavior. After he concluded, the general then shook by the hand the whig daughters of Pennsylvania, and all retired to their boxes highly delighted with the "people's president," and highly gratified that they had an opportunity of grasping by the hand, the general, who had protected their country in times of danger and of difficulty.

He will have been for Brownsville to-morrow about 10 or 11 o'clock. The purpose of this place looks like a fair, for the committee of conveying him and the gentlemen accompanying him to that place.

Brownsville, Pa. Feb. 1st, 1841. General Harrison reached here to-night about 11 o'clock. Before I proceed to enunciate the circumstances attending the landing of the president elect at this place, I will give you a brief sketch of what took place this morning, prior to our embarkation from Pittsburg. Early in the morning, before the cannon and roar of artillery were heard in every part of Pittsburg. The whole town, before 9 o'clock, was in motion.

The military corps exhibited a most splendid appearance. The front of the Pittsburg hotel, conducted by the enterprising and accommodating major Iron, an old soldier under general Harrison's, was crowded with individuals who had collected to receive the salute of the president elect. A general having left the hotel, to pay one or two visits, to one or two valued friends, shortly returned, when the most enthusiastic cheering commenced. Some six thousand persons stood before the hotel. The general, in obedience to the request of his enlightened auditor, appeared before them, and made a few eloquent remarks in his usual felicitous style, characterised by his usual vigor of thought and eloquence of observation. Having concluded his remarks, the committee of arrangements intimated to the vast assemblage, that the general would move onwards to the steamer Loyal Hann, which had been prepared for his transportation to Brownsville. In a short time an immense concourse appeared on the levee, although it was raining and snowing immoderately. He delivered them a farewell address in the most touching and affectionate manner. The military companies accompanied him to this place. We left Pittsburg with hearts grateful for the homage which the citizens had manifested for our old chief—we left the beautiful and fascinating daughters of that city, who were so kind and so respectful to the patriotic people. The hospitable roofs—the splendid entertainments of the citizens of Pittsburg will long be remembered.

As we ascended the river, every demonstration of respect was tendered the general, and the highest degree of enthusiasm displayed. On reaching Elizabeth, we found an immense crowd on the banks of the river, ready to receive the general. At the warm salutations of his friends, he tendered his kindest regards. A numerous collection of ladies were present to welcome him to the town. He received them with that warmth and cordiality of feeling, for which he is so distinguished. At Williamsport he was also received with every degree of attention. On reaching Belle Vernon, a beautiful village immediately on the banks of the river, we discovered that a portion of it was brilliantly illuminated. In a few miles from this place, another dwelling was in a state of brilliant illumination. The length reached this place, about four thousand individuals at 11 o'clock at night, to welcome the general, and to tender him their hearty congratulations. At this place, he received the visits of numerous citizens. They soon expressed the promise of the general, that in the morning the general would receive them with pleasure. Great enthusiasm pervades this section of the state.

General Harrison expects to leave here about 10 o'clock to-morrow, for Uniontown, at which place he will spend to-morrow.

Uniontown, Tuesday, Feb. 2. This day we reached Uniontown, Pennsylvania. The concourse as you may well conceive, was immense, as this is the largest city of the county from which the soldiers volunteered their services under general Harrison, to defend the northwestern frontier. The old soldiers here, without any exception, made great efforts to meet the general, and the friendly and cordial manner in which he has received them uniformly. I am sure, will endure his elevated virtues to their memory. The assemblage at Uniontown was immense, upwards of fifteen hundred in the evening alone. The general's bed quarters was at the Clinton house. At this place, he delivered himself to-day to a numerous auditory. To say that it was eloquent and able would be faint praise. It was a masterly exposition of the great principles upon which the republican government was founded, and a luminous analysis of the constitutional law. As an evidence of the general ability of his gigantic effort, I will remark, that he mislaid even his enemies, as regards his views of the powers of the executive. That according to the views of the present executive, it was omnipotent. Such omnipotency he viewed as obnoxious to democratic principles, and highly pernicious to our liberties. He said it ought to be controlled, but, to his exercise, he should himself be careful not to overstep its legitimate powers, and thus prove himself unworthy of the confidence reposed in him by the people. He said he was elevated to power by the people, and not by the wily politician or corrupting influence of the high-sounding names of the land. To-day, the president elect delivered, in receiving the visits of his political friends.

Hagerstown, Feb. 5, 1841. I have just time to inform you that general Harrison reached here last evening about 10 o'clock. To-day, the greatest manifestation of feeling was displayed. The number of persons who assembled to pay their respects to the president of the people. About three thousand persons were present, and a high degree of respect was evidently displayed. He addressed the people this morning, and in a statesmanlike manner. To say that he gave general satisfaction to his friends would be poor praise—it elevated him highly in their opinion, as a man, and as a patriot. He also delivered a speech, in which, during the delivery of his speech he was frequently interrupted by shouts of applause. He took his departure to-day amidst the shouts of honest sufferers. The address was delivered before the house of B. H. McIlenny, Hagerstown hotel, the headquarters of the general. He also attended to the reception of the whig ladies—a numerous party attended. I will add that the liberal proprietor gave the most perfect satisfaction to his distinguished guests.

Frederick, Feb. 5, 1841, 9 P. M. We found Gen. Harrison here, having arrived about six o'clock. He is very much fatigued, and declines receiving company to-night. He will exchange salutations with the company of Frederick to-morrow morning—but will certainly leave with the train for Baltimore at ten o'clock. So you may expect him about 2 o'clock, P. M. Saturday. In the morning he was addressed by L. P. W. Balch, esq. and replied therein.

Reception in Baltimore. Our streets were all alive on Saturday afternoon. Our people from town and country, anxious to witness the entrance of the president elect into our city, it having been ascertained that he would certainly come during the afternoon. We are not advised of the ceremonies which took place at the relay house, on the Washington road, where he was met by a escort from this city, but the cavalcade, after passing down Baltimore street, arrived at the city hotel about four o'clock, where he was presented to an immense crowd, in a handsome address, by Charles F. Mayer, esq. Gen. Harrison responded in a very few words, asking to be excused for the present from saying any thing, on account of the fatigue and debility experienced by his travels. After observing that he designed remaining in the city several days, he withdrew amid the cheers of the multitude.

We neglected to mention, in its proper place, that Gen. Harrison was accompanied to the city by the rifle-corps from Elliott's Mills, under the command of Gen. S. W. Taylor, of the Tippecanoe. They turned out in considerable strength, and with their banners made quite a handsome appearance. [Sun.]

On Monday morning, a few minutes after ten o'clock, Gen. Harrison appeared in public, in a room which had been erected for the purpose, in front of the City hotel. And being introduced, in a few brief and appropriate remarks, by J. J. Kennedy, esq. he proceeded to address the vast assemblage, which was present. The general's discourse was long, being congregated in this square, celebrated as it is for its mighty gatherings.

General Harrison spoke for about half an hour.—The veteran and beloved chief in closing his short and retired amidst a round of the most heartfelt applauses.

General Harrison received the visits of the ladies of the city, from one to three o'clock.

On Tuesday morning at nine o'clock, general Harrison departed for Washington. He was accompanied in his journey to the seat of government, where the cares and duties of exalted station are so soon to devolve upon him, by the committee of escort, appointed on behalf of the committee of arrangement.

Washington, Feb. 6. General Harrison arrived among us this forenoon, shortly after eleven o'clock. Notwithstanding the extreme inclemency of the weather—there being a fall of snow and rain—an immense concourse of citizens assembled to meet him on his arrival, at the railroad depot. He was first addressed by the mayor of the city, very briefly; and then it was determined, in consequence of the great pressure of the crowd, and the severity of the exposure, to defer any other ceremonies until his arrival at the City Hall, whether he was escorted by the committee of reception, the Tippecanoe elms, and a large body of citizens. The general looked extremely late and hearty, and as the procession moved along P-maryland avenue, he walked uncovered nearly the whole of the way, repeatedly bowing to the ladies who thronged the windows and balconies. On reaching the City Hall, he was conducted to the aldermen's chamber; and here the mayor and council expressed to him which he was present from delivering at the depot.

General Harrison responded briefly, and in terms highly complimentary to the city, and the District; and declaring, in reference to some remarks of the mayor on the disastrous consequences of the misrule of late years to the interests of our people, that he had the greatest disposition to do his utmost to remedy all the evils under which this District has been suffering. The general then received a large number of felicitations, and expressed his thanks to their respects to him. His arm continued to be considerably affected by the fatigue he has gone through in shaking hands during the last five or six months, and more especially since his departure from home; and he was obliged to receive the mode of salutation. He repaired soon afterwards to his apartments at Galley's hotel, where he will remain during his sojourn. In the course of the afternoon, Messrs. Webster, Crittenden and Ewing, had a private interview with him. Messrs. Clay and Preston, and other distinguished gentlemen, were called to see the general. He dined with the committee of reception, and the gentlemen who escorted him from Baltimore. He left the dinner table very early, and spent the evening in the company of his friends. He will receive the ladies to-morrow. Gen. Harrison has expressed his intention to leave the city for Richmond, on Thursday, unless after

The command at Fort Holmes under captain Smith and lieutenant McKinstry have been operating in the islands at the mouth of the Oklaishah, during which time they subsisted upon a preparation of parched corn and sugar.

P. S.—Since writing the above, glorious news from the everglades has reached us.

Colonel Harte's expedition has resulted in his capture and killing 16 warriors. Major Childs has taken 44 men, women and children. Lieutenant Steptoe has also killed and captured six warriors, making a total of 66.

We are all looking for a speedy termination of the war, the news from the Gulf ports, tending, as it does, towards such a consummation of our wishes.

January 27. Captain Barnum has returned to Fort Russell, the camp of Halleck's tie-tugger was discovered within a few miles of Fort Russell. He got wind of the troops and escaped. Captain B. captured 3 squaws, one child and 3 ponies.

By a passenger in the steamer Isis, capt. Fitcher, we learn that lieut. Col. Clark, of the 8th infantry, had in charge there two soldiers who showed themselves in the vicinity of Fort Dade, and were brought in by the friendly delegation from Arkansas. They are on their way to Tampa.

Information that can be relied on, has been received from Col. Loomis, of the 6th infantry, that a number of Indians were expected to come in, say from 30 to 40, and would proceed to Tampa.

Among them was Licho-Esahtha, the chief of the Tallahassee.

The prospect of the termination of the war, it is thought by some, is rather brighter, whereas by others, the promises of the red men are looked upon as mere humbuggery. [See Savannah Georgian.

THE NAVY.

The exploring expedition. Murder of two of the officers by Cannibals. Letters and papers from the Sandwich Islands to the 24th October have been received at New York. The exploring expedition had arrived there.

The papers contain the particulars of the murder on the 24th of July last of lieut. J. A. Underwood, and midshipman Wilkes Henry, a nephew of captain Wilkes, in a most treacherous manner, by the natives of Matelo, one of the Fiji Islands. Three unfortunate officers having gone ashore with but a few men, were attacked and killed almost instantly, but not until they had shot four of their assailants, who were the very same who a few months before they had been engaged in tracking boats over the reef. The men with them were wounded, but escaped.

The squadron's boats being near, immediately pulled in and commenced firing upon the savages, under cover of which lieut. Alden landed and brought off the bodies, which were entirely stripped. Had not the natives been fully occupied in carrying off their own dead, the bodies would have been taken away and devoured. Captain W. immediately made preparations for leaving their town and fort, which the savages considered impregnable. The seamen were landed and a fire was opened upon them, but without much effect, until a rocket, or "flying spirit," as they called it, set fire to their town, and kindled great consternation. It was finally carried by assault. The natives fought well, and even stood a charge of bayonet, but were finally beaten at all points, seventy or more were killed. The fort and town burnt, their plantations destroyed, and the island laid waste. These islanders have always been noted for their ferocity and treachery, and cannibalism, characteristics which it seems they fully retain.

A letter to the N. Y. Commercial says: "Lieut. Underwood and Wilkes Henry were killed as they were endeavoring to secure the retreat of the men, in which they succeeded, but at the cost of their own lives. They were buried on a small uninhabited island off the coast of the Fiji Islands, named Henry's island, in memory of that gallant and ill-fated young officer. The whole island, on which the massacre took place, was severely punished two days afterwards—when the big and schooner arrived. Nothing was spared but the women and children, and these, I am sorry to say, are by this time slaves to some of the neighboring group."

The letters state that the squadron would not return before Jan 1842.

A chief was captured and taken on board the Vincennes, who seven years since killed ten of the crew of an American vessel.

The Porpoise visited one of the Fijee Islands to protect or take away as the occasion might require, a family of Wesleyan missionaries settled there, whose lives were supposed to be endangered by the savages. They were protected, remaining, having been promised protection by the old king.

STATES OF THE UNION.

NEW YORK.

Census. Of the white population of this state, 1,207,322 are males, and 1,170,958 are females. The colored population, 48,969, of whom 23,729 are males, and 25,236 females. Among the latter there are three slaves, residing in King's county. In 1830 the colored population of the state was 44,032; of whom 78 were slaves. Increase of the colored population in ten years 5,020.

The number of pensioners in the state for revolutionary or military services, is 4,029.

Banks. Legal reform and bank investigations—says the correspondent of the Madisonian—has the standing topics in our house of assembly. It appears that the new free banks resist the operation of the law of last session subjecting them to the supervision of bank commissioners. The Erie county bank at Buffalo having taken the lead in this course, she has been cited to show cause for so doing. This course she has given rise to a rumor unfavorable to its advocacy.

Within the last ten years I believe but three banks have failed under our safety fund system—the Lockport, City bank of Buffalo, and Wayne county. The notes of each was immediately redeemed from the safety fund contributed by all the banks. The Lockport has repaid nearly in full from her assets; the city of Buffalo will make a large hole in the safety fund; the Wayne county probably a small one. The stockholders of course suffer; the billholders do not.

About ten of our free banks have blown up—the Farmers' of Seneca county; the Millers' of Clyde; the Farmers' and Merchants' of Batavia; the Chelona, Wool Growers', and City Trust, our city are all now remember. Their pledged securities, generally, pay about 75 cents on the dollar—perhaps more.

Consolidation. We learn from Harrisburg that, owing to some oversight or remissness on the part of the senate committee to compare bills, the bill, charging the mode of appointing canal commissioners, which had passed both houses, was not laid before governor Potter in time to prevent his reappointing the board on Monday as heretofore.

Governor Cooper, in his inaugural address states that Delaware has never known what a state debt is from any experience of her own. That she has collected but one small state tax since the adoption of her amended constitution, and that she has about a million and a half of dollars, which experience has shown to be sufficient for all the necessary purposes of state banking within her limits. She has a surplus of more than half a million of dollars in her treasury.

VIRGINIA.

Small note bill. The bill authorizing the Virginia bank to issue four dollar notes, on their respective capitals, in one and two dollar notes, until the 1st of August next, has passed a second reading in the house of delegates of that state by a vote of 65 to 50. From the known opinions of the senate, the Richmond Whig anticipates that it will pass in the passage of the bill by that body. The notes thus issued—if issued—are to be redeemable in specie at the mother bank, or any of the branches.

The controversy with New York. We learn from Richmond, that the committee to whom this subject was referred is likely to make a report recommending strong measures on the part of Virginia, unless the legislature shall refuse to sustain Gov. Seward's construction of our rights under the constitution. The point in controversy seems to be, in brief terms, this—Three citizens of New York, (blacks, we believe,) aided the escape of several slaves from Virginia, or, as some say, stole them from their owners. The fugitives were demanded by the governor of Virginia, from the governor of New York, as persons under the law of Virginia. The latter refused to surrender them, on the ground that the commission of felony here would not be good cause for their surrender, unless the same act were pronounced felony by the laws of New York. Mr. Gilmer justified his conduct by strong constitutional argument, in which, it seems to us, he has the better of Governor Seward; but after a long correspondence, things stand as they were at the time of the demand.

[See Rochester Republican.

The New York Journal of Commerce says:
"Virginia, we take it, cares little for the surrender of the alleged fugitives in the present instance, compared with the maintenance of the principle for which she contends. The last is all that matters to her, and to the whole South. She cannot give up, and will not, nor would we, if we were Virginia, believing that it is a right secured to her by the national compact. If we adopt the doctrine of Gov. Seward, and act upon it, the only practicable alternative left to the slaveholding states, will be to adopt such measures in relation to vessels arriving in their harbors, as will effectually prevent the depredations complained of. Already we see it announced that the Virginia legislature has resolved that the sheriffs of the counties lying on the harbors, navigable rivers, &c. of this state, the duty of entering all vessels belonging to the state of New York, or about to depart therefrom, and make diligent search, in order to ascertain whether they carry slaves on board, and to take bonds, with adequate security, that the captain shall take no slave out of the bounds of the state without permission of his master, &c. &c. As to the right of Virginia to pass laws in relation to the constitution, we have no difference of opinion; but in our judgment she has as much as enough right to do it, as we have to steal her slaves, or to offer immunity to those of our citizens who may steal them. If we wish her to adhere to the constitution, we must adhere to it ourselves."

KENTUCKY.

A report, with a resolution sustaining the position of Virginia in her controversy with New York, has been introduced in the senate of Kentucky.

The resolution runs in these words: "Resolved, That the senate of the state of Kentucky, that they have carefully examined the letter of the executive of Virginia, and the preamble and resolutions passed by the legislature of that state, relative to the demand of the executive of Virginia on the executive of New York, for the surrender of three fugitives from justice, to wit: Peter Johnson, Edward Smith and Isaac Gansey—and the reasons assigned by the executive of New York for failing and refusing to comply with the demand, and in the opinion of the legislature of the state of Kentucky, the said reasons of the executive of New York for failing to surrender said fugitives—Peter Johnson, Edward Smith and Isaac Gansey—on the said demand, are wholly insufficient; and that, if the state of New York shall sustain the executive of that state in his conduct in refusing to deliver up said fugitives for trial in the state of Virginia, where the offence was committed, that he will place all the individuals named in imminent jeopardy, and demand from them not only their solemn protest, but render it necessary that they adopt measures for their own safety and preservation against the lawless acts of all slave stealing felons, as well as against the duty of obedience to their rights as constituted states."

Resolved. That the executive of this state cause copies of this report and resolution to be transmitted to the executive of Virginia, with a request that he lay the same before the legislature.

What, then, are the powers and duties of congress in reference to this fund? The first thing that strikes one is, that by the cession of Virginia a fund was created—expressly and officially a fund—to be used in the general charge and expenditure, for the use and benefit of all the states; and then by way of greater caution and more explicit declaration, adds, "and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for the benefit of no other use or purpose whatsoever." It is manifest that Virginia had in view a money transaction—the creation of a fund to be in the hands of congress, to be disposed of for money purposes. While she ceded the jurisdiction of the lands, she enabled congress to discharge moneyed dues, and effect fiscal operations. I contend that this was a trust fund, to be used for the benefit of the United States, on certain conditions, and under restrictions, and that our control over it is limited by the nature of the trust. Here then, we have a fund created—a trust confided—and the objects of both specified, viz: to relieve the states from the burdens imposed by the confederation, and each state was to receive the benefit, according to its usual proportion in those burdens.

We must perform in full faith whatever duty was confided to us. Yet, considering the whole scope of the deed of cession, and not considering only the administration of this trust, we look to regard it exclusively in a money point of view, as mere pounds, shillings and pence. There are other and very high considerations which connect themselves with the subject. We must look to the other side; we act under trusts from Virginia and Connecticut and other ceding states, we also act under other trusts, of a very comprehensive nature, from all the states; and that each of these trusts must be administered in reference to the other. We look to them, and they are not to be inconsistent with it. If, because it is a fiscal trust from Virginia, we feel upon a calculation of mere pounds, shillings and pence, then we immediately run foul of the other trusts which we hold from the whole union. When we look to them, we are faithful to the one, we must be that we are unfaithful to the other; we must keep an eye to the whole, and carry on all our trusts together, as harmoniously with respect to each other as we can. We must destroy the one, or the other, or both, if possible. I am not for looking exclusively to the financial aspect of our powers, but for remembering that, in the discharge of them, there are also political relations which must of necessity be kept. No doubt, the cession of Virginia to the confederation was a political one—the states owning no land, seeing that the vast domain of other states might lead to an undue ascendancy in the confederacy, therefore proposed a cession for the erection of new states.

We a trust created then with a general fund which we are bound to administer in a spirit, at once, of liberality towards the new states, of just economy as regards our treasury, and of mere policy as regards the general good of our union. These new members of the confederacy have been made states much more quickly than ever was anticipated; they are treated as children, and have ever been treated, as favored children. They have grown and thriven with vast and unexpected rapidity; they are filling up with a teeming population, and are fast becoming of themselves a magnificent empire, which stands in the presence of the other states, not so as a child in the presence of its parents, but as one of full growth and proportions, on a far more extensive scale than the old thirteen, and destined at no distant day even to assert superiority over them. But, on the other hand, it should not be forgotten that while we have been so building the trust reposed in us as to promote and foster the well-being of the new states, we hold a trust for all the states of the confederacy, and hold it on the ground that this public domain on which these new states have sprung up is a fund—a common fund for the use of all the states. What was the feeling of Virginia when she made this cession in terms so guarded? She states the purposes for which she makes the cession, and then she adds that it shall be applied to these purposes, and to no other use or purpose whatever. And to show a spirit of caution in which she proceeded, she would not leave it to implication that her own rights were of course to be regarded with the rights of all her sister states, but added the words "Virginia included," thus making assurance doubly sure. There is not on the records of civilized nations a more illustrious instance of long-sighted, wise and devoted patriotism than this very act by the commonwealth of Virginia. She thus dismembered herself of an extent of territory larger than her own limits, and freely gave it to what she considered her benefactor—herself—that she might bestow this magnificent donation upon the union at large. And now, in her advanced age, when her lands were worn out, and instead of being covered with waving harvests of wheat, are covered over with broom-sedge, when her finances are embarrassed, and we may almost say that in her old age she is actually impoverished, is it right, is it becoming, is it honorable, is it grateful to turn round and say to her, you are no longer entitled to any share in the benefit of this your own donation? Were there no other state in the union which might claim a share in the benefit of the proceeds of this public domain, surely it is our duty, it is your duty, it is my duty, to stand up for the rights of the Old Dominion, and to see that she shall retain some portion in that inheritance, which, from her munificence, she has freely bestowed upon us all.

In the administration of the public lands, we are not to oppress and pinch the west, so as to wring out the very last dollar the lands can be made to produce; we are not to be the part of a miserly landlord. We have not acted in this spirit. Never. On the contrary, I aver that we have acted towards these new states the part of a true-hearted and generous man. We have nurtured, and fed, and clothed them, till they are grown to the height and stature of adult strength long before they are of age. From being feeble and helpless and tottering, they have become strong and rich and able. But I require nothing more. No other land would I then in the same spirit still—a just liberal, affectionate and generous. I would foster their growth and improvement, and promptly defend them from Indian aggression; but, at the same time, as a trustee, I would look for some return of profit to the other states of the union.

Now, in the application of these general principles to the amendment which has been proposed by my colleague from South Carolina, in the first place I inquire whether this is a financial scheme at all, and if so, whether it is such an one as will be the relations in which we stand, it is just and proper for us to adopt? I cannot but regard it as it respects the relations in which we have received these lands. I require nothing more. No other land would I then in the same spirit still—a just liberal, affectionate and generous. I would foster their growth and improvement, and promptly defend them from Indian aggression; but, at the same time, as a trustee, I would look for some return of profit to the other states of the union.

What is the consideration reserved in this act of cession? It is an advantage to be secured in other words, it is a proposition to cede 33 per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands to certain selected states. What consideration for 33 per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands to certain selected states? We have been now for fifty years administering this trust. We have never yet sold a single acre of land. In fact, continually opening upon us. There seems something magical about it. It grows on us as we proceed. A portion of the trust estate has been destroyed, yet, just as fast as we have sold and consumed it, it has increased upon our hands. In proportion as we have succeeded in our legislation, a wider horizon has opened. At first, there was a wall of Indians and of foreign territory all around us, but with every rolling year its limits have been rolled back. It is not now bounded by the Miami, nor by the Wabash, nor by the Mississippi; nor, nor by the Rocky mountains. But my honorable friend here (Mr. Linn) invokes the senate to send its war eagle to the mouth of the Columbia river. We have not done with this trust, nor half done with it. We have built up an empire, and yet we are only on the threshold of our possessions. To show how little we have yet made by it in a financial view, let me state that, from the returns as brought up to a very recent period, our expenses have exceeded our gains. We are not yet repaid for the expenses of the trust. We are more than five millions yet in debt. I speak of the whole domain, however derived. The cost and charges of managing this property have been $102,000,000. The income from it has been not quite $95,000,000. Nor is this difference of five millions to be balanced against us. Thus far the sales of the public lands have not reimbursed the expenses of their acquisition and preparation for sale. The following is the official statement of the accounts current of the United States with their

NOTE. The records of this office exhibit no specific appropriations for suppressing Indian hostilities until 1836; prior to that year, the cost of wars with the Indians was paid out of appropriations for the army generally. The expense of Indian hostilities from 1st January, 1836, to 30th September, 1839, amounts to $13,322,568 64.

The second does not include the heavy disbursements for Indian wars, which, swelled by the recent enormous expenses in Florida, may be safely set down at forty per cent. of the sum which he proposes to reserve. And that we shall have squandered not only well Virginia and the other states gave us, but also a large sum of money contributed by the old states in the form of taxes upon their citizens before the war. It is proposed to be benefited by the states. In the most obvious view of the case, we give out of the treasury, to a few favored states, thirty-five per cent. of many millions of dollars collected from the other states. By this operation, Virginia will not only have given her lands, but her money also. She will have transferred her property and paid a sum to those who take it. The quantity of land proposed to be surrendered by this act of cession is, according to the report of the select committee, about fifty million of acres, lying in various portions of the nine selected states. Thirty-five per cent. upon this quantity is upwards of fifty millions of acres, certainly a munificent donation. The average income from these lands is about fifty cents per acre; last twenty years is about five millions of dollars.—Assuming this ratio, the annual grant in money to these nine states is more than a million and a half of dollars. It is equal to the civil list of those states. It is the same as the civil list of those states. It is the distribution of the whole net proceeds of the public lands amongst nine states.

It seems to me that the mode of calculation by which the mover of this amendment brings down the value of the lands is erroneous; and, whatever that value may be, we have no power to cast it away. One thing is certain, that the sales yield an income of five millions, and that, in all human probability, they will continue to do so for the next thirty years. The value of the lands, therefore, is correctly estimated by a very obvious process. The annual receipts should cover the annual interest, and provide a sinking fund for the capital. By this mode of calculation, then, allowing the income from the public lands to be equal at the end of thirty years, the present value in hand would be upwards of fifty millions; and the proportion thus reduced results in a donation, in present, of seventeen millions of dollars to the nine states. The greatest manifest by the report of the select committee is natural. There is a grandeur in this munificence which subdues the imagination, and casts into shade the vast donation of Virginia—differing from that, in that, while Virginia gave to all the states, hers being included, this proposition gives to one-third of the states, containing less than one-sixth of the population.

That the average of the last twenty years is a just, or at least a sufficient, basis of calculation, the proceeds of the public lands for the future, will be apparent from the consideration of the great increase of the population, which furnishes the demand for new lands. The United States now contain 18 millions of inhabitants, at the rate of increase of about 700,000 a year. The demand for new settlements will increase in a corresponding ratio with the population. It may be safely put down as increasing at the rate of four per cent. Experience, however, has shown that the rate of increase will not diminish, as the land has been picked and culled; but, on the contrary, those lands which have been longest in market are most freely sold, in proportion to the quantity in market. Thus, lands are rapidly taken up in Ohio, in Indiana, and in Kentucky for the obvious reason that a dense population makes inferior land more valuable in the midst of it, than more fertile districts in an uninhabited country.—There is but a million of acres of United States land now remaining unsold in Ohio, and even this is diminishing with an accelerated ratio. It therefore may be well assumed that from this source the U. States may enjoy a revenue of five millions, until very much the largest portion of the domain within the limits of the states is disposed of. In the period Florida, Iowa and Wisconsin will have brought their contributions to the general fund, and extended the period of this income to future generations. Reasoning upon this basis, it is to be seen, in thirty years from this time the demand for the public lands will be in proportion to a population increasing at the rate of two millions a year.

But there are other serious objections to this amendment, and I have the intention of stating from every quarter of the union to that which I am now about to state. The proposed mode of disposing of the public lands is altogether and to an enormous extent unequal in its operation. What I insist is, that there shall be at any time a perfect equality; that there shall not be discrimination and bounty in favor of one state and against another; but here there is a degree of inequality which, were there no other objections, would be sufficient to render my decision disqualifying me to decide on the public domain to each of the states respectively within whose territorial limits they lie. It is given to the states, not to individuals. It is given to them, not as being all the states, but as being part only of the states of the union. Should it be conceded to the states, it would be a violation of the original cession and of the constitution, as the advocates of this measure contend. It is to be ceded to the states, not in proportion to their contributions to the public burdens, or in proportion to the size or population, but simply as states. And what will be the result, as between one of the states and another?

Ohio exceeds Missouri in population four to one; and how does this amendment propose to distribute the public lands between these two states? The share of Missouri is to be the share of Ohio as more than twenty-eight to one, making the population of Ohio to be more than twenty-eight times as great as that of Missouri, and more than one hundred to one. Can Ohio stand by and see the public domain given away in this proportion? Nor is this all; for the one million of acres which Ohio gets is of lands which have been in the hands of the public for forty years, and has been picked and culled during all that time, while the thirty millions which are given to Missouri consist of fresh and fertile lands but recently surveyed.—Now let me ask, what will Virginia get? She contains the same number of acres as Ohio, and is in Missouri. Missouri is to get 25 per cent. of the thirty millions. How much does Virginia get? Nothing. This is not thirty millions to one; it is thirty millions to nothing. Besides, Ohio has now passed her chrysalis condition; she has now become one of the old states of the union. A million of acres is nothing to her. But this amendment gives her her dividend but of one million of old and refuse land, while it gives Missouri her dividend of thirty millions of new and of the very best quality of land.

Let us now look a little at the operation of this scheme in its details. I have here the report of the learned committee on public lands, made at the last session of Congress, and which contains the lands of the various states. Ohio, it appears, contains one million of acres of second, third and fourth rate lands, while Arkansas has forty-three millions of acres.

MR. SWAN, across—Yes, and it is rich! Yes, Arkansas is rich; and this is one of the schemes to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer. Arkansas has forty-three times as much of the public land as Ohio; at the same time Ohio has a million and half of inhabitants, while Arkansas has one hundred thousand. Thus, one hundred thousand people are to be benefited at the rate of forty-three millions of acres of land—rich land, as the senator tells us—while a million and a half of people in another state are benefited at the rate of one million of refuse land. Arkansas is to get two hundred and fifteen acres for each inhabitant, and Ohio one-third of one acre; being a difference of six hundred and forty-five in favor of Arkansas. Each acre in Arkansas is to be sold at the rate of one hundred and forty-five times as much as each inhabitant of Ohio. And so of the rest. Michigan has thirty-one millions of acres to Ohio's one million. Yet she has less than one hundred thousand inhabitants. The enormous disproportion of the land to the population that the avails of the public domain were to be shared among the states according to their several portions of the general charge and expenditure. Yet, here an inhabitant of Arkansas is to have one hundred and forty-five times as much of the public land as an inhabitant of Ohio; or, if you regard the two as states, one gets forty-three times as much as the other.

But it does not stop here. New states of the union are selected as beneficiaries: are they, then, to be confined to the avails of the land they receive? Not at all: after receiving that, they are then to come in and be common sharers with the rest of the states. We are to give them all their own lands, and a portion in our besides! Virginia is to get one-twenty-sixth part of one-half of these lands, and Arkansas, after having got her own thirty-one millions, is to share this one-twenty-sixth part with Virginia. I feel the difficulty of this land being given away, it will be at some rate more reasonable than this. The entire quantity of lands remaining unsold within the states enumerated in the senator's amendment is 184,000,000 acres; one-half of this will be 92,000,000 acres; one-third is 61,333,333. And the bill gives these 50,000,000 to nine states, the other states to get no portion of it.

I could run up this illustration yet farther; but I refrain. Ex pede, Herculem. These are sufficient. These are the striking views, but there are other considerations which weigh most heavily upon my mind, and which I should be most glad to see removed if this amendment is to be adopted, and is ever to become a law. In arguing this whole question, I feel the difficulty of my situation as argued against the wishes and expectations of those who are to receive the benefit. The nine states who are to get this magnificent domain have eighteen senators amongst those whom I am addressing, who have the right to direct the course of the legislation of the amendment than any of the rest of us. This, of itself, presents a powerful motive to secure their support to the measure; and this fact alone ought to make us pause before we hastily adopt the plan. The benefit to be granted is not common to us all, but peculiar to them—it is exclusive to us. They are to be benefited: we are to be injured.

In alluding to the strength of the motive here presented as likely to band together eighteen senators in support of this scheme, I mean to make no personal or offensive reference to those senators: it is a motive likely to act on all men placed in their circumstances, and seducing all equally, and very properly, to benefit their constituents; and, under the pressure of that desire, with such an opportunity for its gratification, the understanding even of the strongest is very likely to be warped in its conclusions, and to be drawn to the measure as the measure is perfectly just and proper. We must entreat gentlemen so situated, as I do now entreat them, to raise their views from the immediate interest of their constituents in such a cession as is now proposed to a just and enlarged view of the trust which has been confided to them for the benefit of the entire union. As it right—it is just—it is generous—to find their own peculiar interest in our loss and sacrifice; I throw myself upon them, that they will consider this subject on an enlarged point of view. Especially do I wish Ohio to do this, who is passing out of her state of minority and becoming of ripe age. Will Ohio consent thus to squander our common patrimony? I put it to Indiana, who is passing out of her state of minority. In this union; and I ask her whether to promote a transient interest to day she will be willing to sacrifice the permanent and abiding interest of to-morrow. Will she not will herself to the delusion that it is just to depend on the state of inheritance they have received from our ancestors?

The amendment will produce a state of things I earnestly deprecate. In the administration of this domain something is due to our past experience. We all remember the large sums of money which were once accumulated under the credit system of sale of the public lands; you remember that the debtors declared that they could not pay, and would not. The very same spirit which would induce them to take the land without a legal right prompts them to stand out for the money they ought to pay for it. Circumstances made it difficult, perhaps impossible, for them to pay; and I will recollect the terror with which the politicians of that day looked to the results of such a state of things. I remember with what anxiety, not to say terror, Mr. Monroe contemplated a debt of nineteen millions owed by one section of the union. Congress looked with dismay at the matter, and the debt was paid by Mr. Monroe, and in contemplation of the mischievous effects arising from the credit system, in relation to the public lands, you determined to alter your terms of sale; and it was wisely decided to sell to individuals, and not to the states. The debt, due from individuals, be an evil of so dangerous a character as to excite their terrors, how fearful will it become when this debt, instead of being dispersed among a number of individual settlers, is consolidated into one debt, and that one debt, which has already, from time to time, made claim to an indefeasible title in all this land! Can you collect it? You cannot drive your debtors from the land. Will you call out the force of the country—and send your army—sell the land under them, and the possession of it for the United States? It cannot be done. To individuals, in such a case, you can afford to yield, and make a compromise; but how will you stand when you have made states your debtors? The amendment will place the power of debtor and creditor between this government and entire states—with neighboring, with contiguous states—with a mass of states, all having on common territory in the question, one common character, and one common debt. It will place one debtor like this to collect your debt by any process. The thought is idle. I estimate the honor and fidelity of the states as much as any man; but what have we heard for the last few years, from the other side of the Atlantic, but with denunciations of state extravagance—state prodigery—and the dear, blessed people to be taxed to pay state debts! Suppose there comes a short crop, or an Indian war, or any other of the kind of contingencies, would it not be urged as an excuse for the state to suspend its payments? And would you venture, under such circumstances, to call upon them for your money? You dare not. Gentlemen have told you, in one breath, that you cannot produce your lands from the squatters either by your title, or by your sale; and in the next breath they tell you you can force whole states to comply with their contracts by the power of the judiciary! Your army cannot remove a hand from the land, and yet you are going to drive the states by your title, or by your sale, to turn off a poor squatter, who has no sort of title, or evidence or pretence of title; and yet you are, by the most obligatory provisions of this bill, to oust a citizen of his land, having a title from the state in his pocket, and the whole state who stands between him and you! If a state shall declare that they will not pay you, do you expect that individuals of that state will? God forbid I should ever see the day when this comes to be tried, or that I should contribute to the possibility of superintending it. You place the power between two fires. The state is to hold him to hold his land; the general government orders him to give it up. He is to be hung by the state if he disobeys the state government; and if he obeys the state, then he is to be hung by the general government. You are to force your country into a predicament; the judiciary is utterly incapable of it. The remedy which the amendment provides for the case is utterly inefficient. It is, that, if the states refuse to pay, then the deeds made by the states to individuals shall be voidable. But why? I have said, with no deed at all, the settlers have stood out against you, and you have been forced to yield, over and over again; think you that, with a state deed to show, and the state authority to support them, they are going to march off their farms at the bidding of your marshal? He would be a bold man who would carry a process there. I say, then, that there is great danger in your establishing the pecuniary relation of debtor and creditor with the states. If they cannot pay, they will not pay. They will resist in masses. They have eighteen senators on this floor; and it is already their boast that in ten years from this time they will hold the balance of power, and then they will be able to govern their own territory. The remedy proposed by the amendment is altogether fallacious. It proposes to divert a vested right, and to drive a man from lands that he has bought and paid for.

Something of the same kind is to be done by congress, (and the measure, I admit, was supported by myself, among others,) by which the states became debtors to this government for a distribution of the surplus in the treasury. And what has become of your debt? Who takes for it? I have said more such a demand? Have we not, in the very face of this debt of twenty six millions due from the states, borrowed money to supply the wants of the government from day to day? The secretary of the treasury tells us that twenty six millions of the treasury notes with the states, and in the same breath asks for an issue of five millions of treasury notes; if they will not pay it, and we dare not ask them for it, I would not wonder if you were to grow into a debt. Some difficulty will occur concerning it, and you will forgive them all. Let us not, then, take the first step—let us not make debtors of states too powerful for your management. A contest will arise, and if they are too strong for you, they will be subjected to them; and if you are too strong for them, it will be yet worse, for they must be subjected to you.

On these grounds I am opposed to the scheme of the senator for a cession of the public lands. I trust I shall always be ready to promote the interest of the new states; but I am not willing to see such an inequality of division among them as that one man shall receive 625 acres of this domain, while another man gets but one acre. I cannot consent to establish the relation of debtor and creditor with the states, and so lose all.

There is one other objection to the measure, to which I shall barely allude. I am strongly impressed with the idea that, while the Old Dominion, pressed with the cession of her territory, wisely and cautiously provided that the benefit should be ratably divided among all the states, (and therefore among the western states,) she has not yet taken the same point of view, in which that cession is to be regarded as as a financial transaction. In regard to the proposition for a distribution of the proceeds, commonly known as the land bill of the distinguished gentleman to my right, (Mr. Crittenden,) I occupied a peculiar position. I was the undersecretary of the treasury, I have been against it; but, in connection with the surplus revenue, it was for it. I was for a distribution of the surplus revenue accumulated in the treasury, and of the proceeds of it. We distributed both the land revenue and that from the customs. We have now the subject of the tariff opened again, or soon to be opened. All questions before us in regard to the tariff are complicated with the financial system of the United States. If I had the control of matters, I would set down five millions as the income from the public domain, and I would then have a moving scale of duties in proportion to the wants of the government. But this is scarcely likely to be done. The tariff, I suppose, will be fixed, and not moveable, with a view to give permanence to our great interests. That they will, to a certain extent, be permanent, no man, I think, can doubt. How the proceeds of the tariff are to be applied is a different question. I think they should be adjusted contemporaneously with the tariff, or else suspended till the tariff is settled.

I cannot but regard the proceeds of the sales of the public lands as a portion, and a very important portion, of the public revenue at all times, but more especially now, when there is a public debt actually existing, and a proposition before congress to increase it. One of the peculiar purposes to which the old congress appropriated the income of the public lands was the payment of the national debt. We have, at this moment, an acknowledged debt of nearly five millions. The secretary of the treasury demands an increase of five millions to meet pressing emergencies; and no one doubts that, in deferred payments, in existing charges, in unsettled balances and unadjusted claims, there are five millions more. Thus, if the proceeds of the sales of the lands there will be a national debt of fifteen millions.—This is no time to give away any portion of our income, neither to all the states nor to a portion of them—neither to twenty-six states nor to nine. If these proceeds are to be abstracted from the general treasury, it were manifestly best that they should be disposed of to the states generally. That would be an approximation to justice and equity; but the highest justice and equity—the most honest and obvious justice—would be to apply these funds to the payment of the national debt.

The proposition of the senator from Missouri, to appropriate these proceeds to the navy and the public expenditure, is conceived in so high a spirit, and is so well calculated to enlist our sympathies and excite the imagination. I heartily concur with him in his estimate of the propriety of doing something for the navy. That important branch of the public expenditure has been too much neglected. It merits, at all times, the highest consideration. In this condition excites our most anxious attention. Its glory and its usefulness cannot be too highly estimated, and I fear it has fallen into great disrepute. It must be inviolably inviolable. Its glorious condition has been superseded, but it is due to our most precious recollections—to our highest interests—to all that pride and patriotism can enforce—that it continue no longer. That admission which has been built up the navy, requires its energies, and revive and stimulate its waning spirit, will deserve the eternal gratitude of the country. As far as the public purse can contribute to this, I would not circumscribe our appropriations. I would not limit it to any one thing amongst us which may be called national, it is the navy. I would not limit it to any sum, however ample. Its only limitation should be, the capacity of our commercial marine to man it, and up to that point we should be inviolable. We are engaged in commerce in the four quarters of the world, equipped and inspired to protect it and our honor against all opponents.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—24 SESSION.

SENATE.
February 1. The vice president laid before the senate, a communication from the war department, containing an abstract of the general return of the militia of the United States.

Also several memorials from the legislature of the territory of Iowa asking grants of land for various purposes.

Mr. Mangum presented the resolutions of the legislature of North Carolina, in favor of the distribution of the public lands among the several states and territories.

Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, presented the resolutions of that state to the same effect.

Messrs. Bayard and Clayton successively addressed the senate expressive of their approbation of the doctrine of the resolutions.

The resolutions were read, ordered to lay on the table, and were then printed.

Mr. Sturgeon presented the resolutions of the legislature of Pennsylvania in favor of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

Mr. S. took occasion to observe that, so far as the general tenor of the resolutions were they were sustained by his vote. Although he was not disposed to yield implicit obedience to the doctrine of instruction in all cases, yet these resolutions having passed the legislature of his state, he regarded them as the expression of the sense of the measure, and should cast his vote accordingly.

The resolutions were read, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Norvell presented resolutions from the legislature of Michigan asking that a bill might be passed for the completion of all the lakas harbors commenced by government.

Mr. Austin presented resolutions from the legislature of Iowa, in favor of the enactment of a law for the completion of the canal from the mouth of the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico, which were referred for the completion of all the lakas harbors commenced by government.

Mr. Wright presented similar memorials from citizens of the state of New York.

Mr. King reported a bill to authorize a survey to ascertain the practicability of re-opening the communication between Albemarle sound and the Atlantic ocean with an amendment.

He also asked that the committee on commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial in relation to the erection of a new custom house at Philadelphia; the committee being of opinion that in the present condition of commerce it was inexpedient to increase the expenditures of government.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the memorial of the citizens relating to the permanent and prospective pre-emption system, when Mr. Young rose and delivered his views in support of his amendment, which was to adopt the principle of cession.

Mr. Fulton followed, and spoke at length, chiefly against the distribution, and in favor of pre-emption.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the senate adjourned. February 2. The vice president laid before the senate resolutions from a meeting of citizens of Calhoun county, Florida, asking for admission into the union.

Mr. Hubbard from the committee of claims asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial from the legislature of Georgia, asking re-muneration for depredations committed by the Creek Indians.

Mr. Fulton reported a bill to authorize the selection of school lands in lieu of those granted to the half breeds of the Sac and Fox Indians.

The permanent prospective pre-emption bill being under discussion, Messrs. Hubbard, Calhoun, Webster, Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Pierce, Henderson, and others successively addressed the senate.

Mr. Rives having concluded, Messrs. Roane, Porter and Crittenden, made a few remarks, each when the question was taken on the motion of Mr. Young to strike out all of Mr. Crittenden's amendments, and insert in their stead the principle of Mr. Calhoun's bill to cede the public lands, with the addition that the 63 per cent. allotted should be assigned for the increase of the army and the national defence, and was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bates, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Gresham, Henderson, Kerr, Knibb, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Preston, Rives, Rogers, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, White, Whittier, Young—39.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Crittenden, to recommit the bill with such instructions as would embody the two principles of pre-emption and distribution, and was decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Virginia, Clayton, Crittenden, Hubbard, Leno, Lumpkin, Morton, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Whittier, Young—31.

The question then recurring on the passage of the bill, it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Henderson, Hubbard, Knibb, Leno, Lumpkin, Mangum, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Wall, Webster, White, Whittier, Young—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Gresham, Henderson, Kerr, Knibb, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Preston, Rives, Roane, Rogers, Southard—19.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. Sevier moved to strike out from the title of the bill the words "and raise a log cabin there." Mr. White was glad the senator had moved in this matter, he had voted for the bill in good faith, and thought no title should go forth which implied a sarcasm on the part of the senator.

The question of Mr. Sevier's motion was taken, and carried by an overwhelming vote.

Mr. Crittenden moved to take up the bankrupt bill, with a view to have it made the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. Sevier was anxious to take it up and all out the discussion.

Mr. Calhoun moved that the senate adjourn.

At the request of Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Calhoun withdrew his motion for adjournment, when the latter assigned his reasons for desiring to postpone the further consideration of the bill till the next session.

Mr. Buchanan having concluded, on motion of Mr. Calhoun the senate adjourned.

February 3. The vice president laid before the senate a message from the president of the United States relative to the ratification of the boundary line between the state of Michigan and the territory of Wisconsin.

Mr. Buchanan presented eleven memorials from the saddlers and harness makers of Philadelphia, asking an increase of duties on certain articles of saddlery and harness.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, reported a bill to change one term of the circuit and district courts of Ohio, from Columbus to Cincinnati, which was laid over until to-morrow.

Mr. Wall reported a bill to amend the judicial system of the United States.

Twenty-five hundred copies of Plitt's reports upon the management of the post office department in foreign countries were ordered to be printed, without the accompanying documents.

Mr. Merrick moved to take up the joint resolution for the transfer of the stock of the U. States in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to the state of Maryland; but the motion failed.

On motion of Mr. Crittenden the senate agreed to take up the bankrupt bill; but as it was late, it was, on motion of Mr. King informally passed over, to enable the senate to go into executive business.

After being engaged some time therein, the senate adjourned.

February 4. The vice president presented a communication from the secretary of the treasury in reply to a resolution of the senate requiring a plan of home valuation on goods imported, instead of valuation in foreign countries, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Allen, of Ohio, and Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, presented memorials in favor of a general bankrupt law.

Mr. Williams, from the committee on naval affairs, reported a joint resolution on the subject of American rotted hemp—which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Merrick reported the bill to amend and continue in force the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington with an amendment, which was ordered to be printed.

The bill establishing a general bankrupt system was taken up, when amendments were proposed which led to debate, which continued to a late hour, and without coming to any decision, the senate adjourned.

February 5. The vice president submitted a report from the secretary of war, containing the accounts and disbursements among the Indians for the year ending September, 1840.

Also, a report from the same officer relative to the Potomac aqueduct.

Mr. Walker submitted a resolution which was adopted, inquiring into the expediency of building a steam grigate.

Mr. Walker, also submitted a resolution, which was agreed to, requesting the president to communicate any correspondence he may have had with any foreign government relative to the negroes taken on board the L'Amiral.

Mr. Wall submitted a resolution, which was agreed to, requiring the secretary of the navy to furnish a copy of the reports made by the navy officers repealing fire arms, in October and December, by a board of navy officers appointed to examine the same. As also the report made by a board of army officers on the repealing fire arms of Ninig.

The greater part of the day was occupied in discussing the resolution for surrendering to the state of Maryland the interest of the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal stock; which was very zealously and earnestly supported by Mr. Merrick, and amended on the motion and upon the argument of Mr. Huntington, by inserting a proviso requiring the assent of the cities of the District in reference to their residuary interest in the stock. Thus amended, the resolution, in the following form, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by a large majority:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the secretary of the treasury be and he is hereby directed, and directed, if he shall receive satisfactory proof within five years that the Chesapeake and Ohio canal is completed to the town of Cincinnati and that the state of Maryland has provided by law or otherwise that the United States shall at all times hereafter have the right to transport upon the said canal, through its whole length, all such troops, munitions of war, and military stores as the public interest and convenience may require to be transported on the same free of all charge, and that the rate of tolls shall forever hereafter be equal throughout the whole length of the said canal, and that the stock of Maryland in due form of all the stock in the said Chesapeake and Ohio canal subscribed by and standing in the name of the United States; and also to assign and transfer all the interest, right title and claim of the United States in and to the stock in the said canal, standing in the names and originally subscribed by the respective cities of Washington, Georgetown and Columbia, and have been conditionally transferred by them to the United States, subject to all the rights of said cities, and each of them, contained in, and recited in the act entitled "an act for the relief of the several corporate cities of the District of Columbia," approved May 20, 1836.

Provided, however, That the assent of each of said cities to this transfer shall first be given, in due and legal form, under the corporate seal of the said cities respectively, to a certificate thereof, to be delivered to the secretary of the treasury, the consent of the cities aforesaid being only required for the transfer of the stock respectively; and the want of the consent of any one of said cities shall not defeat or delay the operation of this resolution for all other purposes.

And provided also, That the said state of Maryland shall provide for the payment out of the corporate funds and treasury of the said state, of all the outstanding debts and legal liabilities of said Chesapeake and Ohio canal company.

The resolution has yet to pass its third reading.

February 5. The vice president laid before the senate a report from the treasury department, showing a statement of the contracts entered into by the department for the year 1840.

By Mr. Norrell, from citizens of Michigan, in favor of a bankrupt law.

By Mr. Preston, from persons engaged on the public buildings, asking compensation for the time they were engaged on the same.

By Mr. White, from citizens of Laporte, Indiana, asking the passage of a bankrupt law.

By Mr. Wall, from women of Pennsylvania, asking an alteration of the law of the United States in relation to slaves. [Motion to receive ordered to lie on the table.]

Also, from Samuel Raab, asking the government to purchase the right of his "double self-acting safety valve," and that a law be passed requiring its use.

By Mr. Young, from the general assembly of Illinois, asking an appropriation for the construction of a marine hospital at the city of Cairo, in that state.

By Mr. Ruggles, from a number of fishermen and others engaged in the cod fishery, remonstrating against the repeal of the fishing bounties and allowances.

By Mr. Sturgeon, from citizens of Philadelphia, asking that a light house may be erected on Brandywine shoals.

By Mr. Wright from the chamber of commerce of New York, proposing certain provisions to be incorporated in the bankrupt bill.

By Mr. Webster, from citizens of Oneida county, New York, praying that the Seneca Indians who have not given their assent to the treaty between that tribe and the United States may not be compelled to emigrate from the lands they now occupy.

By Mr. Hubbard, from the legislative council of Wisconsin, asking a law to define the western boundary line of Wisconsin, so that the centre of the Mississippi may constitute that boundary.

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Alabama, Resolved, That the committee on public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of attaching the Cherokee territory lying in Alabama to the Coast land office, and the removal of the land office to some point within the territory so attached.

Mr. Liss submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of procuring a sufficient number of the most approved repealing fire arms to supply the troops operating against the Indians in Florida.

On the report of Mr. Smith, of Indiana, the bill to alter the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States was considered in committee of the whole.

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of procuring a sufficient number of the most approved repealing fire arms to supply the troops operating against the Indians in Florida.

On the report of Mr. Smith, of Indiana, the bill to alter the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States was considered in committee of the whole.

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of procuring a sufficient number of the most approved repealing fire arms to supply the troops operating against the Indians in Florida.

and second time and referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Merrick made an unsuccessful motion to have the bills for rechartering the District banks taken up. The following is the vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Dixon, Graham, Mangum, Merrick, Phillips, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Ind. Southard, Webster, White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Crittenden, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mason, Nicholas, Norrell, Pierce, Porter, Roane, Robinson, Smith, of Conn., Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—27.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the special order, being the bankrupt bill. The question being, "Shall the motion to reconsider the bill to the committee on the judiciary, with instructions to incorporate in it the following provision, viz:

First. Proper and suitable provisions to embrace all banks and all other trading incorporations in its prospective operation.

Second. Proper and suitable provisions to give the creditors of every bankrupt an opportunity to choose the assignee of the estate, and only authorizing the judge to appoint when the creditors omit to do so.

Third. Proper and suitable provisions to secure to every bankrupt, when the commission of bankruptcy issues upon the application of creditors, a right to appoint an assignee, who shall be chosen by a majority in number and interest of his creditors, to supersede the commission, and to give authority to the judge to grant the application.

Fourth. Proper and suitable provisions to authorize the judge, or court, in bankruptcy, in case any bankrupt shall, pending the proceedings, offer a composition to his creditors which shall be accepted by three-fourths in amount of them, to compel the acceptance of the composition by the remaining fourth in amount of the creditors, or rather to accept it for them, and discharge him.

Fifth. To strike out from the bill all provisions which secure preferences to any class of creditors in any state, which are not equally preferred by the laws of all the states and all voluntary preferences by the bankrupt in all cases.

Sixth. Proper and suitable provisions to punish, as felony, any intentional concealment, or withholding of any part of the assets from his assignees by any bankrupt, or the converting at any fictitious claims against his estate.

After a few remarks from Messrs. Hubbard, Crittenden and Wright, the question was then taken on the motion to reconsider; which motion was lost as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Wright, Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Mason, Nicholas, Norrell, Norrell, Pierce, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Talmadge, Walker in W. bates, White, Williams, Young—30.

Mr. Hubbard then moved to amend the bill by inserting the provisions above referred to, and desired to record his name singly on each of the provisions.

The question a long and animated debate ensued, which lasted till 4 o'clock—Messrs. Clay, of Ala. Sevier, Wright, Calhoun, Hubbard and others participating.

On motion of Mr. Tappan, the senate adjourned.

February 6. The vice president laid before the senate a communication from the president of the United States, containing a report of the commissioners for exploring the northeastern boundary, in addition to what had been before communicated.

Also, from the treasury department, in compliance with a resolution of the senate, showing the quantity of public lands ceded to each of the states for certain specified purposes.

Mr. Norrell, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing "an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," which was read on the 24th of September 1789, was considered in committee of the whole and ordered to be engrossed.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the special order, being the bankrupt bill, when Henderson rose and delivered his views at length.

Mr. Walker followed, and the debate was further continued between Messrs. Calhoun, Walker and Clay, of Alabama, when Mr. Sevier said that the discussion of this bill had already taken up a great deal of time, and, so far as he could see, without any prospect of bringing it to an end; he would therefore move to lay it on the table.

Mr. Benson then moved that the senate adjourn; which motion was carried.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, Feb. 1. Mr. Hines Holt, of Georgia, elected in the place of Judge Colquit resigned, appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

The speaker presided at the close of Mr. Sherrod Williams, for short mileage charged by him during former sessions, and observed, that, as during a part of the time charged, the chair was occupied by another, he did not feel himself authorized to issue his warrant.

Mr. Wise moved that it be referred to the speaker. It was, however, after debate laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Jones, the house went into committee of the whole on the treasury note bill. Mr. Vanderpool addressed the committee until past 4 o'clock, when Mr. Triplett obtained the floor, and the committee rose.

Mr. Fillmore moved a resolution to take the treasury note bill out of committee, which was received.

After attending to various private bills, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 2. Mr. Sergeant, of Penn. asked leave to present a resolution of the legislature of that state, instructing their senators, and requesting their representatives in congress to vote against all attempts to deprive the people of their just portion of the public lands, and further to advocate the passage of a law to distribute the proceeds of the sale of lands among the several states and territories, which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Lincoln moved a resolution, which was adopted, directing the further printing of the report of the commissioner of the land office, together with the accompanying maps, as also the further coloring of the latter.

Mr. Fillmore then modified his resolution, extending the time of the consideration of the treasury note bill in committee, till the 3d day of February inst. at 3 o'clock P. M. which resolution, thus modified was assented to.

On motion of Mr. Jones, the house went into committee of the whole, and took up the treasury note bill, on which Mr. Triplett was entitled to the floor.

Mr. T. gave way for a moment; and Mr. Curtis, of N. Y. gave notice of an amendment which he should move, when in order, which was read, and is as follows:

And be it enacted, That whenever proof shall be exhibited to the satisfaction of the secretary of the treasury of the loss or destruction of any treasury note issued under the authority of any act of congress, it shall be lawful for the secretary, upon receiving bond, with sufficient security to indemnify the United States against any other claim on account of the treasury note alleged to be so lost or destroyed, to pay the amount due on such note to the person who had lost it, or in whose possession it had been destroyed."

Mr. Triplett spoke at length on the financial condition of the country, and in reply to previous arguments. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. Vanderpool), had taken the cry of a national debt, had raised by the white party, to justify a called session of congress. Mr. T. denied that there was any whig member of this or the other house, who desired an extra session, unless driven to it. A called session was not a secret, and there might be others still greater. It is now absolutely necessary for this government to restore our national honor—to protect our national faith—by paying our national debt. He asked gentlemen of the opposition to lend him the aid of their votes. The honorable gentleman, the head of the committee of ways and means, was sincere in the expression of hope, that the whigs would not be pushed into the necessity of a called session of congress. He asked attention, and he would not be deceived by which this necessity might be obviated; he would shew, conclusively, that, unless the gentleman and his party interpose to this house, the necessity of a called session would be rendered inevitable. What is the state of our treasury? This is the first matter that naturally attracts the attention of a president, when he takes on him the administration of government.

The secretary of the treasury had said, that on the 1st January, 1841, there would be a surplus of $1,580,000, in the treasury—it was a mere estimate. Let us ascertain whether it would turn out so. The 1st January had now past, and for what are we now in committee? Is it not to devise a means and mode of paying the debt of our treasury? He then went into an examination of the present state of the treasury, and estimated that there would be a debt of eighteen or twenty millions dollars, which the next administration will have to pay.

He was a tariff man to some extent, but justice required, that it should be levied for revenue, on these articles where it would be least felt. When he concluded,

Mr. Coles, of Va. took the floor—Mr. C. very reluctantly entered into this debate. He had heretofore voted with a silent vote. His views were now on the eve of a great change in the policy of the country—questions which have not been decided by the people, and of vital consequence to their interests, and those of his constituents.

He then entered into an examination of the trade of the United States and France, in cotton, tobacco, &c. opposing the tax on wines and silks, and supporting the bill.

He was followed by Mr. Black, of Georgia—Mr. B. dwelt at length on the various topics connected with the bill, he opposed the taxing of wines and silks, and could not but look on it as a direct attack on France. He supported the bill. When he concluded,

Mr. M. Waller gained the floor, but gave way to a motion that the committee rise, the vote on which being taken, there appeared no quorum, when the committee rose and reported that fact to the house. Mr. Afford moved that the house again resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Pending which, a motion was made by Mr. Adams, that the house adjourn. The vote on which was taken by yeas and nays at the call of Mr. Lee, and the house adjourned. Yeas 57, nays 26. And then the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 3. On motion of Mr. Cushing, the house proceeded to the consideration of the resolution from the senate relative to counting the votes of president and vice president, which being adopted, Messrs. Cushing and Jones were appointed the committee on the part of the house.

Mr. Stearns moved to reconsider the vote taken yesterday on the resolution offered by Mr. Fillmore, relating the committee of the whole from the further consideration of the treasury note bill, after today.

Mr. Wise hoped the vote would be reconsidered with a view of allowing him an opportunity of offering the following amendment:

That the treasury notes outstanding and unredeemed issued under former laws of congress added to the amount of such notes issued under this act, and actually expended or issued to meet payments on the 1st day of March next, before the 1st day of March next, shall, on the 4th day of March next, exceed the sum of five millions of dollars, then the president of the United States shall, and he is hereby authorized to issue, by virtue of the provisions of this act, such further amount of the said notes as will make the whole amount issued under this act, and applicable to payments falling due on the 1st day of March next, the full sum of five millions of dollars.

Mr. Peck hoped that the vote would not be reconsidered on the ground that the coming administration will not have authority to issue paper money. The day for them had gone by. He inquired if a majority could reconsider this vote.

The speaker said they could.

After some further conversation by Messrs. Lewis Weston and Charles Johnston, the previous question was called by Mr. Waterson and sustained.

The main question was then taken by yeas and nays at the call of Mr. Wise, and the motion carried—yeas 96, nays 53. So the house reconsidered.

Mr. Wise then moved to amend the resolution of the gentleman from New York (Mr. Fillmore), providing that after 3 o'clock, P. M. to-day, (3d Feb.) the debate on this bill shall cease, and the committee be authorized to vote on the various amendments submitted, and to be submitted, and report this bill, with the amendments agreed to by the committee, to the house.

After some remarks by Messrs. Cushing, Wise, Brainerd, and Davis, the previous question was called by Mr. Turney.

Mr. Everett moved to lay the resolution on the table, and on that motion called the yeas and nays.

The speaker inquired whether it was in order for him to withdraw his resolution.

The speaker said it was.

Mr. Fillmore then withdrew the resolution. He was satisfied it would cause much debate.

Mr. Wise said he would renew his amendment, and the yeas and nays were taken.

The speaker said it would be necessary for its reception to suspend the rules.

Mr. Morgan moved that the house now resolve itself into committee of the whole. Which motion was carried by yeas and nays at the call of Mr. Stearns, and carried, yeas 92, nays 61.

Mr. Wise rose to a point of order. He asked whether it was in order to withdraw this resolution, which had yesterday been adopted, by a most decisive vote—of two-thirds, and asked if that was the speaker's decision.

The speaker said it was, and it was now too late to raise the point of order—as the resolution had been withdrawn. Mr. Wise then said, he felt compelled to appeal from the speaker's decision.

The speaker said it was now too late to appeal, as a motion had already been made to go into committee.

Mr. Wise then gave notice of his appeal, when it should be in order.

The house then resolved itself into a committee and resumed the consideration of the treasury note bill.

Messrs. Waller, Brackenridge, Monroe and Afford respectively addressed the chair. When the latter had concluded,

Mr. Shepard obtained the floor, and moved that the committee rise, which was carried.

The house then, on motion of Mr. Briggs, adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 4. Mr. Frelson, of S. Carolina, on the point of order, asked Mr. Cushing, of Mass. and Mr. Jones, of Va. on the part of the house of representatives, have been appointed tellers to count and make lists of the votes of the electors of president and vice president of the United States, which are, under the act of the union, and are to be opened and counted, in the house of representatives, on Wednesday next, the 10th of February, inst.

The house, in further execution of the special order of the day, resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill to authorize the issue of five millions of dollars in treasury notes. Mr. Cusey, of Illinois, was again called to preside over the deliberations of the committee.

The debate was commenced at length by Mr. C. Shepard, of N. C. and Mr. Garland, of Va.

While the latter gentlemen was alluding to the incidental questions as to the tariff, which had been agitated during the debate, he yielded the floor, for purposes of explanation, to Mr. Barnard, who said, that he should desire to have an opportunity of saying a few words more before this discussion closed, chiefly by way of reaffirming the propositions he had introduced, and of going into some further explanations.

I will now only say (continued Mr. B.) that if I am referred to as having introduced any proposition for a protective tariff, it is an entire mistake. I say it is an entire mistake.

In the first place, no proposition in relation to a tariff is regularly before the committee. My proposition was to strike out the enacting clause; and then I did give notice that, if that motion prevailed, I should, when we came into the house, move the house to send the subject of supplying the wants of the treasury back to the committee of ways and means, with instructions to report two bills; that the object of one of the bills should be to borrow ten millions of dollars, upon bond or scrip; and that the object of the other should be to supply to the revenue a deficit which was certain to take place in the year 1842. And the proposition was that it should be supplied by levying duties on articles now coming into the country free or nearly free. I proposed that the committee of ways and means, to that extent, should be instructed; and I expressly said in the same instructions, that they are to keep in mind the fact, that the tariff is now a compromise act. There is no proposition here for protective tariff—nothing of the sort. It is true that, when I came at last to wind up my remarks, and to refer to what I, as an humble individual, hoped would be the result of the coming administration, I expressed the hope that a tariff for revenue (within the compromise act) might be so arranged by compromise, as that it might continue to afford protection against the aggression of foreign legislation. I said that was not a single remark made by me in my speech the other day, which could, by possibility, lead to the supposition, that I was in favor of a protective tariff; and if any one so supposes, (indeed I have been charged often, in the course of the debate, with advocating a protective tariff, for a tariff, but a high protective tariff), I say such are not my sentiments, nor have I made such a proposition. What I wish especially now to say is, that there is no proposition before the committee emanating from me, as to be made by me, for any other tariff than simply a tariff for revenue, and without any regard whatever to a tariff for protection.

Mr. Garland having concluded, Mr. Adams obtained the floor, and addressed the committee at great length on various topics.

Mr. Wise rose in explanation several times, and at the close of Mr. A's remarks, made a brief rejoinder to certain portions of them which reflected personally upon himself.

The chairman then gave the floor to Mr. W. C. C. Johnson, who yielded for a motion that the committee rise. Which prevailing, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

On the house adjourned.

Friday, Feb. 5. Mr. Lincoln rose and said that he was extremely anxious to bring this long and protracted debate to a close, and that he would make one more effort to do so. He had prepared a resolution embodying that which he proposed to say by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fillmore) with that subsequently offered by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise), and he now asked leave to offer it. He went it to the clerk's table, where it was read as follows:

Whereas in this house, No. 599, to authorize the issuing of treasury notes, was taken up in committee of the whole house on the state of the union on the 15th day of January last, and has been under discussion to this time, And whereas much of the indispensable public business is to be acted on: Therefore

Resolved, That at five o'clock to-day the debate on the said bill cease, and the committee shall proceed to vote on the various amendments submitted and to be submitted, and then report the bill, with the amendments agreed to by the committee, to the house.

Mr. Rayner objected, and said that when an attempt was made at the last session to adopt a similar proceeding on a bill of the same character, the whole unanimously opposed it as a violation of their rights. He could not understand why they were now in favor of a different way of thinking.

Mr. Briggs wished that the time could be extended to 7 o'clock.

The speaker said that it would be necessary to suspend the rules and that, if the resolution was adopted under a suspension, it would then be open to modification or amendment.

Mr. Lincoln moved to suspend the rules and called for the yeas and nays on the motion; they were taken, and there appeared for suspending 115, against 85.

Two-thirds voting in the affirmative, the rules were suspended, and the resolution was received.

Mr. Lincoln then, at the request of several members, modified it by substituting seven o'clock for five o'clock, and moved the previous question, which was ordered.

And the question was put to agree to the resolution, and passed in the affirmative.

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, moved that the house go into committee of the whole on the treasury note bill when a desultory debate took place, in which Messrs. W. C. Johnson, Hunt, Alford, Cushing and Barnard participated. Most of whom advancing the opinion that it was not their intention to advocate a high tariff.

Mr. Rayner then obtained the floor and addressed the committee at great length.

He was followed by Messrs. Reynolds, Stevenson, Mullary, Underwood and Alford Smith, who continued the discussion until 7 o'clock, P. M. when the bill was brought out of committee under the order of this morning, with the amendment heretofore proposed by Mr. Wise, to authorize the incoming administration to issue five millions of dollars between the 1st of March and the close of the year, notwithstanding the amount that may have been previously issued by the present administration.

This amendment was concurred in by the house, yeas 111, nays 79.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, yeas 126, nays 69.

And being engrossed was read a third time and passed without a division.

At 3 o'clock, P. M. the house adjourned.

Saturday, Feb. 6. Mr. Rayner, by leave, presented the resolutions of the legislature of North Carolina in favor of the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the states; also for the re-opening of Roanoke inlet, which resolutions were ordered lay on the table and were printed.

On motion of Mr. Russell, leave was granted to introduce the following resolution, which was assented to by the following vote; yeas 123 yeas 52.

Resolved, That the execution of the order of this house, made on the 31st day of January last, ordering the bill to provide for the purchase of Raub's self-acting safety valves the bill to authorize the appointment of persons to construct apparatus for testing steam ships, and to test its utility; and the bill to amend an act to provide for the security of the lives of passengers on board steamships and vessels, approved July 7, 1839, to be held in special order for the 25th day of January (next) instant, and then to take precedence of all other business until they are disposed of, be postponed to Monday next, and that after the morning hour the house will, this day, proceed to the consideration of private bills, to the exclusion of which objection shall be made.

Mr. Andrews made an ineffectual effort to introduce a resolution to pay such members of the house as were unable to reach the seat of government on the week of the session, on account of the great storm which raged at that time.

Mr. Clark, of New York, asked for a suspension of the rules to enable him to present a number of petitions which had been a long time delayed.—The house refused to grant the leave.

On the 16th January, the committee on public lands reported a bill to amend an act to authorize the state of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles and settle claims to vacant and unappropriated lands within that state, passed the 19th of 1840 which was then twice read, and a motion was made that it be committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union; and this motion was pending at the expiration of the hour allotted for reports on that day.

Mr. Crockett declined to make the speech which he contemplated to have done, as he was sure every member understood the subject, and time was precious. He then moved the previous question; which was ordered and put the bill on the main question be now put and passed in the affirmative.

The speaker then decided that the main question was, shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. Montgomery appealed from this decision on the ground that the main question was that the bill be committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The third reading of the bill was called for, and it was read accordingly.

The question on the appeal was put, and the speaker was sustained without a division.

Mr. Lincoln, of Massachusetts, a member of the committee on public lands, spoke some length on the bill; and before he had concluded, the hour allotted for morning business expired, and the speaker proceeded to clear his table.

Various bills were received from the senate. The first business in order to lay on the table a preamble and resolution from the legislature of Kentucky in favor of the establishment of a United States bank, and for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several states, which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. John Campbell presented the report of a committee, with resolutions of the general assembly of the state of South Carolina, against a national bank; and a revision of the revenue and protective laws, approving the principles and policy of Mr. Van Buren's administration; approving the conduct of Mr. Calhoun, one of the senators of that state in congress; and that the state is resolved to repel every aggression upon her rights as a sovereign people, the instant that aggression is attempted. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Numerous private bills having been acted upon, and disposed of, the house adjourned.

Monday, Feb. 8. By the rules of the house the first business in order to day was the presentation of petitions. This was announced by the speaker, when

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, moved that the rules be suspended, in order to bring on the consideration of the bill making appropriation for the payment of pensions. Mr. Jones stated briefly the necessity which existed for the speedy passage of the bill.

Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, said he had received a letter from the secretary of war, addressed to him as chairman of the committee on military affairs, in relation to a petition about to be made or already made with the Senate in relation to the asking of a remission of the debt to enable him to comply with his promises to the hostile Indians in Florida, in the event of their surrendering themselves for emigration. In the present temper of the Indians, and from the fact that a number have already come to the various posts and surrendered their arms, there is reason to hope that general Armstrong's promises will induce them to come in and give themselves up for removal to the west. The subject adopted by the general has heretofore, met the approbation of the department, both as a measure of economy and humanity, and the inducement held out by him is calculated to end this protracted contest at much less expense of blood and treasure than to continue the war another month.

"The department has, however, no means under its control applicable to the object, and respectfully recommends an appropriation of the amount named by general Armstrong ($100,000) to be made by congress for the purpose. Very respectfully, J. R. FOSNETT.

"Hon. Waddy Thompson, chairman com. on military affairs, house rep.

"Head quarters army of Florida, Tampa, Jan. 16, 1841.

"Sir: I have the honor to report that I have just arrived from Pease creek and Punta Rusa. I visited those points for the purpose of meeting a party of the Seminole, and inducing them to come in.

"I did not succeed in obtaining an interview with their chiefs, but several of their people came to see me, and, in consequence of the delegation from Arkansas. They united in saying that they would return in eight days with a party, if not the whole of their people, and embark on board the steamer which I shall dispatch to meet them.

"I have promised two cash prizes of five thousand dollars, and agreed to pay every warrior who comes in thirty dollars, and give him a rifle, blanket and clothing. To fulfill this and other promises, which I have made to the Indians, I trust there will be no delay forwarding to me or Captain Page the necessary sum of money, or in ordering Captain Armstrong to report to me with the funds committed to him for the purpose of facilitating the emigration.

"Thirty or forty Indians are expected here in a few days from the head of the Withlacoochee. They desired an escort to protect them from the Miccosauquees; which was accordingly furnished.

"A considerable number of the Tallahassee are now in a various practice. I respectfully enclose herewith a report from lieutenant Colonel Loomis, commanding at Fort Clinch, where Echo-emathia, chief of the Tallahassee, has doubtless arrived ere this. I am, &c. W. L. M. JONES.

"Braggad general commanding in Florida.

"Hon. J. R. Fossnett, secretary of war.

"P. S. One hundred thousand dollars will probably be required for the objects mentioned in this letter."

After these letters had been read—

Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, asked leave to introduce a bill making the appropriation called for.

Mr. Jones said the appropriation could be moved as an amendment to the bill making appropriations for pensions, which he had proposed to take up.

The house then went into committee of the whole, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriation for the revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, Mr. Clifford in the chair.

The bill being read, Mr. Thompson, of S. C. chairman of the committee on military affairs, moved the following amendment:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the secretary of war, for the benefit of such of the Seminole chiefs and warriors as may surrender for emigration.

Mr. Pettit inquired if the amendment was in order under the rule which provides that no proposition or subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

The chairman, (Mr. Clifford) decided that the amendment was in order under the 7th rule, which specially relates to amendments to appropriation bills.

Mr. W. Thompson, said that it could not be necessary for him to say much in favor of the expediency of adopting the amendment, because the facts contained in the communications which had been transmitted by the secretary of war would be sufficient on that point. That we would ultimately have to resort to negotiation, he, (Mr. T.) did not entertain a doubt. He believed that the adoption of the proposition was not only in the interest of Florida, but that it was required by the interests of the entire union.

Mr. T. alluded generally to the course of England, and alluded to the dangers which he said, threatened us abroad, with reference to that nation; as to which nation, he thought the difficulty of an amicable adjustment of pending controversies almost insuperable. Vain, indeed, he might say silly, would it be to suppose that England, after having avowed the act of McCleod as having been committed under her authority, could quietly stand by and see him condemned and executed under our laws, if a conviction could take place. He alluded to the rallying point which the West Indies presented to the power of England—to her black regiments there—the protection which they afforded a greater part of the year by the salubrity of the climate, &c.

He expressed, in conclusion, an anxious desire that the Florida was should be brought to a close during the present session, and he should, in leaving Congress, feel most happy if he should have been in any way instrumental in accomplishing that desirable end.

Mr. Adams said he was not yet satisfied that the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Thompson), was in order.

And some further conversation ensued on that point, which however resulted in no action; after which—Mr. Proffers said that he had introduced a proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Thompson), it contemplated the appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars to perfect arrangements with the Seminole Indians, and it came directly from the secretary, was it not?—asked for him, (Mr. P.) to know that the administration now in charge of the affairs of the government believed the appropriation to be necessary, and he would vote for it; and if a million dollars, instead of $100,000, were necessary, he would vote for that also.

A wrong construction had been put on certain remarks made by him at the last session of Congress. He had never objected to the appropriation of fifty millions of dollars, if it was necessary, but to the manner of the expenditure that his objection had been made.

One remark he would make in regard to the loss of the debates to this house during the present session of Congress. Scarcely ever was an appropriation asked for the Florida war, (or other matters connected with our policy towards Indians or foreign nations), but the government of Great Britain must be juggled in. Now, he would ask, was it not the policy of the Government to stand on this floor, seizing every opportunity to speak of the overbearing power of Great Britain—of her rapacity—of her determination to extend her conquests? The only difference was between Great Britain and the United States, that the Great Britain acted whilst we talked. But Great Britain was not the only government that had manifested rapacious tendencies. Mr. P. here alluded to the incursions made by France upon certain parts of South America, and upon the continent of Africa. Yet, Mr. P. said, gentlemen had not a word to say about France; yet Great Britain, because she asserted and vindicated the rights of her citizens wherever they were injured or oppressed, was the constant object of observation here. If gentlemen were for war, why did they not propose it? Why did they talk so much about it? Why should all the governments of the earth be led to believe, by the debates here, that there was a hostile feeling pervading this hall, when there was not?

After a prolonged debate, without coming to any conclusion, on motion of Mr. Nisbet, the committee rose.

Mr. Eastman, some days ago, gave notice of a motion for leave to introduce a bill to extend for five years the act approved July 16, 1838, granting half pay and pensions to certain soldiers. As soon as the house came out of committee of the whole, he asked leave to introduce the bill, which was granted.

The bill was then introduced, and received its first and second reading, and was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, from the committee of ways and means, by leave, reported a bill making appropriations for fortifications for the year 1841; which was twice read and committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Jos. Williams, of Tennessee, moved the following resolution, which was read and adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary inquire into the expediency of so changing and adjusting the circuit of the U. S. courts as to distribute and equalize, so far as practicable, the judicial business.

Mr. Underwood asked leave to report a bill for the removal of the raft in R-d river, referred to the committee on roads and canals some weeks since. Leave was refused.

Mr. Griswold asked leave to present a petition against the passage of the bills before the house relating to the explosions of steamboats. It was objected.

And the house adjourned until to-morrow.

Tuesday, Feb. 9. This day being not apart as a special order for the bills reported by Mr. Underwood, from a select committee in relation to steamboats.

Mr. Jones moved that the special order be postponed until Thursday next, and that the house proceed with the consideration of the bill before the house yesterday, making appropriations for the payment of pensions for the year 1841.

Upon inquiry made of the chair, it was answered that a majority could postpone the order, but that it would then lose its speciality. The speaker suggested the postponement might be made by the committee consent in which case it would receive a special order. The chair then inquired if there was any objection.

Mr. Cushing objected; and then Mr. Jones moved that the special order be postponed until Thursday next, and the motion was carried by a majority, so that it remains a special order for that day.

Mr. Care Johnson moved that hereafter the daily hour for the meeting of the house be eleven o'clock in the morning, on other days than Monday.

There was objection to the introduction of this motion, on which the rules were suspended, and the motion was received and adopted.

The house then, on motion of Mr. Jones, of Virginia, resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the payment of pensions for the year 1841.

The question recurred on the amendment, moved by Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, chairman of the committee on military affairs.

Mr. A. A. Cooper resumed his remarks from yesterday, in reply to portions of the argument of Mr. Giddings having reference to the causes of the Florida war. Some further explanations took place between Messrs. Cooper and Evans in relation to the pending controversy between the states of Georgia and Maine.

Mr. Cooper, in the course of his remarks, was called to order by Mr. Andrews of Kentucky, for irrelevancy; and at a subsequent period, when replying to the remarks of Mr. Giddings as to negro-stealing, and whilst meeting those remarks with allusions to certain case of negro-stealing in Ohio, was pronounced to be out of order by the chair.

Mr. Black, insisting that his colleague (Mr. Cooper) was merely replying to arguments which the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Giddings) had been suffered to make, appealed from the decision of the chair.

Some conversation ensued on the point of order, in which Messrs. Black, Alford, Adams and Wise participated; after which the question was put "shall we discuss the bill on the chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" and was decided in the negative, yeas 56, nays 83. So the decision of the chair was reversed.

Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, would appeal to the honorable member from Georgia to say whether it was prudent or proper in this discussion of a topic (however improperly dragged into this debate) upon which every southern man should only feel as a southern man, to be provoking this family quarrel between southern and southern democrats; and whether it is just to regard the very obscure of the obscure members of the whig party as an exponent of the feelings and opinions of that party on this subject. Would it not be better, more to the point, to wait until some one should present the distinguished head of that party speak for himself? Mr. T. would pledge himself that Gen. Harrison will so speak and act upon the subject of abolition as to satisfy even the member from Georgia, and to call forever his lips except in praise.

Mr. Cooper proceeded in his remarks, interrupted by explanations from Messrs. Nisbet and Giddings, and concluded at ten minutes past 2 o'clock.

Mr. Black then obtained the floor, and expressed himself as decidedly opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Thompson), as being irrelevant to the bill before the committee, and as being improper at this time. And, he said, he would have contested himself with slaviery giving his vote against the amendment had it not been that for three long hours yesterday the gentleman, from Ohio, (Mr. Giddings), had been permitted to abuse, vilify and misrepresent him and his constituents.

Mr. B. then alluded to the efforts which had been made by himself and his colleagues yesterday to arrest the gentleman from Ohio in his course of remarks, which, however, had been unsuccessful. The committee of asking the gentleman to go on could not but be foreseen by every member of the house. He would say that it was not his intention to argue the abstract question of slavery on this floor; he had been instructed by his constituents to hold no argument with abolitionists here. Mr. B. then intimated that if the gentleman from Ohio would come amongst his (Mr. B.'s) constituents and promulgate his doctrines there, he would find that Lynch law would be indicated, and that the gentleman would reach an elevation which he little dreamed of. Let the gentleman put that down in his book; let him carry it back home, and tell it to his indignation meetings.

Mr. Giddings rose to a point of order, which he was about to reduce to writing; when Mr. Wise said: Let us get through this discussion as soon as possible—let us go on without interruption.

Mr. Black then proceeded in his remarks. Once only he was interrupted by the chair, for the reading of a certain paper sent to the clerk's table, that the chairman did not consider the course of remark in order; but that, under the decision of the committee, made this morning, the chair did not sit at liberty to order the gentleman to order. Mr. B. then proceeded, and was discussing questions connected with the policy of the non-slaveholding states on the subject of slavery, &c. when Mr. Wise made an appeal, as a southern man, to Mr. Black not to discuss the matter further.

Mr. Byrum hoped the gentleman from Georgia would proceed, and that the subject would be discussed at length, if possible. The south was suffering from this war more than for any thing else; and if the gentleman from Georgia did not proceed, (Mr. Byrum) should claim the right to do so. It was time we should come to a settlement of accounts in these matters.

Mr. Giddings again proceeded. Several points of order were raised, which elicited some desultory discussion, and in which Messrs. Warren, Rayner, Byrum, Morgan and Curtis participated; but no action was taken upon them.

And Mr. Black again proceeded, interrupted for purposes of explanation by Messrs. Wise, Albert Smith and Rice.

After which, Mr. Wise rose and called the gentleman to order, on the ground that his remarks were out of order, inasmuch as the decision made by the committee this morning.

The chair decided that the gentleman was in order.

Mr. Wise appealed. And the question being put, the decision of the chair was reversed and Mr. Black was declared to be out of order.

Subsequently, on motion of Mr. A. Smith, (objection having been made to Mr. Black's proceedings), he was granted that by (Mr. B.) should proceed in order.

And Mr. B. proceeded.

Some further interruption took place; after which Mr. Black read, for the especial benefit of Mr. Giddings, the third, fourth, and fifth verses of the gospel of the holy St. Matthew. Mr. B. then proceeded to read from the Emancipator newspaper.

Mr. Wise rose to a point of order.

The chairman decided that Mr. Black was out of order.

Mr. Andrews objected to the gentleman's proceeding.

Mr. A. Smith moved that the gentleman have leave to proceed.

Which motion prevailing, Mr. Black proceeded a few moments, when he closed his remarks.

The chairman then gave the floor to Mr. Downing, of Florida, who, after depreciating the extraordinary efforts of the gentleman from Ohio, had taken place upon a measure the object of which was to give peace to Florida, proceeded to reply to that portion of the argument of Mr. Giddings which contained certain charges against the Floridians in relation to the slave trade, and to vindicate his (Mr. D.'s) constituents therefrom. This he did at great length—entering minutely into details—and contending that the documents which had been read by the gentleman from Ohio came some of them from the hands, some of them from slaves, and all of them from partial and prejudiced sources. And he denied that the sentiments of the gentleman from Ohio on a certain subject were the sentiments of the great whig party—or of that party in the state of Ohio. He re-asserted that the gentleman could not have permitted this subject to pass at this time, believing, as he did, that if the genius of Homer could sleep sometimes, the genius of fanaticism should sometimes also be permitted to slumber.

Mr. D. then moved for leave to withdraw a petition to terminate the war—he believed it might be terminated, if the money was voted promptly now; but let the chance pass, it would never return. Mr. D. having concluded about 8 o'clock P. M. the committee rose, and on motion the house adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

RAILED. It is stated in a Pittsburgh paper of last Saturday, that Dr. John A. State principal person concerned in the extensive mail robberies, has been discharged on bail by Judge Irvine. The bail given was to the amount of $125,000, Braddie himself becoming bound in $40,000, and twenty-five of his accomplices from Uniontown in a like sum.

BANKS. The premature attempt to enforce specie payments, in obedience to the law, has resulted in prostrating the banks of Pennsylvania. In the 4th inst. the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, for reasons which are assigned in their publication of that date, (see suspension of specie payments under national affairs, page 72) were under the necessity of again suspending specie payments.

The officers of the other banks of that city held a meeting on the same day, and resolved to continue payments—but the run upon them all during the succeeding day was so pressing, that they found it necessary to restrict their specie payments to their five, and in some cases ten dollar bills, as to decline cashing checks. Bank notes are at 5 per cent. discount.

On ascertaining this state of affairs, the banks in New Jersey and Delaware, immediately suspended payments. On Monday the 8th, the banks in Maryland having only resumed payments the Monday previous, again suspended.

The banks in Philadelphia receive the notes of each other, excepting those of the United States bank—and that bank declines to receive the notes of any bank that refuses her notes.

A deputation from the banks of Philadelphia has gone to Harrisburg to appeal the authorities there, of the state of affairs.

THE FRANKLIN BANK AT BALTIMORE. According to previous notice, the stockholders of this institution, in general meeting, on the 10th inst., elected a new state of its affairs. Dr. McCulloch was elected to the chair, and William Rose, esq. appointed secretary. The meeting being thus organized, James Howard, esq. president of the bank, addressed the meeting, in the course of which he commented with some severity upon the conduct of the late cashier, James L. Hawkins. He concluded by reading a report to the president and directors of the bank. This committee consisted of Thomas Sewell, James L. Ridgely, and James Howard, who went on to state that they had examined the affairs of the bank, and reported the assets to be $745,549; the liabilities, $419,753—showing a surplus of $325,796. He then proceeded to state that the committee could prove the value of the stock to be $12; per share. They further say: that the real value of unclaimed dividends, interest and unclaimed deposits now in the hands of the bank, is $1,000,000 of circulation amount, to $75,942; of which they presume $35,000, at least, will enter into the further specie assets of the bank; the balance of $70,942, to divide amongst the stockholders at $261.57; showing a loss on the stock of $241,675.82—in other words, making the stock worth $15 per share. [See.]

TRADE OF BALTIMORE. Lyford's Commercial Journal of Saturday, contains an interesting statement of the trade and business of Baltimore. In the table showing the tobacco trade of Maryland, we find that 377,727 hds. of tobacco of the growth of this state, have been imported into Baltimore from the year 1825 to 1840, inclusive; these tobaccos have been sold by the planters at various prices, according to the quality of the article, ranging from fifty to one hundred dollars per hhd.; forming a vast commerce, within the period of fifteen years, of from 15 to 37,000,000 dollars; or averaging from between one and two, to over two millions of dollars per year.

It is remarked, in reference to the exports of tobacco from the United States to Europe, that the number of hds. in 1840, exceeded the number exported in 1839, by nearly 40,000; and the value of the tobacco exported, at the close, yet the average in Europe was less, by upwards of 15,000 hds. than for the preceding years. The principal exports for the same time, were 90,375 hds. valued at $461,312. The export of wheat in 1840, was valued at $41,121. The value of the export of provisions, including pork, lard, bacon, butter, cheese, fish, corn meal, &c. &c. $1,977,760.

BRAZIL TEA. A number of planters of Brazil, have commenced the culture of tea, and it is expected, so far as forwarded to London, is said to be equal to the best China tea—the latter being cheaper than the former, as at present manufactured.

COMPLIMENT. The members of the N. Y. Navy Club, of New York, have elected, F. S. R. Esq. Captain of the steamer President, an honorary member, a distinction that has never before been conferred on a foreigner, and but rarely on gentlemen of the highest standing in the United States.

THE CONVENT CASE. The committee of the Massachusetts legislature, appointed to consider on the report of J. T. Whittier and others, in relation to the burning of the Unitarian church, reported on the 10th inst. and urged to legislate thereon. They also presented the report of the minority of the committee, terminating with resolves in favor of remunerating the proprietors of the convent for its destruction in August, 1838.

COTTON, at the last data from Europe, fully maintained the previous prices. In consequence of the late adverse prices in Alexandria, New Orleans, &c. had advanced 1 cent per pound; fair is quoted at 10, and 9½ at Constantinople.

DEATHS—during the last week in Baltimore 50, of which 19 were under the age of 15, were force coiced.

EMIGRANTS. Since the 15th of March, upwards of 56,000 foreign passengers have arrived at the port of New York—among whom were no less than 123 cases of small pox, and 144 of ship fever.

EXCHANGE. NEW YORK, February 8th, bills on London 8½; on France 51; on Boston paid on Feb. 10th; Baltimore 2½; Richmond 1½; Raleigh 2½; Charleston 31; Augusta 7; Columbia 6½; Savannah 4½; Mobile 7½; New Orleans 4½; St. Louis 6½; Louisville 6, Cincinnati 5½; Nashville 6.

THE LOCKPORT CASE. On Tuesday in the court of sessions, Mr. O'Connor counsel for James B. Glenwood, came into court with copies of the seven indictments against his client, and gave notice of a motion to demur to the indictments; for the reason, as he stated, that there was nothing in them indictable by the laws of this state. No definite day was fixed by the court for the argument of the demurrer, but the district attorney, Mr. Lockport, was given to understand that he must move on the 10th inst.

IMPORTANT INVENTION. Mr. H. Gulland, who has already done much to improve lithography, has invented a new mode of producing pictorial effects on lithographic stones, which was exhibited with very striking impressions so perfectly resembling the original sketch that the difference is not discernible.

IRON WAR STEAMERS. Two iron steamers were built early in the present year, by Mr. John Laird, of North Britain, Glasgow. They were named the Monitor and the Phlegon. They were complete war vessels, and for the purpose of war, each carried thirty 32 pounders on swivel. Every person who saw the vessels and their equipment supposed they were destined for the Indian sea, no body suspected, however, except the parties in the secret, that they were built for the government, to be expressly for the purpose of forcing port of the Chinese expedition, their light draught of water admirably adapting them for ascending rivers. The fact of both belonging to the government was made generally known, and the vessels must have been sent to the Indian sea, and the Phlegon was expected to arrive there in a few weeks. Long before now they would have joined the Chinese expedition, to which they would be a great acquisition of strength.

THE LOCKPORT DISTURBANCE. The Rochester N. Y. Democrat of Saturday, contains the annexed letter, which we are sorry to say, confirms the report of a letter to Lockport, from the Rochester Democrat, in which Mr. McLeod's being admitted to bail. The letter itself speaks strongly of the spirit of riot and mob violence.

From the Rochester Democrat to Lockport.—A gentleman from this city has just received the following letter from his friend, a respectable gentleman of Lockport, who is very anxious to see the result of the case. What the results may be, can only be conjectured.

Lockport, Thursday, 12 o'clock noon.
I have just returned from the court house and jail, where there are, or were a short time since, assembled 250 or 300 citizens, who say McLeod shall not be liberated, although Judge Bowen admitted him to bail this afternoon, and exp. Wm. Bond has become bail.

The judge gave the order to his (McLeod's) attorney about 7 this evening, and in 40 minutes 300 men were in and about the court house and jail.

The guard was organized in the court house, while 40 or 50 guarded the door below, some with muskets, while the drums and bugles out side made much noise, and the crowd was not allowed to see the sheriff or any one else.

A committee was appointed to see judge Bowen and ask him to surrender him, or rather withdraw his name from the indictment. The committee had returned when I left. I fear it will be much against him if he does not do so.

There has gone to Buffalo, that the owner of the Caroline may be here to prosecute her private damages, &c. &c. should the authorities insist on his liberation. The excitement is very great. Brotherton has been here with Bond.

Most of our best citizens are indignant at judge Bowen for admitting him to bail, and also the bail, who let him go, I mistake the time I left at the court house.

Half past 12—1 am going to the jail again.
Two o'clock—morning— found judge Bowen admitted him to bail, and attempted to get him out of the jail. He did not arrive, but I understand he has surrendered him in the morning, to which time the judge adjourned, although many will remain at the jail all morning.

The cannon was brought in from the front of the court house about 12 o'clock, and commenced firing, and the crowd was kept in the street, and the announcement of the patrols, I will assure you. What may have been McLeod's feelings, not knowing what was going on during the seven hours the court house was full, I must say he was much to be pined if innocent.

MISSISSIPPI. Most gloomy indeed, do the official records of this state present in pecuniary condition. For several years the Mississippi Union bank, &c. &c. has exceeded its receipts. For the last twelve months the receipts were $161,000, and the expenses $491,000, or nearly three times as much. During the year, the treasurer was compelled to fail in the payment of a large amount of auditor's orders.

In the statement of the condition of the banks, it seems that the great part has been taken by the Mississippi Union bank, founded on the bonds of the state, a most melancholy account is given. The capital, we believe, fifteen millions of dollars. Of the assets it is estimated that there are no valuable resources, and of course, lost. This comes almost entirely from the miserable plan of advancing on cotton, a part of which, the bank lost thirty dollars per bale.

RAIL ROADS. Since the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester rail road in England in 1825, upwards of 1,100 miles of rail road has been put into operation and nearly the same length is now in progress. The total capital invested therein amounts to three hundred millions of dollars.

RAILWAY TRAVELLING. The facilities afforded by railways is well illustrated by the fact, that the distance between London and York is traversed in two hours less time than between London and Lincoln, although York is seventy miles farther from London than Lincoln.

It would require twelve stage coaches, carrying fifteen passengers each, and one thousand two hundred horses, to take one hundred and eighty passengers two hundred miles in the same time, or to carry the same number of ten miles an hour. One locomotive steam engine will take that number, and go double the distance in the same time, and, consequently, will do the work of two thousand stage coaches.

In reference to this subject the Philadelphia Gazette has the following remarks:

Philadelphia and Camden rail road. This rail road, for whose construction a bill is now pending in both houses of the legislature of Pennsylvania, is intended to connect Baltimore with the Pennsylvania improvements, at or near the borough of Harrisburg.

By it, the rail road communication will be twenty-five miles less to Baltimore from Harrisburg, than it is from Harrisburg to Philadelphia. The distance between the first two named places being thirty-three miles, while that from Philadelphia to Harrisburg is one hundred and seven miles. Much mischief has already been done to the commerce of the country, by the Water canal to Havre de Grace, which in its first season has diverted an amount of produce from transportation to the Camden rail road, which would have yielded to the commerce of the country, at least $100,000. Nearly the whole of this produce has been lost to this use. So much for the loss of the summer season.

Make this rail road communication to Baltimore, and the whole winter business will go to glut the Baltimore markets, draining the Cumberland valley and the adjoining regions of their rich productions, which at this season, now find their way to Philadelphia.

STRICT. A large amount of specie has been transferred from New York to Philadelphia, to buy up the depreciated United States bank notes with the Philadelphia Ledger of the 9th inst. states that "there is now supposed to be in the hands of the people of the city and county of Philadelphia more than $1,000,000 of United States bank notes, and that more than there was this time last week, and this amount will be daily augmented while there is a note of the United States bank at a depreciation undecreed."

STOCKS. There has been a perfect panic in the stock market, of course, in consequence of the banks again suspending payments of specie. United States stocks are in a panic, and in the hands of the stock within a few days before the suspension, from 2½ to 4½, on ascertaining the suspension it sunk to 2½, and on the 8th instant, went down to 25¢. A severe depression in the market for political parties, and the State 5's sold at 80—Delaware and Hudson 1½ 2½ per cent; Canton 4; N. American Trust 3, &c. &c. &c. sold at 100.

SIMULTANEOUS TEMPERANCE MEETINGS. The fourth Tuesday of February, is the day appointed for simultaneous temperance meetings throughout the civilized world, when the friends of temperance, without regard to religious or political parties, or to the opinions of life, assemble together in their different towns, cities, and villages, and celebrate the triumphs, and seek to extend the blessings of the temperance reform. [Boston Journal.]

TEMPERANCE. The legislature of Connecticut has by her relation to the subject of retaining spirituous liquors to the discretion of townships—the trial or to be determined in town meetings.

Upwards of 300 persons took the total abstinence pledge at a meeting held at New Britain, on the 10th inst.

THE GOV. PAGE'S MESSAGE. The N. H. legislature announces the discovery of tin ore, in Connecticut at the foot of the White Hills, no pure as to yield 30 or 40 per cent. of pure washed ore—one of the good results of the tin ore is that it is not so much impure, as the same kind of ore has not been found in any part of the country, of sufficient value to pay the working.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT, by and with the advice and consent of the senate. J. J. Edmonson, to be register of the land office at Pontotoc, Miss., and Robert Trottin, whose commission will expire March 2, 1841.

John S. Horner, reappointed register of the land office at Green Bay, Wisconsin territory, from March 1, 1841, when his present commission will expire.

William Adams, reappointed register of the land office at Columbus, Miss. from March 2, 1841, when his present commission will expire.

PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT ELECT. The proceedings of congress in counting the votes and declaring the result of the late election for the two chief executive officers of the union, will be found in this number, in the congressional proceedings, page 335.

THE NEW CABINET. The National Intelligencer of the 13th inst. contains the following announcement, which may be considered official, of the names of the members of the cabinet under the approaching administration.

"It is of necessity that the president elect should, some days before he enters upon the duties of his high office, make selections of persons to fill the chief executive departments of government. From information which we presume may be relied on, we have the pleasure of being able to inform our readers that, in all probability, the cabinet of the new president, so far as depends upon him, will be thus composed:

Secretary of state—Daniel Webster, of the state of Massachusetts.

Secretary of the treasury—Thomas Ewing, of the state of Ohio.

Secretary of war—John Bell, of the state of Tennessee.

Secretary of the navy—George E. Badger, of the state of North Carolina.

Postmaster general—Francis Granger, of the state of New York.

Attorney general—J. J. Crittenden, of the state of Kentucky.

We anticipate the warm approbation of a great majority of the people of the United States of these selections, and of the aggregate result. In some cases, doubtless, choice has been difficult, where many were thought worthy; but out of the abundant materials before him, it cannot be denied that the president will have formed a cabinet remarkably strong in talent, character and the possession of the public confidence.

It is an old observation that the head of a government usually shows how much vision and discretion he possesses by the choice of his ministers and agents. Tried by this received standard, the new elected president has, in this first act of his official duties, well justified that great measure of favor which he has received from the people."

THE NEW SENATE. In conformity to usage, the senate of the United States has been summoned by the president executive, to meet at the capitol on the 4th of March next, for the transaction of such business connected with the commencement of a new administration, as may be brought before them.

The new senate will have a decided majority in favor of the new administration. But it will be important that all should be present. We annex a list of the members elect whose terms commence on the 4th of March, or who hold over from previous years, with a statement of the time when their various terms expire. Those names in italics are friends of general Harrison:

Of the 49 senators elected, 27 are the friends of the new administration, and 22 are supposed to be opposed to it. The 3 vacancies will mostly, perhaps all, be filled by friends of the coming administration.

FOREIGN RELATIONS. The report made to the house of representatives on the 13th inst. by Mr. Pickens, chairman of the committee on foreign relations, in respect to the case of McLeod, and the correspondence between Mr. Fox, the British minister, and Mr. Forsyth, secretary of state, will be found in the congressional proceedings, page 339.

In relation to this report the National Intelligencer observes:

"We have no need to direct the reader's attention to the proceedings in the house of representatives on Saturday, and especially to the report from the committee on foreign relations, the subject of which will ensure to it and to the debate which arose upon it an eager perusal.

"Rarely within our experience has a more extraordinary report emanated from a committee of congress; and never certainly has a document found its way into either branch of the national legislature under more singular circumstances.

"Of the report itself we shall, for the present, leave our readers to judge for themselves, both as to its force of argument, its felicity of illustration, and the fitness of its tone to the gravity of the theme. It will be for them, especially, to reconcile, if they can, its studied arraignment of British policy, in matters which do not concern the United States, with the principle of non-interference in regards the concerns of other nations, heretofore avowed and practised upon as a cardinal point in the foreign policy of the United States.

"Will regard to the weight due to this report, as an indication of the feelings of the nation, or of the legislative body in which it originates, it ought to be remarked, that it has the sanction of a bare majority of the committee on foreign relations, and for that reason alone ought never to have been made; that it has received no sanction from the house of representatives; and that, contrary to usage in ordinary cases, a large number of the members of that house testified their utter repugnance to its general character by voting against the printing of it."

The Philadelphia alludes to various movements on the part of Great Britain lately, and says: "But there are other movements and indications that deserve notice in connection with this subject. We allude to the recent treaty between Great Britain and Texas, made, too, in the face of the anti-slavery spirit of Great Britain—but, as is avowed in some of the London journals, with a deeper motive, and the policy having in view at no distant period, serious collision with the great American republic. We are told, moreover, that some kind of treaty was not long since negotiated between Great Britain and Hayti.

"These circumstances are surely of most importance, and in addition to the facts already enumerated with regard to the improvement of the armaments of war, and the extraordinary facilities and power of war steamers—the latter rendering the distance between the old world and the new within the limits of a fortnight, are calculated to arrest the attention of every observant observer, and should, in our view, excite a vigilant and most active spirit of defence on the part of our government. We repeat, that while we have serious cause of difficulty with Great Britain—cause which in the view of our best informed statesmen, may lead to collision—that power is armed to the teeth, and ready to strike a dreadful blow at a few hours warning, while our own country is as yet in any other condition rather than one of proper preparation. Again, therefore, we abjure those in authority, that while pursuing every honorable mode to avoid war, also to take the necessary means to defend the country, and strike home against her opponent, in the event of such a terrible calamity."

ATTENT TO RAIL McLEOD. The correspondent of the Albany Argus, under date of Lockport, Jan. 28, says—Gentlemen: McLeod was yesterday admitted to bail by one of our judges, before whom his last examination was held, and by whom he was committed. Some excitement among our citizens was the consequence. A meeting was held at the court house last morning, was adjourned over until this evening. Two of our citizens had become McLeod's securities, after having been indemnified to the extent of the bail, $5,000. A very large majority of those who commenced the meeting to-day, disapproved of the proceeding of admitting him to bail, and a disposition was manifested to strongly censure those who had suffered their names to be used for that purpose.

One of the gentlemen came before the meeting upon invitation conveyed to him by a committee of the meeting, and made a frank and satisfactory statement of the motives which had actuated him, at the same time expressing his willingness to withdraw from the position he had assumed, after the demonstration he had witnessed of popular feeling upon the subject. It is due to this gentleman to add, that in this step he was evidently not intimidated by any apprehensions of personal consequences, but that rather secured on his part a conviction of what he considered due to public sentiment.—McLeod was yet in custody, the legal process not having yet been served upon the sheriff. The pro-clubs, who, the moment he perceived lieutenant U. threw down his burden, and attempted flight, but was detained, and made to follow them towards the beach. When he arrived on the beach, the party of whom I have spoken approached, and appeared much disconcerted at finding their comrade without arms, and in his power.

After some conversation with lieutenant U. on the subject, we mutually agreed that, in our endeavors to procure provisions, of which we were in much need it would be necessary to adopt every precaution.

Next morning, the 24th, we discovered the schooner at anchor about eight miles to the eastward, and at 9 o'clock, lieutenant Emmons joined us with the Peacock's first cutter. Several natives came off with a few yams and two small pigs, and, in reply to our inquiries, informed us that their town was too distant to bring off provisions in great quantities, and that we must go thence if we desired more. I then gave John Sac, our interpreter, permission to visit the town, to ascertain if provisions could be obtained. He soon returned, and informed me that he thought we could get what we wanted. Lieutenant Underwood immediately requested permission to go and make the necessary purchases, which I granted, informing him that I would follow as soon as the tide permitted, when he shoved off for twenty leagues. About the same time lieutenant Emmons departed for the purpose of making observations on the smaller islands. I soon perceived that the Leopard grounded in the passage, and that a number of the natives, perhaps fifteen or twenty, were on board her, and, joining their song with that of the boat's crew, were assisting to drag her through. As the number of natives appeared increasing, and impelled by apprehensions of some danger, I immediately attempted to follow him; but, being much heavier, I was unable to do so until after a detention of the tide of perhaps twenty minutes. After getting into the bay, I found the Leopard at anchor, about 2,000 feet from the shore, in just sufficient water to permit me to get alongside. I was informed by the crew that lieutenant U. had gone ashore, leaving a hostage, whom I immediately took into my boat. With the aid of my guides, lieutenant U. with the remainder of his crew, apparently in conversation with a party of twelve or fifteen natives.

Nothing occurred for the space of half an hour, when Robert Furman was sent off by lieutenant Underwood to inform the natives that the natives could trade unless for muskets or powder. I directed Furman to return to the shore, and say to Mr. U. that I could not consent to such an exchange while the schooner was within reach; that we could be easily destroyed by her, and to hurry off. The boat had been quite long enough absent to purchase what we required, if the natives were disposed to trade. About this time midshipman Henry obtained my permission, and left for the shore. A few minutes after, a small canoe, with three natives, came alongside, and, after an exchange of some words with the "hostage," he displayed a little anxiety to return with them to the shore. As they pushed off, he attempted to leave the boat, when I took him by the arm and directed him to sit down, giving him to understand, as well as possible, that he must keep quiet till the return of our party. Shortly after, lieutenant Emmons rejoined me, and made his boat fast to mine.

In about half an hour Jerome Davis came off to say that, with another hatchet, Mr. U. could pur- chase all required. I directed Davis to take it to him, and say to Mr. U. that I desired to see him without delay, to come off with what he could get as soon as possible. In the meantime, the boat having risen, I ordered the Leopard to drop in as near the landing as possible. She had been gone about ten minutes, when the hostage jumped overboard, and made his escape. The boat, which was the first intimation I received of any thing going wrong on the shore. I immediately seized my rifle and directed it at him, when he staggered back. I then ordered two men to follow and secure him; he then resumed his course, when I determined to shoot him, but stayed my hand, lest his death should bring destruction to our absent people. As I turned to direct my boat to be got under way, I noticed midshipman Clark in the act of firing, and ordering him to save his breath—at the same time directed lieutenant Emmons to pull after and take him, if possible, dead or alive.

The report of fire-arms then reached us from the beach, to which ensued a general melee, the natives appearing suddenly interested to observe us. By this time my boat was flying before a fresh breeze to the stage of conflict, and I called to lieutenant Emmons to follow me. In a few moments we passed the Leopard shoving out, when I was informed of the death of lieutenant Underwood. The boats had not grounded, but we immediately jumped overboard, and with all speed hastened to the beach, opening a fire upon the natives as soon as within range, when they immediately dispersed, carrying off their dead and wounded. Before we got upon the beach, we found J. S. Clark (seaman) badly wounded and delirious. I directed some one to take him to the boat, and continue my course. When I reached the beach, I found three boats only. Throwing aside from the melancholy spectacle, my eye fell on midshipman Henry, who lay very much in the same situation in which I had found lieutenant Underwood. This was the earliest intimation I had of his being one of the sufferers. I raised him in my arms, and hope was again flattered—I thought I perceived him breathe. A native lay a few paces from him badly wounded. I ordered him to be despatched, and with heavy hearts we bore our murdered comrades to the beach, and made sail for the schooner, which we reached to about one hour—at 5 o'clock, P. M. Very respectfully, I am, sir, your obedient servant.

JAMES ALDEN, lieut. U. S. navy.
To Charles Sumner, esq., commanding United States surveying and exploring expedition.

STATES OF THE UNION.

MAINE.

The legislature assembled at Augusta on the 6th inst. In the senate, R. H. Vose was chosen president. The vote stood for Mr. Vose, W. 15, Williams, V. B. 6, scattering 2. Daniel Sanborn was elected clerk. To the house, Geo. C. Gelchell, was chosen clerk, by 98 votes, to 93 for Edwidge Gerry, V. B. Three ballots were had for speaker without effecting a choice. On the first ballot John Otis, W. had 87 votes, John P. Paine, V. B. 6, and J. S. Little, W. 8. The house adjourned. The reason assigned for refusing to call in votes in favor of Mr. Otis, was the appointment of the president of the senate from the same vicinity. The next day Mr. Otis having declined nomination, Mr. Little was chosen by a full vote of 105 to 9. The votes for governor having been decided by the committee of the legislature, and the result being no choice by the people, the legislature accepted the report on the 13th inst, and the house proceeded to vote for their officers. The senate adjourned. The vote stood, for John Fairfield 169, Edward Kent 161, H. Hamlin 9, F. O. J. Smith 8. Consequently Messrs. Fairfield and Kent were the candidates for the senate; and that body made choice of Edward Kent by a vote of 15 to 10. On the next day (11th) in convention of the two houses, Mr. Kent came in, took the oath of office, and was formally proclaimed governor of the state.

U. S. senator. According to previous assignment, the legislature on the 28th ult. proceeded to the choice of a senator, to represent this state in the United States senate, for the term of six years from and after the fourth day of March next. The election was by a concurrent vote of the two houses. In the house on the first ballot the whole number of votes being 178—necessary to a choice, 90. The vote stood: George Evans, 94; John Fairfield, 81; John S. Tenney, 1; Hannibal Hamlin, 1; and 3 for J. C. Foss. The house adjourned, and was therefore declared duly elected on the part of the house.

In the senate on the first ballot, George Evans received 14 votes, John Fairfield, 8. George Evans was therefore declared elected by a majority of the senate, and having received a majority of votes in each house, he is legally and constitutionally elected a senator, for the state of Maine, in the congress of the United States, for the term of six years from and after the third day of March next. FINANCES. An account of the finances of the state to the 1st inst. is exhibited in the annual report of the treasurer. The whole debt of the state amounts to $1,678,367, of which all but $37,340 is payable in periods of 2, 5, 15 and 20 years. The estimated charge for interest the ensuing year is $98,500. For meeting this debt, and the current expenses of the state, the treasury has the following resources: cash on hand Jan. 1, 1841, $83,743; bonds for 1841, $40,000; duty on imports, $2,500; balance a state tax of $840, due January 1, 1841, $97,718; notes and bonds in hands of land agent, and other notes and bills receivable, estimated to be available for $208,000; claim on the United States, $250,000; and bank stock, $18,000; making a total of $735,954. The estimate of probable receipts in 1841 is $458,934, including cash on hand, $230,000 claimed of the United States for boundary expenses, the state tax, bank tax, and $30,000 from the land agent. The bank tax appears to be appropriated to the school fund. The estimate of expenditure for the current year is $206,627.

Northeastern boundary. A correspondent of the Boston Daily Mail says, that a resolve has been introduced in the Maine house of representatives to repel British aggression on the territory called disputed by the resources of the state but they are hereby placed at the disposal of the governor, and the specific sum of 400,000 dollars be appropriated, to remove the troops of her majesty, queen Victoria, now quartered on the territory called disputed by the British government; but by the treaty of 1783, and by the resolutions of both houses of congress passed in 1833, and by resolves of the legislature of Maine, clearly, and unequivocally a part of the right of soil of this state.

Revised code. The revision of the whole body of laws in this state, was completed by the last legislature, at an extra session held in September and October. These laws are now in the hands of the printers, and will make a volume of about 1,000 pages. They are mainly the work of the late lamented chief justice of the state, Prentiss Melien, who died at Portland a few days since, full of years, and honors. Owing to the haste with which they were compiled, and to other adverse circumstances, it is apprehended they will not compare with the revised statutes of N. York or Massachusetts. They will, however, be a great improvement on our former laws, which had been so often changed, repeated, and repealed, and make a volume of about 1,000 pages. Sometimes puzzled the best members of the legal profession, and would have staggered even "a Philadelphia lawyer," to tell what was law, and what was not not law, in Maine.

VERMONT.

The Vermont university, at Burlington, has 160 pupils. A donation of $30,000 has recently been made to it by Mr. Williams, a citizen of the state. Its library contains 10,000 volumes.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Legislature. A bill to repeal the law prohibiting the intermarriage of whites, Indians and mulattoes was rejected in the house of representatives of Massachusetts, after a warm and animated debate. "Year 140, says 204."

Boston trade. There arrived at Boston during the month of January 250 vessels of all kinds, 181 of which were coastwise and 69 foreign. There cleared during the same period 197 vessels, 130 of which were coastwise and 67 foreign.

Sugar. There was imported in Boston during the year 1840—29,600 pounds of brown sugar.

RHODE ISLAND.

The general assembly of Rhode Island have passed resolutions in favor of the immediate distribution of the public lands among all the states; for a national bank, and for the immediate repeal of the sub-treasury law.

NEW YORK.

Prison contracts—Army damages. Mr. J. Chichester of this city has lately obtained a verdict for $18,357.19 damages against the agent of the Sing Sing prison, for a breach of contract for the services of prisoners in the cooper's shop of the prison.

It appeared that Mr. Chichester, the plaintiff, entered into a contract with Robert Witte, the agent of the prison, on the 26th December, 1833, for the services of a stipulated number of convicts, for seven years, and for up to the 1st day of December, 1839, with the privilege of renewing said contract for a term of years longer. The damages for the violation of the contract, were laid at 25,000 dollars; and the violations were, a refusal on the part of the agent to allow the plaintiff a sufficiency of men to allow him for dressed stuff, as agreed, and for bad work.

The referees reported on the 6th inst. at a verdict for the plaintiff of $18,357.19. [Troy Whig.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Salaries from $2,000 to $3,900 each, and a dwelling house. The professor of modern languages is required to teach French, Spanish, Italian, German and Anglo-Saxon. The endowments offered are far greater than those enjoyed at any other university in the country. Applications will be received until the first of July next.

Special congressional election. Hines Holl, esq. the whig candidate, elected to fill the vacancy in congress occasioned by the resignation of judge Colquitt, received, according to the official returns, 26,050 votes and Watson (V. B.) 21,002—majority 5,057.

Schools in Cincinnati. The editor is indebted to the kindness of his friend E. P. Langon, esq. president of the board of trustees, for a copy of "the" eleventh annual report of the condition of the common schools in Cincinnati, and the progress made, with the proceedings of the common council thereon, and published by their direction. It is really a gratifying specimen of the progress of system and science, in the department of popular education, and well worthy the attention of all those who are engaged in introducing public schools into our own communities. A comprehensive table exhibits at one view, the names, stations and salaries of the teachers and their assistants—the expense of each school for tuition and for contingencies—the number of scholars enrolled, withdrawn and remaining—distinguishing males from the females—the number of each in daily attendance—the number year distinct—the names of the trustees, board of examiners and other officers—the time of their meetings, &c. &c.

We lay down this instructive little publication with sincere regret that our limits will not enable us to make further extracts at present from its pages than to furnish the general results of its statistics. Its suggestions in relation to the qualifications of teachers—the course of studies and grading of schools—the books used—the economy of such a system of education; and the suggestions to parents, scholars, teachers, public authorities and to the community at large, are admirable, and worthy of a wide distribution.

Artificial lake. The Miami (Ohio) Times states, "The Miami canal reservoir, in Mercer county, covers 13 square miles of land. The water is from 1 to 37 feet deep, and is the largest artificial lake in the world."

ALABAMA.
The Legislature closed their session on the 6th ult. The banks. Just before the close of the session, it being ascertained that the banks of the state were by no means in a condition to resume specie payments, a bill passed authorizing them to continue suspended until the 15th inst. The banks of that state as well as the legislature, are controlled by the Van Buren party.

INDIANA.
The Indiana senate on the 15th inst. laid on the table a projected bill to suspend the further prosecution of the public works.
The house of representatives, on the same day, passed a bill to abolish capital punishment.

ILLINOIS.
Allen votes recognized. The supreme court of Illinois, in session at Springfield, have decided that aliens, under the laws of the state, have a right to vote, and that they cannot be prevented. And yet the voters of these very states may elect the president of the United States.

Land titles. It is stated that the supreme court of Illinois have, by a unanimous opinion, decided that the titles of lands obtained under sales for taxes are good.

Illinois and Michigan canal. The fifth annual report of the canal commissioners, states that the expense already incurred on this work is

The estimated cost of the canal	4,457,478 68
Amount remaining to be done	$216,569 41
Which is supposed can be completed in 3 years if there is no impediment from the want of funds.

Michigan.
River St. Joseph. The cost of building snag boats, cabin screws and other machinery, for clearing out this river in Michigan, was prosecuted last season with energy, under the superintendence of gen. Van Fossen. The expense of boats, &c. was over $1,150 of clearing seven miles, covering eight miles from the mouth, $462 of rigging, claim, furniture, &c. $528, total amount expended $2,247. The work is to be prosecuted as far up as Three Rivers next year.

The tariff. Resolutions have been introduced into the legislature of Michigan, in favor of a protective tariff. The Detroit Advertiser, in remarking upon the subject, says, "a free trade—open ports to all nations—easy duty—no tariff—no talk about, but it would be ruinous to practice. It is clearly the policy of this country, to foster its own manufactures—to become, emphatically, and to the fullest extent, independent of the old world. As a people we have never realized the magnitude of power, wealth and glory, until this is the case. If is her protective system that has made England the first manufacturing as well as commercial nation in the world. There has been a period in her history, when, without a tariff, she could not, in every respect, compete, in her own market, with the manufactures of France and Germany. But that system—which she early adopted—gave her manufactures strength—transformed the weakness of infancy into the full vigor of manhood—enabled her to reap the reward, by her ability to defy all competition. A similar policy here, will secure like results—make America the queen, equally of commerce and manufactures. How necessary, therefore, to oppose a system which cannot fail to secure such glorious results."

DEBATE ON THE PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

In senate, Thursday, February 14.
MR. SEVIER, of Arkansas, said he knew of no political question, except it were a question involving national or state honor, or a question of war with foreign power, in which his constituents felt an interest so deep and universal, as they do in a just, speedy and final disposition of the public lands.

In the adjustment of this great question, they desire what is just and liberal, and nothing more; and they would never be satisfied, as they did not to be, with any settlement of it which falls short of ample justice and great liberality. Senators from the old states have had the power, and yet have the power, to vote down every reasonable proposition upon this subject, as they have frequently done, and to no time for the last half century. But, thank God, selfishness, and avarice, and injustice, like all things else on earth, have a termination! Human extortion and avarice, either individually or by states, in the way of pre-emption of a merciful Providence, cannot last forever! What influence a sense of justice, in conflict with pecuniary interest, or a knowledge of what the future will inevitably bring to pass, may now have upon the minds of senators representing the old states, will be shown by their votes upon the proposition now before the senate. Ten years hence, after the next census, should a settlement of this question be so long deferred, and should we at that time have no traitors in our garri- son to betray us, it will be a matter of slight concern whether we have, what would be, at all times desirable, the friendship, the will and co- operation of our brethren, whether the senators from the old states are willing to settle the land question or not. We shall then have the power, and we shall then estimate it, for disposing of the great ques- tion to suit ourselves. And when that settlement takes place, we shall bear no more of this govern- ment peddling in town sites and town lots; no more of the relationship of federal landlord and tenant, in England, and in Spain, and in India; no more of menal statutes prohibiting emigration and settlement upon the public lands; no more of suits of trespass or ejectment; nor of our illustrious army crusading under your orders, not against the enemies of the country, but against our own flesh and blood; and acquiring distinction, not on the battle field, but by burning down the dwellings, cutting down the crops, and driving into the woods to starve, or perish by exposure, nakedness, infectious and harmless epi- demics, the United States and Indian families. We shall then hear no more of these enormities, nor of the thousand other vexations which the frontier settler has had to bear, without remedy or redress—without farther to complain, lest he should be considered as unnecessarily, impudent, impetuous, a bandit or robber!

We shall then have the power, and shall find, when that blessed day shall arrive, in politics as in war, that a bombshell or cannon ball, dug into the ca- verns of the world, and fired, will produce a rapid effect of hastening negotiations, and of settling rap- idly, and to every body's most perfect satisfaction, knotty points of dispute between us of long stand- ing. You, sir, may read the history of the last days of Napoleon. He had been in the first in- verces, with the empire, and with France, an heir of his, in all probability, this day would be seated on the throne of the French. He wanted more, he wanted provinces, and Russia, and Ireland, and, in striving to retain them, lost all. Profit, and, by the lessons of history: for men and things are the same in every age and circle of the globe. Will you, sir, profit by these reflections? Will senators from the East, who profit by the revenue of the country, make any adjustment of this great interest, in the spirit of brotherly love and generous magnanimity, of which we bear so much and see so little? If so, I for one, will promise them a pardon for the past, and love and reverence for the future. I will feel no such emotions. I feel that the world's con- ditions of money—money which they collect from others than their own constituents—will be found too powerful with them for any patriotic sacrifices and they would gain the power, and they would give every member of the assembly. They now have the power to prevent our emancipation, and they now calculate that their strength will in- crease in an equal ratio with ours. They calcu- late, as the west, the southwest, and the south give new states to the union, that the new states will become old in interest, and join them as allies in plundering the balance. Already they consider Ohio and Indiana as belonging to them. And hence they speak with the exception of my friends from the Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN), of my friends from New Hampshire, and a few other generous, lofty spirited democrats from the old states, who have stood by us heretofore, and who stand by us now, the old, the aged, and uncompromising opponents of every land measure desired by the new states. And what are these measures, and why are they opposed?—There are three of them now before us. The first, the pre-emption bill; the second, the distribution bill, and the third, the session bill.

The pre-emption bill proposes to authorize any citizen of the United States to give one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre for one hundred and sixty acres of land, provided he will improve and cul- tivate it. The friends of the bill support it with a view of protecting the labor of the poor man against wealthy land speculators. They allege, and prove it by official documents, that land sold at auction, without a pre-emption right, pays the govern- ment but two or three cents an acre more than the pre-emptor pays; and as the loss to the gov- ernment is so trifling, and as protection to the set- tler is so important to him, as well as to the state in which he resides, they urge the passage of the bill. During the last forty years, we are told, and truly, that several pre-emption laws have passed, but all of them retrospective, and applicable only to settlers on the public land, at the time, or prior to the pas- sage of these acts. And such bills, it is said, have been opposed on the ground, among other reasons, of their unconstitutionality; because it was said to be a law lacking uniformity; because it granted privileges only to certain citizens of particular states, and not to all the citizens of all the states. To obviate this objection, and at the same time to save the trouble of constant applications for the passage of such laws, to save the time and expense of con- sidering, passing, and repealing laws, and to obviate the constitutional objections of very conscientious gentlemen, the friends of the measure have proposed this bill, which is of a prospective character, ex- tending the citizens of all the states the same right, and privileges that former pre-emption laws conferred on certain citizens of particular states.—With the single exception of its prospective feature, it is precisely the same bill which has been passed frequently, at different times, for the last thirty or forty years.

This is the pre-emption bill, sir. I have given you, in a few words, its length, and depth, and breadth, and a few of the reasons which influence its friends to support it. Its passage is opposed by gentlemen for sundry reasons, some of which are avowed, and some of them concealed; and by all its opponents it is opposed for the same reason, whether avowed or concealed.

The reasons, though not avowed, for opposing the pre-emption bill, is, to prevent the emigration to, and the settlement and improvement of, the new states. The wealthy of the old states desire to retain their poor citizens among them for their own convenience, (that is, for their own pur- suits, for the class I allude to), for the pur- pose of working on their farms and in their shops and factories; and, by so doing, to keep down the price of labor by increasing the demand for employ- ment. It is supposed, it is because the value of such a bill is calculated to keep down the price of land in the new states, and in that reduction they imagine emigration will be successfully encourag- ing; that the poor will then become elevated in condition, that they will become capitalists, and that the price of labor will increase, and that by such a process the value of their real estate will be affected and diminished. This wealthy class have now, as they ever had, their representatives to this effect.

The politicians of the old states, (always excepting my democratic friends I have before alluded to), oppose this bill because they are jealous of the rapid growth of the new states, and fear a loss of political power. Consequently, and therefore, they oppose this bill, at they do, as a temptation to emigration, and as leading to a loss of political power, they oppose it. To keep these people on the census-roll, that they may be counted in the number, they oppose it. They oppose the pre-emption bill, and they oppose it in their country, than rich, happy and prosperous in ours. Their reasons for opposing this bill are well understood in the new states, and thank God, properly appreciated. This is all. The bill is well understood in the new to bring the highest pos- sible price, that they may have annually more money packed over the mountains, to be spent among them on their wharves, light houses, boys and breakwaters, and the Lord knows what. Not satis- fied in this plan, on our shoulders a protective tariff on the necessities of life for their benefit, we must also be saddled with a high land tariff, a sort of Eng- lish corn law, that they may thrive and fatten at our expense, in robust, drunken song, when they find kind enough to modify the tariff in 1832 to save our union, a reduction at that time, of the land revenue never entered into their imaginations, no, never. These, Mr. President, are some of the concealed reasons for opposing the pre-emption bill. I now consider a few of those which have been avow- ed.

The senator from North Carolina, (Mr. MAN- GUM), objects to the passage of this bill because, he says, by opposing the pre-emption bill, we are warring with God! His idea of the settlers upon the public lands in the new states is, that they are a sort of N. Carolina blue beads, who are ragged, dirty, brawl- ing, browbeating mounties, six feet high, who have want the land in the new to bring the highest pos- sible price, that they may have annually more money packed over the mountains, to be spent among them on their wharves, light houses, boys and breakwaters, and the Lord knows what. Not satis- fied in this plan, on our shoulders a protective tariff on the necessities of life for their benefit, we must also be saddled with a high land tariff, a sort of Eng- lish corn law, that they may thrive and fatten at our expense, in robust, drunken song, when they find kind enough to modify the tariff in 1832 to save our union, a reduction at that time, of the land revenue never entered into their imaginations, no, never. These, Mr. President, are some of the concealed reasons for opposing the pre-emption bill. I now consider a few of those which have been avow- ed.

[Mr. MANGUM has rose to explain, and said he referred to laws.]

Mr. SEVIER said he had not so understood the senator, but would say to all God's creatures, and a portion of them are his constituents. This is the idea he has of them. But now, sir, no descrip- tion on earth is further from the truth than the one he has given of them. On the contrary, sir, the set- tlers upon the public land constitute the best part of the population of all the new states, and that is saying a good deal for them. It is saying that they constitute the best portion of the population of the United States, and that is saying a good deal for them. Sir, I never was in Europe, and never intend to be, and therefore am unable to contrast the set- tlers upon the public lands with the better part of a population of the old world. But, sir, I have been in North Carolina. I was born and lived in sight of Buncombe; from the door of the house of my nativ- ity, though in a different state, I could look out and see the high blue mountains of that celebrated county. I know the soil, and the people, and the in- fluence of its inhabitants. I have since been in Wilming- ton, the seaport city of that state, and have travelled through the turpentine region, which I understand to be the best part of the state. I have met with be- lievable at home and abroad, and will be able to bear testimony to their worth and virtues. And yet, sir, I assure the senator that I should not blush or dread a comparison of my constituents upon the public land with the best of the state officers by any standard of virtue, intelligence or worth, which or others could suggest. I have heard a great deal said about the settlers upon the public lands. This is not all. I have seen written descriptions of the emigrants to the new states, and only the other day I met with a description of them which will, I dare say, whether he considers it poetry or prose, afford him some amusement, if not instruction. The extract is taken from Hall's Magazine. He says:

"First in order of time, first in speed, and first in speculation is concerned, comes the hardy, enterprising New Englander. Of all the emigrants to the west, Brother Jonathan alone knows where he is going to, the cheapest mode of travel, and what he is going to do when he gets there. He is a man of business, and he knows what sum he must take with him, or notion in the way of trade, to secure a home in the wilderness. Already, before he gets there, he converses fluently about ranges, townships and sections of land, and he knows the value of each subdivision, the amount reserved for schools, and is ready on his arrival to avail himself of his new position."

"Behind the rest, some distance in the rear, come the lonesome-looking couple from old North Carolina. They had evidently, from their appearance, ventured there all, such as it was, upon the enter- prise. An old one-horse tumbler, with two high seats, and a single wheel, and a store box for a body, drawn by a lean pony of the preceding generation, constituted their mode of conveyance. A bed, a spinning wheel, a pair of cards, a bag of dyestuff, and a few banks of copper-colored cotton, with a sickly-looking negro, and a dog, were all that they had. As they moved slowly along, the man walking before and the wife behind the tumbler, their lean pony occasionally stopping to crop the tall grass which stood by the way, it was evident to all eyes that they were a poor people. The man, at that term of life which the magistrate alluded to, who married them, when he said 'better for worse.'"

Well, now, sir, if the senator is ashamed of his old neighbors and friends, who probably have stood by him in many a contest, and who have helped to assure the senator that I am not. They are a good sort of people, and I wish we had more of them among us. I had expected the senator would back these friends of his, and do something for them, give them at least a pre-emption, or not a donation of land, to support the wife and the poor little sickly creatures, as well as the lean but faithful pony. But it seems that I have mistaken the man, and I am sorry for it.

The senator objects to this bill for another reason. He says that this bill allows more than one pre-emption. Well, suppose it did. Suppose it allowed the settler to pay for every place he found vacant and unimproved, on which he should build a habitation and cultivate a field, and then pay for a second lot (that) if a poor man settles upon, improves and pays for one tract of land, and be should afterwards sell it, what harm is there in letting him settle and im- prove, and pay for another quarter section of land? I can well imagine it might be to his advantage to pursue such a course; I can well imagine there might be cases where it might require, as in the case of the emigrant from North Carolina I have al- ready referred to, some two or three sections before he would find himself in a position to stick suc- cessfully. Such an indulgence is calculated to en- courage industry and enterprise, and to improve both the state and condition of the settler; and, at the same time, to get rid, for a valuable purpose, of that most odious of all monopolies, a monopoly of the public land by the great non-jax-paying power, the general government. I think such indul- gence right and proper. But the senate think other- wise, and have said so, and they are right. He is violently opposed to any such indul- gence. He says one of our western hunters can travel without difficulty the whole of our frontier, from the St. Peter's to the Kiamichi or Red river, and be able to travel, and to spend his money, in the very best tract of land on the whole route—What unparalleled monstrousness! He would not per- mit such a fellow, with his flap and leggins on, to have a tract of land, even if he could sell bear meat and peltries enough to pay for it. No; not he. He would not even permit him to camp upon the public lands for a single night, lest such abomination would pollute even the soil itself on which he slept. He would remove him forthwith from the public lands. Not, however, with the militia, sir, no, sir. It is some trouble about the militia bill, of which, perhaps, the honorable senator has heard something, and the senator is rather too smart to be caught tinkering with men in uniform. He would send a constable to remove him with his warrant and staff of office. Well, sir, I am not sure that the senator is not likely—quite likely, sir. Friendly persuasion often effects what force would fail to accomplish; and it has been said that a poor man, in any extremities, when forsaken by the world, can safely count upon two friends, two inseparable companions, that will never desert him—his dog is one, and the constable is the

The senator from Connecticut (Mr. HUNTINGTON) also objects to the passage of this bill. His cannot bear the idea of a poor man having the privilege of entering by pre-emption a hundred and sixty acres of land, and then, in the next year, being enabled to select a spot of land where there may be water privileges! Water privileges! Why, sir, he loses the equanimity of his temper at the thought that a poor devil may stake his thirst by drinking from the same spring as he, and then, in the next year, to grind meal for his family. Water privileges! I have heard of this objection before, but never heard of it without feeling as though I had swallowed a dose of tataric acid or (perhaps) a dose of arsenic. I have heard that the people represent it as a revival of the credit system. Yes, sir, credit system! and upon that hypothesis they have favored us with some learned discourses upon the evils of the credit system. I have heard that the people represent it as coming from a certain quarter of this chamber, I felt something like the senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) did, on his return from Richmond a year or so ago; when he wished to express his surprise at the fact that he heard of it from that quarter. "where am I, Mr. President! Am I in the senate chamber, or not? Do I see you, Mr. President, or not? Is that the chandelier I see there, or not? Is that the picture of the father of our country which I see there, or not? Is that not he, Mr. President?" We have been more surprised on that occasion than I have been at the philippics and tirades of certain honorable senators against the credit system—some of the advocates of which have been members of the government, of the paper of broken, suspended and non-specie-paying banks—and all of them the advocates of depositing the revenues of the general government with the states! The credit system, sir, is not all that you make it out to be. We propose to sell no land by this bill, or any other, upon credit. We do not propose to part from our land without the cash. It is true, we propose to delay the sales of the lands, to which there are pre-emptive claims, until the first of September. It may be thought advisable to sell the land at an earlier day; and of that matter the president of the United States is the sole judge; and whenever it is sold, the claim must come. It is a matter of course between the first of May and the first of September. The pre-emption bill may hasten, but in no event, can it retard the sales; and whenever it is sold, to-day, to-morrow, six or twelve months hence, the money must be paid down, and the land must be sold, and subject to be sold to any one who will buy it.

Another objection to the passage of the bill is, that settlers upon the unsurveyed lands are placed upon an equal footing with those residing upon the surveyed lands. These settlers have always been upon an equality, and they ought to be upon an equality. If the lands are not surveyed, it is our fault, and not theirs. If the lands are surveyed, it is to cripple our states in this manner, you have only to refuse, as you have the power to do, to pass the appropriations to carry on the public surveys, and you accomplish your purpose. You survey when and where you please, and are not more in the habit of consulting the wishes of the settlers upon them than you are in any other business. If you say, sir, they are never consulted by you upon any subject,

Sir, I do not desire to be tedious, and must now pass on to the other bills under consideration, which are offered as substitutes for the original bill. The next bill in order is the distribution bill. Well, sir, I am not going to discuss this bill at this time, if I ever do. I made a speech against such a proposition twelve months ago, and am not disposed to repeat now what I said on that occasion; and especially as I have been anticipated by the senator from Missouri, (Mr. BEXTON). He, sir, for this session at least, has given this bill its death blow; it has fallen dead under his herculean blows; he has demolished it, killed it, murdered it; and I have no disposition to take up the time of the senate in mangling the carcass of the deceased.

I was glad, however, to find, from the course of his remarks, that the senator from South Carolina (Mr. PAXSON) intended to vote against the distribution bill, because he considered it inexpedient and unconstitutional. There is some consolation in this, sir; for at a future day we may need his services in resisting the passage of this identical bill.

The next which is proposed as a substitute is the cession bill. This bill proposes to cede the public lands to the states in which they lie, on certain conditions, to be taken up gradually by the states. Under this bill, if the conditions, it amounts to little more, if anything than a transfer of the management from the nation to the state governments. The lands are now managed by the general government, and at its sole cost. Under this bill, the management of the lands will be managed by the states respectively in which the lands lie, and at their exclusive expense. And, as an indemnity to those states for their trouble and expense, the bill proposes to give to the states, in consideration for the surrender of the five per cent. on the sales of lands in their limits, hereafter accruing, to which they are entitled by the terms of their previous cession, the sum of one per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the lands, to be given to the states thirty-five per cent. of the gross proceeds of the sales of the land. This is the bill which has been most falsely characterized as a bill to give away the public lands. It is my favorite bill, because it is the only one which is not based on a gift, but on a fair exchange, and because it is the only one by which we get the heavy crushing federal loss from off our necks, and because it puts it beyond the power of a future congress to raise the price of the lands. It is the only one which does not encourage the growing avarice of the old states should continue to increase, and they should have the power to accom-

 I have no favorite bill for other reasons. It embraces the pre-emption and graduation clauses. Of the former of these propositions I have already spoken; and of the latter I have but a word or so to say, as the subject of graduation is familiar to every senator; and what I propose saying is elicited by a question put to me yesterday by the senator from N.
 Carolina, (Mr. MASON,) who inquired of me, in relation principle, because, in the course of time, the refuse lands may bring a dollar and a quarter an acre, and, therefore, he is unwilling for the government to make such a sacrifice. He states, as a precedent, that in 1836 the senator from N. Carolina recd. that in 1836 the public lands had brought a great deal more than what they had been estimated at in 1828. No doubt it; and what was it that did not bring a great deal more in 1836 than it did in 1828? Will the senator select that year as the proper one for the purpose of sale, or any thing else, that in either old or new states? Does he know that the inflated prices of land, and every thing else, in 1836, broke the banks, merchants and traders, and the United States, if not the world? Most certainly.
 I should select any other than 1836 as the proper one for the purpose of sale. I would select the year in which the old state that has refuse lands to dispose of holds them up to any thing like the prices to which you hold up the refuse lands in the new states? Nowhere, sir. No legislature of any state in this union would dare pursue such a policy; nor would any individual. If the new states, in their independence, dare to pursue such a policy, were they but, within the reach of the citizens of the new states. They pursue towards the new states, who are not their immediate constituents, a course of policy they are not disposed in regard to their own constituents to pursue. What would be a good old rule of "doing as you would be done by"?

My friend from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) has shown conclusively, I think, that the intrinsic value of land, or anything else, is six per cent. upon the sum it yields annually. He has thrown over this subject such a blaze of light as to leave conviction, I think, to every unprejudiced heart. He has shown that the Government has no right to exact a price for the government to receive speedily a moderate price for their property than to hold on to it for a great series of years, with the view of getting an enhanced price for it; and yet, with these convictions, without even the flimsy apology of subserving the financial interest of the United States, we find ourselves ready to carry out a step upon the basis of the inferior lands out of market, by bidding up the price beyond their value. Why, then, that such a course is pursued? The answer is obvious. It is to prevent the retrenchment and improvement of the new states, and to prevent them from raising a revenue by taxation upon their lands. Sir, if there were no great and powerful landholders in the honest land holder of the state, were to pay his land taxes upon their lands, we should have far less grounds of complaint. The government pays no taxes, nor will she suffer the lands to be sold at a fair price, that somebody may be induced to purchase them, by which the states in which they lie may, by taxing them, receive a small revenue to support the state governments.

The friends of this bill anticipate many beneficial results from its passage. The reasons which influenced the committee in reporting this bill, and the reasons which influenced the author of it to offer it to our consideration, have been presented to the senate. I shall not repeat or dwell upon them. The views of the committee, and of the author of the bill, are met and opposed by the adversaries of the measure.

They oppose the bill, in the first place, with an exaggeration of the quantity of land subject to its provisions. The true quantity (if there be any truth in our official documents) in all of the new states, which is subject to the provisions of the cession bill, is one hundred and fifty-four millions of acres.—The quantity in the bill represents the true quantity, I think, to be ten hundred millions of acres! Now, sir, I care but little what the quantity may be; our arguments apply to the principle, and not to the number of acres. I should not, therefore, notice this bombast at all, but that I wish to dissipate the public mind as to the extent of our possessions.

Where do we find these immense possessions, amounting, in acres, to numbers which I have not mathematical skills to compute! I have no objections to go on a trip of pleasure with the senator-elect (Mr. PAXTON) to the peaks of the Rocky mountains, to see the country he has perched himself, to be able to begin to form some idea of our countless acres. Where are they? Are they there? Do we not all know that all the country west of Arkansas and Missouri, and south of the blue mountains, and north of the Rocky mountains, is held in fee by a patent from the president to the Indian tribes, and by treaty with Mexico or Texas? Do we not all know that the angle of country formed by the Missouri river, Iowa and the Canada line, and held in like manner by Indian tribes, or else is totally unoccupied? Do we not all know that all the country west of the Rocky mountains is held by Indians, and is claimed, though unjustly, by a foreign power, and that we have not to this day got nerve enough to wrest it from him? We all know, and you would not have to say so, and the world believe we are as many acres of land as there are grains of sand under the sea shore.

The advocates of this bill also exaggerate the benefits it proposes to confer on the states. The senator from South Carolina (Mr. PLESTON) states that the bill would require the government to select her for his (illustration) will, by the provisions of the cession bill, receive forty millions of acres of land. Has the senator ever read the bill? I doubt it; but he, the had, I am satisfied he would never have made such a statement. The bill would not require her already shown that, in consideration of the surrender of her five per cent. to which she is now entitled, and for the trouble and expense of managing her property, she is to receive thirty-five per cent. and no more, and not the whole of it, as the senator argues. The senator also mistakes the quantity of public land in that State. It is little over thirty instead of forty millions of acres. That the bill would require her to receive gradually throughout the period of eighty years, and from sales of land in her own limits of her own citizens; but when she defrays the expenses of her property, she is to receive the balance, by paying surveyors and land officers all that, and when she has deducted her five per cent. which she now receives, and which she is entitled to receive, in virtue of her compact of admission to the Union, she is to receive the balance, retaining out of her thirty-five per cent. upon the gross proceeds of the sales which the bill proposes to give her, a trifling sum, not worth a week's deduction from her property. I am not, Sir, I think, if this bill be liable to objection, so far as money considerations are involved, the bill gives her too little instead of too much. But I am willing, as one of her representatives to receive it, in order

The senator also opposes this bill because it violates the compact between the State of Virginia and the State of Connecticut. He tells us that the State of Virginia ceded its lands to the United States to "disposition of" for the common benefit. I have read the Virginia compact the senator refers to, but not lately. My objection seems to be founded on the words "disposition of" as being incompatible with the word "cede" as used in the bill. I hope the author of the bill will accommodate the gentleman, as I think he can do with propriety, by substituting in the bill the words "disposed of" for the word "cede." Either term I fancy will be acceptable to the friends of the Union.

The senator alludes to the leading and only object of those two states, in making the census, was money. Well, sir, Connecticut at least has long since received, for what was at best a doubtful claim, an ample consideration for all she owed. The objects of these grants being money, as we are now informed, he argues that these lands cannot properly be disposed of for the common benefit, for any thing else. This construction I consider rather too restricted. Congress, I apprehend, can dispose of these lands for other things than money, and may be for the common benefit. Congress certainly have often exercised such a disposition of them, and probably will do again. There is no stipulation in the compact, that I am aware of, requiring those lands to be sold at a certain price, or any stipulation prohibiting congress from selling those lands at a price less than one dollar and a quarter an acre. They have full power over the subject, and can sell on what terms they choose, either to individuals or to states, and without any objection. But whatever force there may be in the senator's objections, they do not apply to this bill, because it goes on the ground that the lands shall be sold for cash, and upon the further ground, that the money accruing under its provisions shall be paid into the public treasury for the common benefit.

The senator objects, further, to this bill because it establishes, as he alleges, the relationship of debtor and creditor between the national and state governments. I am against such a relationship, and if there be any such obscurity in the bill on this point, I hope the author of it will modify it by making it the duty of every purchaser of land to dispositive the same to the treasury of the United States, the money coming to the U. States, with the proper price to the credit of the United States. I do not desire, notwithstanding my confidence in the integrity of the states, for a dollar of federal money to be placed, even temporarily, in the treasury of the states. Let the bill be so modified, if it requires such modification, and then, sir, all the evils the senator has so eloquently painted, resulting from such a connection, will be avoided, and here is an end to that objection.

The next objection to this bill is, that it is changing our most admirable land-system—and that is monstrous! Will you change a system, they ask, which has operated so happily for forty years? Behold Ohio and Indiana. See to what a happy and fertile manly has grown up under our most admirable land system! Yes, sir, Ohio and Indiana have grown up with surprising rapidity, and so has Russia under the edicts of her absolute emperors, and that, too, without the magical benefit of our system, or any other system! Has our land system produced the growth of either Ohio or Indiana? No, sir; far from it. They would be better off if they had neither land nor land systems in the limits of either. And have we not changed our land system, and have we not changed it, in reducing the quantity of land authorized to be sold. We have changed it from a credit to a cash system. We have changed it, by reducing the price from two dollars a dollar and a quarter an acre.

The distribution bill, which these gentlemen advocate, is a proposition to change the land system. And have any of these changes checked the growth of Ohio or Indiana? No, sir. They have gone steadily onward—and would have gone on, if they never heard of any of their land systems. Other states, old states, all things considered, have grown up as rapidly as Ohio and Indiana, where your land system never had a location or an existence. We should act with modesty, and not arrogate to ourselves any alterations in our system, which experience, or the wants of the community, or the condition of things, might point out or suggest. And pray, sir, how long since is it that those gentlemen manifested such a horror at change? Change, change, they would bring forward, and carry it too, some great and striking measure, as they have promised, or they will be laughed into scorn, ridicule and contempt. If they fail in all this, their days are numbered. If such logic as this could have been turned out of old and iron-nerved ancestors (and it was preached by a celebrated party of that day) from changing the whole government, should now, sir, be the humble subjects of her majesty, and not the independent representatives of twenty six states and eighteen millions of freemen. I hope some of us, at least, have inherited a portion of the inquisitive virtues of our fathers, and have courage enough to look things in the face as they are, and not be frightened to death by sounds and empty shadows. I admit that every change is not an improvement, and fear that the late change of our president is of this character.

The senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Crittenden,) tells us that all these land projects are traps to catch votes; and he appeals to the result of the late election as an evidence to show that they had failed in their object. In the north, generally, I doubt if any candidate of their class, and informed of the result of the vote, when he replied that he received this manifestation of the confidence of his countrymen with profound gratitude, and that he would earnestly devote himself to the discharge of the duties imposed on him, by endeavoring to promote the welfare and welfare of the country, according to his best abilities.

By Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, the bill to authorize the issue of treasury notes, without endorsement.

Mr. W. gave notice that to-morrow, at 1 o'clock, he would ask for the consideration of the same.

Also, from the same committee, a bill for the relief of certain holders of grants therein named.

By Mr. Wall, from the committee on the judiciary, a bill for ascertaining and settling the southern boundary line of the territory of Iowa.

By Mr. King, from the committee on commerce, an adverse report on the claim of the owners of the British brig Dajach.

Mr. K. said a bill had been introduced on leave for their relief, but the committee, on full investigation, came to the conclusion that the claim was not founded in justice, and gave notice that when that bill came up on the calendar he would move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. Crittenden gave notice of his intention to bring in a bill to prevent the interference of federal officers holding office in state elections.

Mr. Prentiss submitted the following, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the act entitled an act granting half pay to certain officers who served in the army from 1828, ought not to be continued to deprive any soldier of its benefits in consequence of her having married after the death of the husband for whose services she may claim the same.

Mr. Smith, of Conn., presented a memorial and act, provided she was a widow as the same was passed; and that the committee on pensions be instructed to report on the memorial.

The following resolutions were adopted on the 8th instant by Mr. Linn, was taken up and adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of procuring a sufficient number of the most approved repeating arms to supply the troops operating against the Indians in Florida.

The following bills were then severally considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed:

A bill to authorize the granting letters testamentary and of administration to aliens in the District of Columbia.

A bill confirming to Joshua Kennedy, assignee of Cornelius McCurtain, his title to an island in the Tensaw river, in the state of Alabama.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the bank-note bill—the motion pending being that of Mr. Seward to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. Smith, of Conn., expressed a wish to address the senate on the bill, when Mr. Seward withdrew his motion. Mr. S. then took the floor, and spoke until 3 o'clock P. M.

On motion of Mr. Tappan, the further discussion was passed over informally, and the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein, adjourned.

February 12. The vice president laid before the senate a communication from the state department, covering the correspondence in relation to the capture of the schooner L'Amistad.

Also, a report from the secretary of the treasury, made in compliance with a resolution offered by Mr. Tappan, calling for a statement of the loss sustained by the government and people of the U. States by their connection with banks.

On motion of Mr. Allen, 20,000 extra copies were ordered to be printed.

Also, from the same department, covering a statement of the director of the mint, showing the result of the assay of gold and silver coins.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, presented the credentials of the hon. Wm. R. King, senator elect from Alabama, for six years from and after the 4th of March next.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—2d SESSION.

SENATE.

February 10. Mr. Hubbard moved to dispense with the reading of the journal; which was agreed to.

A message was received from the house of representatives informing the senate that the house was ready on its part to receive the senate, and proceed to open the certificates and count the votes of the electors for president and vice president of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Knight, the senate proceeded to the house of representatives.

After the votes had been duly counted, the senators proceeded to the senate chamber, where the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the senate be appointed by this body to join a committee of the house of representatives, to be appointed by the house, to wait on William Herndon, of Ohio, and to notify him that he has been duly elected president of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1841.

Mr. Preston was appointed on the part of the senate.

Resolved, That the president of the senate do cause John Tyler, of Virginia, to be notified that he has been duly elected vice president of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1841.

The vice president laid before the senate a communication from the war department furnishing information from the colonel of ordnance in relation to the national arsenals.

Mr. Linn, on leave, introduced a bill to appoint trustees for the investment of the Smithsonian fund. And the senate then adjourned.

February 11. Mr. Tappan presented a memorial from numerous citizens of Ohio, praying that the seat of government be removed to Cincinnati. Laid on the table.

The following reports from committees were made:

By Mr. Preston, from the joint committee appointed on the part of the senate to wait on Wm. Henry Harrison, of Ohio, and inform him of his election to the presidency of the United States: A report of the committee had waited on the president-elect, and informed him of the result of the vote, when he replied that he received this manifestation of the confidence of his countrymen with profound gratitude, and that he would earnestly devote himself to the discharge of the duties imposed on him, by endeavoring to promote the welfare and welfare of the country, according to his best abilities.

By Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, the bill to authorize the issue of treasury notes, without endorsement.

Mr. W. gave notice that to-morrow, at 1 o'clock, he would ask for the consideration of the same.

Also, from the same committee, a bill for the relief of certain holders of grants therein named.

By Mr. Wall, from the committee on the judiciary, a bill for ascertaining and settling the southern boundary line of the territory of Iowa.

By Mr. King, from the committee on commerce, an adverse report on the claim of the owners of the British brig Dajach.

Mr. K. said a bill had been introduced on leave for their relief, but the committee, on full investigation, came to the conclusion that the claim was not founded in justice, and gave notice that when that bill came up on the calendar he would move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. Crittenden gave notice of his intention to bring in a bill to prevent the interference of federal officers holding office in state elections.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, presented the credentials of the hon. Wm. R. King, senator elect from Alabama, for six years from and after the 4th of March next.

Mr. Wile presented the memorial of numerous citizens of Indiana, asking for the adoption of a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. Porter presented a similar petition from citizens of Michigan.

Mr. Henderson presented a similar petition from citizens of Mississippi.

Mr. Norvell, of the committee on public lands, reported a bill to authorize the states to tax say lands sold within their limits, without amendment.

The resolution introduced yesterday by Mr. Prentiss, relating to the construction of the pension law of 1838, was taken up, when Mr. Prentiss explained at length the object of the resolution.

Mr. King moved such an amendment as would refer it to the committee on the judiciary.

This motion was defeated by Messrs. Southard, White, Prentiss, Sevier, Knights, Clark, and others. The motion to refer to the committee on the judiciary having been lost, the resolution was adopted.

The bill from the house of representatives, making appropriations for the payment of pensions during the year 1841, was twice read and referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Wright, agreeably to notice given yesterday, moved to postpone all the orders for the return of taking up the bill to authorize the issue of treasury notes.

This motion having been agreed to—Mr. Benlon rose to ask for the yeas and nays, as he wished to record his vote against the measure.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Beaton, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Henderson, Mangum, Smith, of Connecticut, White.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, spoke against the measure at some length, deprecating it as most objectionable in its features.

Mr. Wright replied.

Mr. Clay rejoined, and the debate was further continued by Messrs. Benlon, Calhoun, Prentiss, Dixon, Hubbard, Knights, Henderson, White, Smith, of Indiana, and others, when the question was taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Dixon, Fulton, Graham, Hubbard, Kerr, King, Knights, Linn, Lumpkin, Nicholson, Norvell, Porter, Reese, Routen, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Wall, Webster, Williams, Wright, Young—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Beaton, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Henderson, Mangum, Smith, of Connecticut, White.

The senate then adjourned until Monday.

February 15. The vice president laid before the senate a communication from the treasury department, covering a bill prepared by the first comptroller of the office of emoluments and expenses of the officers of the customs for the year 1840.

Also, from the legislature of Michigan, a resolution in relation to the boundary line of that state, and the appointment of a commission on the part of the state to join one on the part of the federal government to mark the same.

Mr. Buchanan said he had received a memorial from Parkersburg, in the state of Pennsylvania, which he would now take leave to present. It was signed by a number of respectable citizens of Pennsylvania, and stated in strong terms the defenceless condition of our maritime cities on the seaboard, and the impending danger of a foreign war; and urged on congress to make appropriations for the armament of our fortifications, the outfitting of the iron batteries for the defence of our harbors, and the equipment of twenty of the first class of steam frigates, and as many more smaller steam vessels. The memorial was ordered to be printed, and referred to the committee on naval affairs.

Mr. Buchanan also presented a petition from engineers, captains and pilots of the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, protesting against any law of congress making imperative the use of steam boats in all traffic safety valve, stating it to be not superior to others, and expressing a hope that no law would be passed unless its superiority was fully tested.

Mr. Linn presented the legal testimony taken before the honorable A. A. King, judge of the fifth judicial circuit at Missouri, in the case of Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, and sundry other individuals of the sect called Mormons, or Latter-day Saints, on charges preferred against them of treason against the state of Missouri, burglary, arson, robbery and larceny.

Mr. Linn, in presenting this document, made some remarks in relation to the memorial presented at the session by the Mormons, in which it was asserted that the state of Missouri had not acted towards those people with that justice and humanity that had ever characterized her. He stated at that time that the memorial was an ex parte matter, and the legislature had since felt the necessity of placing a full record of all the facts before the country. He was aware that the sympathies of the people were always on the weaker side, and that in this contest with the state the latter had been improperly reflected on. He had the pleasure to present a statement of all the matters in dispute, which he asked might be printed. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. L. also presented petitions from Eleazer McVay, asking a pension, and from citizens of Missouri, asking a repeal of the naturalization laws, and that some mode be adopted to prevent the introduction of foreign paupers into the United States.

Petitions were further presented—By Mr. Wright, from citizens of Onondaga, re-monstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law that would be retroactive in its character.

By Mr. Huntington, from the Buffalo presbytery of New York, asking that the treaty with the Seneca Indians may be carried into effect until thoroughly revised by the senate.

By Mr. Nichols, from the legislature of Louisiana, asking that boats may be placed at the mouth of the Mississippi river.

By Mr. Mercer, from the corporate authorities of Baltimore, asking an appropriation for the erection of a fortress at Sollers' point flats.

Mr. Linn spoke of the importance of this position to the citizens of Florida, and expressed a hope that it would receive the attention of the military committee, and such appropriation be made as would enable them to commence the work.

Mr. Linn said it was a mere isolated point, and that the citizens would be of little service. He looked to the defenceless state of the whole maritime frontier from Maine to the Sabine, and talk of a partial appropriation for a single point. It would take fifty millions of dollars to place this country in such a state of defence as would enable it successfully to resist foreign aggression.

Mr. Prentiss spoke at length upon the subject; of the necessity there was for some proper and efficient measures being taken to place this country on an equal footing with European nations in respect to arms and defence. He took a view of the preparations making by France and England, and the scientific researches made by these powers in relation to steam vessels, floating batteries, &c. &c. which bid fair to change entirely the system of naval warfare that had been so long in vogue. He pointed to the steam vessels of England trading between the two countries, and commanded by naval officers, which at any moment might be transformed into vessels of war; also to the French steamers, which had battered down one of the strongest forts on the American continent; and the next day as it were in New Orleans, and anon at Baltimore, without a single gun having been fired to give notice of her approach—Mr. P. thought this subject one of vast importance in a national point of view, and ought to go to a select committee with science and intelligence, that would investigate the matter fully, and give a detailed report on the subject. He thought that in the present session would prevent any salutary action. Mr. P. expressed his regret that, from negligence or what other cause, this nation should have slumbered until others had attained so much more skill and strength. Law now, however, for the country to make up for what had been unfortunately lost.

The memorial was referred to the committee on military affairs.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, from the committee on roads and canals, to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill to confirm to that state the lands selected by her in lieu of the lands covered by reservations in the treaties of 1837 and 1839, with the Miami Indians; the bill was ordered to a second reading, and the report and accompanying documents, on this motion, were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Anderson, the bill from the house to amend an act entitled an act to authorize the president to set for the payment of horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States, was referred to the committee on claims.

Mr. Wright moved to take up the bill from the house of representatives making appropriations for the payment of pensions for the year 1841; which was agreed to.

Mr. Sevier said he understood the bill contained an item of $100,000 to buy a peace with Tiger Tail and Sun Jee.

Mr. Wright explained the object, which was to give no more to the chiefs, and $30 to each warrior, a blanket and gun, which was not to be delivered until they reached their new home; that gen. Armstrong had expressed his entire confidence in the Indians, and that the war would be at an end.

Mr. Sevier said he saw it was just what he had anticipated—neither more nor less than a bribe for peace. He said he must be permitted to express the deep mortification which he felt, that, after a war of five years, and when the power of the government was not sufficient to defeat a few hundred savages, but had at last to buy a peace. Such policy, he insisted, would have a bad effect on the Indians. What would he said when they went to the west? Why that, after expending between thirty and forty millions of dollars, you were compelled to last to buy a peace. Mr. S. moved to strike out the appropriation.

The subject was debated at some considerable length, and with much animation, by Messrs. Wright, Sevier, King, Linn, Prentiss, Porter, Benton, Fulton, and others.

The question on the amendment was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative by a vote of 38 yeas and 6 nays. After another trivial amendment having been adopted, the bill was passed. The senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, Feb. 10. Mr. Tillinghast, on leave, presented the resolutions of the legislature of the state of Rhode Island instructing the senators to request the representatives of that state in congress to vote for the passage of a law designating the same day throughout the United States for the election of electors of president and vice president of the United States in accordance with the 4th section of the 2d article of the constitution of the United States; which resolutions were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Andrews by permission, introduced his resolution to take the bill for the payment of revolutionary pensions to the committee on the whole at 12 o'clock to-morrow, and then to proceed to vote upon said bill and such amendments as may be offered; which resolution was adopted. Mr. Levi moved that the rules be suspended to enable him to move the resolution. The motion for the morning hour this morning he devolved to the presentation of petitions; which motion the house refused to sustain.

Mr. Crary, reported, with amendments, the senate bill to authorize the legislatures of Arkansas, Louisiana and Tennessee to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in those states.

The bill and amendments were read, and the question arose on agreeing to the amendments.

Some debate took place; when Mr. Peck moved that the bill be committed to the committee of the whole.

While this motion was pending, some explanations, &c. took place.

And then the house at 12 o'clock having arrived, Mr. Briggs moved the order which will be found in its proper place below.

Mr. W. Cost Johnson asked leave to move a resolution to admit issues within the hall during the ceremony of counting the votes of the electors for president and vice president, and the persons.

There was a general response of "no! no!" throughout the house, and the motion was not pressed.

This is the day appointed by law for opening and counting the votes of the electors of president and vice president of the U. States.

By the 1st section of the 2d article of the constitution of the United States it is prescribed "that the president of the senate shall, in the presence of the senate and house of representatives of the U. States, open all the certificates, and the votes of the electors of president and vice president shall then be counted."

By the act of March 1, 1792, it is enacted "that congress shall be in session, on the second Wednesday in February, 1793, and on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, and the certificates of the electors, as so many of them as may have been received, shall then be opened, the votes counted, and the persons who shall fill the offices of president and vice president ascertained, and declared, agreeably to the constitution."

On the 10th of January ultimo, the two houses appointed a joint committee to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for president and vice president of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

On the report of that committee the two houses came to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the two houses will assemble in the chamber of the house of representatives on Wednesday, the 10th of February, at 12 o'clock, and that the president of the senate shall be providing officer; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the senate, and two on the part of the house of representatives, to make a list of the votes which shall be declared; that the result shall be declared to the president of the senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two houses assembled, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected president and vice president of the U. States, and together with a list of votes be entered on the journals of the two houses.

The honorable William C. Preston, senator from South Carolina, was appointed teller on the part of the senate; and the honorable Caleb Cushing, representative from Massachusetts, and the honorable John W. Jones, representative from Virginia, were appointed tellers on the part of the house of representatives.

At 12 o'clock to-day, the following order was moved by Mr. Briggs, of Massachusetts, and adopted by the house of representatives:

Ordered, That a message be sent to the senate to inform that body that this house is now ready to receive the senate and to proceed in opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the United States in the choice of a president and vice president of the United States, in pursuance of the resolution of the two houses.

The senate came into the hall of the house in the following order: the sergeant-at-arms (in front), followed by the vice president of the United States and president of the senate, with the secretary of the senate on his left; then the principal clerk of the senate, bearing the votes of the electors; then the senators; two and two.

The senate was met at the south door of the rotunda by the sergeant-at-arms of the house, who conducted the procession down the broad side. The vice president was received by the speaker on the steps of his stand, and conducted to his seat as the providing officer of the joint meeting—the speaker taking a seat at his left. The secretary of the senate was seated at the right end of the table of the clerk of the house, and the clerk at the opposite end. The tellers took seats at the clerk's table in front of the presiding officer; Mr. Preston, the teller on the part of the senate, in the centre, and Mr. Cushing and Mr. Jones, the tellers on the part of the house, on his right and left.

The sergeant-at-arms of the senate occupied a seat at the right of and below the vice president; the sergeant-at-arms of the house a corresponding position on the left of the speaker.

The senators took the seats set apart for them in the body of the hall, on the left as it entered, so as to be on the right of the providing officer. The members of the house were seated within the bar—the requisite number of seats having been provided and placed in the open space.

When the senate entered the hall, the speaker and members rose, and remained standing until the senate were seated.

The ladies' gallery was filled, almost exclusively, with ladies; and, as it would not contain all, nearly the whole line of front seats was filled with them. The entire galleries were crowded with spectators.

The joint meeting being opened by the presiding officer (the vice president of the U. States and president of the senate) rose and announced the purpose for which the two houses of congress had assembled in joint meeting.

He then proceeded to break the seals of the envelopes in which the votes of the electors were enclosed, commencing with the state of Maine, and, having merely broken the seal, he rose and handed the paper to the tellers, saying, "I deliver to you gentlemen, tellers, the votes of the electors of the state of Maine for president and vice president of the United States, that the same may be counted."

The same ceremony was observed by the vice president in opening and delivering to the tellers the votes of all the states.

The superscription on the envelope and the certificate of the votes of the electors, together with every paper contained within the same, were read throughout by one or other of the tellers, taking it in turn, the teller on the part of the senate having commenced with the state of Maine.

The tellers having read, counted, and made duplicate lists of the votes, which lists they compared with each other, and being found to agree, they were delivered to the vice president, by whom they were read to the joint meeting, and are as follows:

List of votes for president and vice president of the U. States for four years, commencing March 4, 1841.

RECAPITULATION.
Total number of votes given.
Necessary to a choice.

Of which, for president,
William Henry Harrison, of Ohio, received 234
Marion Van Buren, of New York, received 60

For vice president,
John Tyler, of Virginia, received 234
Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, received 45
Littell W. Tazewell, of Virginia, received 11
James K. Polk, of Tennessee, received 1

The vice president then announced the result to the joint meeting, and, in compliance with the law of March 1, 1792, and the resolution of the two houses of the 2d instant, made the following declaration:

"I do declare that WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, of Ohio, having a majority of the whole number of votes of the electors of president and vice president of the United States for president, is duly elected president of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, in the year 1841.

"And I do further declare that JOHN TYLER, of Virginia, having a majority of the whole number of votes of the electors of president and vice president of the United States for vice president, is duly elected vice president of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, in the year 1841."

The vice president then announced that, as the business for which the two houses of congress had assembled in joint meeting had been gone through with, he declared the meeting dissolved; and, thereupon, the senate withdrew in the order in which it entered the hall; the principal clerk bearing the votes of the electors, and one of the tellers to the senate chamber, to be deposited with the archives of that body.

Whilst the senate was retiring from the hall, the speaker and members of the house remained standing.

The senate being withdrawn, the speaker took his chair, and the house resumed its session; and Mr. Cushing, from the joint committee appointed on the 2d inst., submitted the following resolution as an additional report from that committee:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the senate to join a committee of two members of the house of representatives be appointed by the house to wait on William HENRY HARRISON, of Ohio, and to inform him that he has been duly elected president of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1841.

The resolution was read and adopted; and the house, at 4 o'clock P. M. adjourned until to-morrow, 11 o'clock.

Thursday, Feb. 11. The speaker stated that he had received a communication from Mr. Stanley, asking to be exempted from further service on the committee of expenditures on the public buildings. Mr. Stanley was excused accordingly, and an order was passed for the appointment of a member in his stead.

It appeared by the reading of the journal this morning that Mr. Cushing and Mr. Wise were appointed on the part of this house of the joint committee to wait on general William Henry Harrison and notify him of his election as president of the United States. Mr. Preston is of the committee on the part of the senate.

Mr. Everett introduced resolutions of the general assembly of Vermont, that the exclusion of the members duly commissioned by the governor of N. Jersey from participating in the organization of the house, and the subsequent proceedings thereof, and the substitution in their places of five other persons who were not so commissioned, without a trial of the election, was a violation of established usages—was an indignity to the authorities of New Jersey—was unjust, unconstitutional and subversive of the liberty of the people of the republic.

The resolutions were read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. Briggs moved that the special order on Mr. Underwood's resolution to the senators occasioned by the explosion of steam-boilers be postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. Underwood assented, and the question was put, when there appeared: ayes 97, noes 17. No quorum voted.

The question was again put: ayes 111, noes 12; and so it was carried by two-thirds; so that these bills retain their character as a special order.

The house, in committee of the whole resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the payment of pensions during the year 1841.

Mr. Clifford, of Maine, was called to the chair.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the committee until a few minutes before 12 o'clock, oppositely to the amendment of Mr. Waddy Thompson, as it now stood, and generally upon the Florida war, &c., and concluded (for it was understood to have concluded) his remarks by offering the following as an amendment to the amendment.

"Provided, That money hereby appropriated shall be charged and considered as advanced payment on the part of the United States to the Seminoles under the provisions of the act passed at Payne's Landing on the 9th day of May 1832."

Mr. Briggs was understood to say that the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Smith) had charged upon the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Thompson) this effort to put an end to the Florida war, when he knew that the gentleman had not communicated to this house an offer communicated to him by the secretary of war. The proposition came from the secretary of war. The gentleman from Indiana, in his military career, attempted to rally his party here to vote against this proposition. He (Mr. B.) was pleased that it had been made; it was the only proposition which had been offered for the last five years that had been satisfactory to him. He had voted millions upon millions to carry on this war—he had always voted for the appropriations which had been asked for it; and now, when the secretary of war told us that the commanding general had pursued a course which met his approbation, and which would terminate the war, he (Mr. B.) was small expense, what did we care to be terminated at a appeal to party to vote against it. The secretary had told us that motives of humanity and justice alike called for this appropriation, and he (Mr. B.) was prepared to vote upon those motives, to put an end to the war and to the suffering of our country. The commanding officer had made certain promises to induce the Indians to come in. And would not congress carry out those promises?

The hour of twelve having arrived, Mr. B. concluded by sending to the clerk's table the following letter, which was read for information:

"Head quarters army of the south,
Fort Snelling, Jan. 26, 1841.

"Sir: I have the honor to inform you that I have now within the chain of Seneca at this post 150 Indians. Ten of that number are of the Mickassaukees, and the balance of the Tallahassee tribe. This is a view in a favorable light, as their principal chief, Echo-Enabla is with them, and they are all of their object in coming in is for the purpose of enigrating. Runners of the Mickassaukees have been sent out from Fort Clinch and No. 4, who have reported that they could bring in fifty of sixty of their band. They are daily expected here.

"Should this result prove favorable, it will be a leading feature in terminating this war, particularly as it is combined with the arrival yesterday of a party of Seminole, from Peace Creek, under charge of my aid de-camp, Lieut. L. A. Armistead, 6th infantry.

"It is much to be feared that it will take some time before any others in that portion of the country will be induced to cross in, notwithstanding every exertion on my part has been made to induce them to do so; but I shall still continue to negotiate with hopes of success.

"So far as it relates to the Tallahassee, appearances are favorable, provided no disappointment occurs from the promises and stipulations which I have made them, and which I trust will be complied with on the part of the government. These stipulations were detailed in my communication to the department on the 16th inst. and I am convinced that, had money been furnished me at an early period, this war would have been terminated, as those people have but little faith in promises.

"I have just concluded a talk with Echo-Eunah-la, the chief of the Tallahassee, who says that the remainder of his people will be in two or three weeks—many of them are in Middle Florida. He has sent runners out to them with a talk, which will no doubt induce them to meet him at this post in twenty days.

"I have despatched, in a steamboat, my assistant adjutant general to Key Biscayne, to conduct in this post the thirty-two Indians captured by Lieutenant Colonel Harvey in the Everglades. On their arrival I shall ship them and those now here, making in the whole 180, for their new homes in Arkansas, on the 15th proximo.

"Enclosed I transmit reports from Lieut. Col. Clark and Lieut. Col. Loomis. I am, sir, &c.

"W. K. ARMISTEAD,

"Brigadier general commanding army in Florida.

"Hon. J. R. Poinsett, secretary of war.
"Endorsed.—Respectfully transmitted to the hon. W. D. Thompson, Jr. for his information, and that of the committee on military affairs, by his obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

"War department, Feb. 19, 1841.

"At Fort Brooke, Tampa Bay, there are now in 30 Indians. At Fort Clinch, on the Withlacoochee, Echo-Eunah-la has come in with 41 Tallahassee Indians, and at Fort Annatulee Tiger Tail with 33. Colonel Clarke's party, which left Tampa a short time since for the Withlacoochee to escort in a party of Indians, is expected to return to Tampa on the 20th of January. Col. Clarke has with him 32 Indians, mostly Tallahassee and several Mickasagons in to Fort Clinch.

"The steamer T. Salomon left Tampa on the 19th instant for Key Biscayne for 30 Indians, (Spanish Indians), the women and children of the party captured by Col. Hamsy a short time since.

"At Fort Armistead, eleven Indians are in. At Peace's creek several families are expected to meet a conveyance sent there to convey them to Tampa. Forty Indians have come in at Fort King, and 4 at No. 4 near Cedar Key, and 19 more have since gone in to Fort Clinch.

"In all there are now in at the different posts 240 Indians to be brought together at Tampa Bay as soon as practicable, under sufficient escorts for emigration to Arkansas in the early part of February. Of the sixty Indians at Fort Clinch, 40 are warriors, and of the whole 240, probably 80 or 90 are warriors.

"By letters from Cedar Key, it appears seventy-two Indians have gone in recently to Fort King. Rumor says Col. Kelly came on with a party of forty or fifty who have passed, and they went into Fort King with him. By good information I have heard Col. Harney has a second time captured twelve Indians.

"By a letter received from Mr. Hernandez, a member of the legislative council of Florida, it appears that Colonel Harvey has fallen in with the Indians a third time, and has captured one hundred and fifteen.

"If these rumors are true, and they are at least extremely probable, there are nearly five hundred Indians who have surrendered, and are ready for emigration. More Indians have been killed by the operations in Florida during the past eight months than for two years before.

"CHARLES McCORMICK,

"Assistant surgeon U. S. army.

M. Profit made an ineffectual effort to obtain the floor for the purpose, he said, of personal explanation.

Mr. Graham sent to the table and had read the following, which he would have presented, after the question on Mr. Smith's amendment had been taken, viz:

"For the removal, substance and benefit of such of the Seminole Indian chiefs and warriors as may surrender for emigration.

"And lest further enacted, That no rifle or arms of any kind shall be delivered to such Indians, until they reach the western bank of the Mississippi river."

Mr. Thompson accepted this proposition as a modification of his amendment, and modified his amendment accordingly.

The question recurred on Mr. Smith's amendment and being put, it was negatived.

The question then recurred on Mr. Thompson's amendment, as modified at the suggestion of Mr. Graham, and being put, it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. Crabb, of Alabama, moved the following amendment.

"And lest further enacted, That the act entitled 'an act directing the transfer of money remaining unclaimed by certain prisoners, and authorizing the payment of the same to the treasury of the United States,' approved April 6, 1833, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. Jones suggested that this amendment was not in order. The chair ruled it out of order.

Mr. Care Johnson moved the following as an amendment:

"It is enacted, &c. That the secretary of war be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow to agents employed in the payment of prisoners a sum, not exceeding one per cent. on the amount of money paid by them respectively.

Mr. Jones suggested that this amendment was not in order. The chair ruled it out of order.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill with the amendments adopted.

The question recurred on concurring in the amendments; when Mr. Warren, of Georgia, rose and addressed the house at some length in relation to the amendments connected with the Florida war. Mr. Smith said he would not have said any thing on this subject had it not been for the extraordinary character of some of the remarks which had been made in the course of the discussion on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Thompson). The cause of justice and humanity required the amendment should be adopted, and that the bill should pass. The causes of this war had been the subject of much discussion. It was not necessary for him to enter on that wide field. The subject of slavery or negro stealing was alleged as one of the causes of the war.

The speaker here interrupted Mr. W. saying that it was not in order to enter on that course of remark.

Mr. Warren said that he had no disposition to transgress the rules of the house; and that as he was not permitted now to go into a reply to remark which had been made, he would reserve that right to himself until some future period when the house might be so constituted, and where a more latitudinarian discussion might be allowed.

Mr. W. then proceeded to make a few general remarks on the amendment and the questions involved in it—urging earnestly the adoption of it, and, in conclusion, said that as he had made no remarks which could call for a rejoinder, he would move the previous question. But, at the request of several gentlemen, Mr. W. withdrew the call. Mr. Johnson renewed it.

And the question being put, there was a second time a division. And the question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Thompson, as modified at the suggestion of Mr. Graham. It was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows: yeas 136, nays 14.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and being engrossed, it was forthwith read the third time.

And the previous question was ordered, on motion of Mr. Johnson.

And the question on its passage was then put, and passed in the affirmative.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

Mr. Jones then moved to suspend the rules so as to go into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and take up the general appropriation bill for the service of the year 1841.

Mr. Care Johnson suggested that the business on the speaker's table had better be first disposed of. The question was then put on Mr. Jones's motion, and carried.

The house then in committee of the whole proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government for the year 1841. Mr. Bell, of Tennessee, was called in the chair of the committee.

Some explanations took place between Messrs. Crabb and Jones, of Virginia, in relation to the item appropriated for $25,000 "for stationery, fuel, printing, and all other contingent expenses of the senate;" after which, Mr. Lincoln called upon the chairman of the committee of ways and means (Mr. Jones) to produce any estimates, if he had any, in relation to the following item:

"For stationery, fuel, printing and all other contingent expenses of the house of representatives, $25,000."

Mr. Jones replied that he had no estimate beyond those which had been furnished by the clerk of the house.

Mr. Stanley was understood to inquire whether the stationery for which money was now to be appropriated had been purchased.

Mr. Anderson called for the estimates referred to. Mr. Jones, in reply, placed on the clerk's table a statement from the clerk, containing the estimates referred to, amongst which was the item of $10,000 for the purchase of stationery for the next Congress.

Mr. Jones then moved to reduce the above sum of $25,000 to $15,000—i. e., striking out the $10,000 for stationery for the next Congress.

Mr. Lincoln, after stating that the house would bear him witness that he had not yielded to that senescery cry of economy which deemed such just appropriations as might be required to carry on the various branches of the public business, proceeded to comment upon the abuses which had crept into this system of contingent expenditures. He believed that all the abuses which had crept into the administration of the public trusts of the country, had their source in abuses under the head of contingencies.

After specifying two or three instances, Mr. L. expressed the belief that it was time to inquire whether it was necessary to expend $150,000 a year for contingent expenses over and above pay and mileage. The house had no control over these expenditures of its contingent funds. The committee of sections had the expenditures of the public money paid and received before they were laid before the committee, and when it was too late to do any thing in regard to them. Hence it followed that whenever the clerk of the house, without control or accountability, was left to apply the funds, the house had nothing to do but to ratify and sanction his acts. There ought, in Mr. L.'s opinion, to be some committee appointed which should have charge of these matters, before the expenditures were made.

Mr. Johnson, of New York, addressed the committee at much length on the subject of the abuses which had crept into this branch of the public expenditures, and of the gross impositions that had been perpetrated on the public treasury, in the purchase of paper or paper of contract made with subscribers of lithography, &c. declaring his own freedom from responsibility in these matters, as a member of the committee of accounts, by reason of the peculiar constitution of that committee.

Mr. Profit stated that, on a calculation made by him he found that the stationery bill for this session alone was about $25,000, which was at the rate of $100 for every member of the house. He was satisfied that it would pay for a stationery bill of every gentleman this year, and he hoped that some member, better skilled in these things, would make an estimate and submit it to the action of the committee.

Mr. Underwood said that some years ago he was on a committee appointed to investigate into this very subject; and, after a minute examination, the committee had come to the conclusion that there was but one remedy, and that was, to have the committee suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Profit). He (Mr. U.) had intended to suggest to the committee a proposition that "in lieu of stationery and newspapers, each member of Congress should be allowed $25,000 for printing, and the committee could fill up the blank with any sum that might be computed to be proper. This was the only remedy. The same complaints had been made year after year, and would continue to be made until the end of time unless some such plan as this was adopted.

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, gave to the committee such information as had been in possession of the committee of ways and means in regard to these estimates, and stated that the estimates of the clerk had been reduced, in the committee, $25,000 below the amount contained in those which had been read at the clerk's table. The committee had supposed that the amount now asked for was about the proper sum, in that they had looked with a proper eye to economy—an object which he was as desirous to promote, when it could be properly done, as any other gentleman. Mr. J. then referred in certain portions of the arguments of Mr. Johnson, contending that blame, if blame there was, should rest in the proper quarter, and that it did not belong where the gentleman had said it.

Mr. Jones then said, also, in reply to parts of the observations of Mr. Johnson, of New York, in relation to the prices of paper, and the action of the committee of accounts, &c.: vinding the door for occasional explanations to Messrs. Johnson, of New York, Lincoln and Grinnell.

Mr. Graham moved to amend the amendment by striking out the whole item of $25,000 as the only way of putting an end to the abuses which were undoubtedly practised was to withhold the appropriation. The sum of $100,000 had already been appropriated for contingent expenses, &c. (by a former bill), and that was enough.

Mr. Everett said there were two modes at present by which the extravagance in the finances of the house could be arrested. The first was to adopt the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Graham). He (Mr. E.) had put a question to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Johnston), in regard to the amount of stationery now on hand. He (Mr. E.) believed there was enough to carry them through this session, and for the commencement of the next.

Another mode within the power of the house was to bring in a resolution to proceed in the election of clerk. It was a course which every department took, where it was found that persons in charge of funds had misapplied them. It would be so, were it not for the late period of the session.

But to be dissipated of making general laws in an appropriation bill.

Mr. Morgan, believing that there was stationery enough on hand to meet present and immediate purposes, was understood to say he was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina. He went into some statements, which he concluded by saying that he was opposed to giving further power to the present clerk, because he had no confidence that that officer would do justice to the house, or make its purchases with economy.—And he gave notice that he would, at the proper time, offer the following amendment:

Resolved, in the future, the delivery of every description to members of the house, the postmaster shall keep an account of the articles delivered to each member, the price thereof, and the clerk of the house shall insert in his annual report the contingent expenses, the aggregate amount of the value of stationery received by the members respectively.

Resolved, a member of the committee of accounts, went into some statements in relation to the action of that committee, and insisted that the contracts made by the present clerk had been safer, honest, and more economical than those of any other. As to the motion to strike out the amendment, he (Mr. F.) had no objection to it, and supposed that the clerk had not.

The debate was carried on at great length, embracing the contracts of last session with Mr. Langreth, the prices which that paper had been paid for, &c. and the reports of the majority and minority of the committee of accounts of the last session on the subject.

Mr. L. Williams supported at some length the motion of Mr. Graham. Mr. Tillman also expressed his desire to vote for the amendment of Mr. Graham, though he did not wish to vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Lincoln).

Mr. Lincoln here said that his only object in submitting his motion was to bring the matter to the consideration of the house, and, that being done, he would now accept the amendment of Mr. Graham, as a modification of his own.

And the question being on the amendment as modified—Mr. Tillman then gave notice of his intention, if the amendment failed, to offer the following:

Resolved, nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize or sanction any contract for stationery or other articles of merchandise, for the use of the ensuing congress, by any officer of the present congress to an amount exceeding the whole to be appropriated.

Mr. Adams sent to the clerk's table a letter from an individual of the name of "Stone," in relation to the prices of lithography.

The letter (Mr. A. said) was rather collateral to the question; he had had it in his possession for three months, but had had no opportunity of presenting it; and (he was understood to add) he despaired of doing any good by presenting it.

The letter was then read.

Mr. Byrnes declared himself ready to vote for the amendment as modified; and then entered upon some remarks in vindication of the clerk, and of the injustice of impugning his character or course, without a proper investigation by committee or otherwise, into the true state of the facts.

Mr. Evans contended that this fund (the estimates for which had already been reduced $25,000 by the committee of ways and means) was not more than sufficient to pay the charges that would be made upon it; and he repudiated, with much animation, the charges which the house made against itself in the shape of corruption and plunder.

He did not say there might not have been individual instances of abuse. If any man has been guilty of that, it was his own matter. But he did not believe that on just appropriations of stationery amounted, in a long session, to more than three thousand dollars. His experience was that there was no such waste, and plundering, and extravagance as they were charging themselves with. He was opposed to striking out the appropriation; it was no more than was necessary. The estimate, as he had stated, had already been reduced $25,000 in the committee of ways and means, and that, he thought, was what the secretary of the treasury would call a "vigorous reduction." If gentlemen were willing to dispense with stationery altogether, so he was—he was most willing then he was to receive $20 for his share, or to put a law upon the statute book denouncing themselves.

Mr. Evans thanked the gentleman from Maine (Mr. Evans) for his speech; it contained precisely his own sentiments, though much better expressed. The gentleman deserved the thanks of this house for the manner in which he had vindicated its character.

Mr. Underwood replied to Mr. Evans, explaining and vindicating his own course, and contending that that gentleman's argument amounted only to this—let us not put this thing on the statute book; if we do, it will be the eyes of all eyes. He contended that the people were not ignorant of these matters; that they were turning their attention to them. It was his mission to suppose that they were turning their eyes to them. Nothing could be so doing involved an abuse of the people's money. He denied that he had said or done any thing calculated to reflect upon any man. He had denounced no one as a plunderer. He had merely been willing to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Proffit) a way by which the abuse could be remedied.

The question was discussed further by Messrs. Tillman, Everett, and Lincoln.

After a short discussion, on subsequent examination, he found that his original motion was the proper one; and he again modified his proposition so as to reduce the item from $25,000 to $15,000 (i. e. striking out all that was applicable to the next session).

And the question being taken, the amendment, thus modified was agreed to.

So the item was reduced from $25,000 to 15,000 dollars.

Curtis then moved that the committee rise. The motion having prevailed, the committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. Burks laid on the table a resolution proposing to revive the select committee of the last session for the purpose of making a report of certain matters by the clerk for stationery, engraving, lithography, &c. so as to enable the committee to make report of the proceedings, which they did not do at the last session.

The resolution was read.

Mr. Stanley said he had something to say in relation to the doings of the committee proposed to be revived, and which he should take an opportunity of saying when the resolution came up for consideration.

O'clock, A. M.

Friday, Feb. 12. The bill from the senate supplementary to the bill to encourage the introduction and promote the culture of tropical plants was read the third time and passed.

Numerous bills and reports were reported to the house and referred.

A bill was reported a bill providing for the sale of the real estate of infants in certain cases—committed for to-morrow.

Also a bill to provide for the arrest and detention of, and demand of fugitives from justice; which bill was referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Beine reported, without amendment, the bill from the senate to extend the charter of the bank of Alexandria; which bill was read and committed to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Haysan, reported the bill from the senate to authorize the secretary of the treasury to make an arrangement or compromise with any of the securities on bonds given to the U. States by Samuel Swartwout, and said he was instructed by the committee to move that it be read a third time and passed.

Mr. Hoffman explained the propriety of this bill, and showed the necessity for an early action on it. The bill was read. Mr. Underwood advocated the bill. Mr. James moved the previous question. The bill was then read a third time, and passed, under the rule, go to the committee of the whole.

The speaker did not think the bill must of necessity go through a committee of the whole house before it could be reported. He was in favor of considering the matter; question would be on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Williams, of N. C. appealed, and was proceeding to debate the report, when the speaker said that the call for the previous question prevented debate on the appeal.

Mr. Williams then moved that the bill lie on the table. The question on this motion was decided by yeas and nays, yeas 66, nays 36.

Mr. Stanley, in pursuance of notice heretofore given by him, asked leave to introduce a bill to provide for paying to the states the fourth instalment under the deposit act.

The question whether the leave asked was taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, J. W. Allen, Baker, Boardman, Brockway, Casey, Clinn, Clendenen, Clark, J. Cooper, Crampton, E. D. Davis, Deane, J. Davis, Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, Gales, Giddings, Gould, Graves, Grinnell, Hall, Henry, Hoffman, James, C. Johnson, W. C. Johnson, Kempshall, Lane, Lincoln, McCarty, F. Mallory, Mason, McNairy, Moore, Morgan, C. Morris, Morrow, Osborn, Peck, Randall, Hadden, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Simonson, Stuart, Truman, Van Buren, Van Dusen, Talcott, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Tolland, Trippett, Underwood, E. D. White, Lewis, Williams, C. H. Williams, Winthrop—63.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Batsy, Black, Boyd, A. B. Brown, Wm. O. Butler, Byrum, J. Campbell, Carroll, Chapman, Clifford, Connor, N. C. Cooper, William K. Cooper, Crab, Griffin, Gross, John Davis, Doan, Drummond, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fisher, Floyd, Gerry, Goggin, Griffin, Hammond, Hood, John Hastings, Hawley, Hawkins, Hilditch, Hodge, H. H. Johnson, Johnson, Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Lee, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McCallen, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Montoya, S. W. Morris, Parrott, Farmer, Payson, Pease, Perkins, Reynolds, Shaw, Edw. Rogers, James Rogers, Samuel, Rivers, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Stearns, Stoddard, Stoughton, Sullivan, Talcott, Thompson, Turney, Vanderpool, Vroom, D. D. Watkins, Werren, Waterson, Welker, Wick, J. W. Williams, Henry Williams—33.

Mr. Oakley moved that the house go into committee of the whole on the state of the union, for the purpose of taking into consideration the bill to make compensation for French spoliation. Several members objected, and he withdrew the motion.

Mr. Jameson moved that the committee on private claims, reported the bill from the senate to continue in force the act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri, approved 9th July, 1832, and the act supplementary thereto, approved 2d March, 1837, and the committee on the subject of the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Adams from the committee on manufactures, moved that the bill for the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports be made a special order of the day for the 22d day of February next.

The motion was decided by yeas and nays. The result was as follows—yeas 66, nays 59.

Mr. Kemble, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill to authorize the enlistment of boys in the army; which was twice read and committed to the committee of the whole house to-morrow. Mr. K. from the same committee reported a joint resolution to direct the printing of a map of the northern territory, which was twice read, and committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. K. from the same committee, reported a bill to reimburse the state of Vermont for services of its militia in the war of 1812, and to be committed to the whole house on the state of the union. Mr. K. from the same committee, reported a bill to authorize the enlistment of militia in Florida for one year; which was committed to the committee of the whole house.

Mr. Cushing, from the committee on foreign affairs, reported the bill from the senate regulating commercial intercourse with the port of Cayenne, in the colony of French Guiana, and to certain duties; which was twice read and committed to the whole of the state of the union. Mr. C. from the same committee, reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the president of the U. States be requested, if it should be deemed expedient, to cause public service, to communicate to the house the documents and other information in possession of the executive regarding claims of citizens of the United States for the purchase of land.

The resolution was read and agreed to.

Mr. Clifford reported a bill to make further provision for the expense of the exploration and survey of the northeastern boundary; which was twice read and committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Morgan, reported adversely on the petition of citizens of Jacksonville, in Florida; also, on the petition of citizens of Georgia, in relation to the fact that certain persons may be tried in the courts of St. John's. These reports were laid on the table.

acted under the orders of his government, and that the vessel was "piratical," and the citizens murdered were outlaws—then there is not an Englishman whose heart would not beat high to avenge the wrong, and vindicate the rights of his country. The law here is the law here, and the law here is the law of nations, that sanctions the pursuit of independent nations, that sanctions the pursuit of independent nations to murder and arson over the soil and jurisdiction of one of the states of this confederacy. No greater wrong can be done to a country than the invasion of soil. If it can be done with impunity at one point, and one occasion, it can be done at another, and the nation that submits to it, finally sinks down into drivelling imbecility. If a representation of the state of things at Schiowar, and the conduct of the citizens who had control of the Caroline, had first been made to the proper authorities of New York, or of the United States, then there would have been some show at least of respect for our sovereignty and independence, and a disposition to treat us as an equal. But in this case, as if to treat our authorities, with contempt, there was no preliminary demand or representation made.

It was hoped that the outrage was perpetrated by a party in sudden heat and excitement, upon their own responsibility. But the British minister now avows that "the act was the public act of persons obeying the constituted authorities of her majesty's province," and again affirms that "it was a public act of persons in her majesty's service, obeying the orders of their superior authorities." If it had been the first and only point of collision with Great Britain it might not have excited such interest, but there is no assumption in most of our intercourse with that great power, revolving to the pride and spirit of independence in free republics, that it is her desire to preserve peace, but true policy would be to do justice, and show that courtesy to equals which she has always demanded from others. The committee do not desire to press views on this part of the subject, particularly the demand has been made by our government, upon the government of Great Britain for explanation as to the outrage committed, the answer to which it is hoped will prove satisfactory.

As to the other points presented in the demand made by the British minister for the "liberation" of Alexander McLeod, the committee believe the facts of the case to be, that the steamboat was seized and burnt as stated before, and that a citizen or citizen of New York were murdered in the affray. And the British minister charged, that the vessel was particeps criminis. He was at first arrested, and upon various testimony being taken, was then discharged. He was afterwards arrested a second time. Upon the evidence then presented, he was imprisoned to await his trial. There was an invasion of British territory to seize or take him. But upon his being voluntarily within our territory, he was arrested as any citizen of the United States, charged with a similar offence, might have been. We know of no law of nations that would exempt a man from arrest and imprisonment for offences charged to be committed against the "peace and dignity" of a state, because he is a subject of Great Britain, or because he committed the crime at the instigation or under the authority of British provincial officers; much less do we know of any law that would justify the president to deliver him up without trial, at the demand and upon the assertion as to facts, of any agent of the British government. If we had been at open war with Great Britain, and McLeod had committed the offence charged, he might have fallen under the rules and regulations of war, and been treated as a prisoner of the United States government, and would have been subject to the laws of nations in war.

But as the alleged criminal acts, in which McLeod is charged to be implicated, were committed in profound peace, it is a crime, as far as he may be concerned, solely against the "peace and dignity" of the state of New York, and her criminal jurisdiction is completely and exclusively committed by her to be such as to make a man hostis humani generis—an outlaw—a pirate, in the legal acceptance of the term, then under the law of nations, the United States courts and tribunals would have jurisdiction. But the case charged, is not a crime committed as it was in time of peace, as far as this individual was concerned was one purely against the lex loci, and coming exclusively within the criminal jurisdiction of the tribunals of New York.

The minister, in his letter of the 13th Dec. 1840, says "it is quite notorious that Mr. McLeod was not one of the party engaged in the destruction of the steamboat Caroline; and that the pretended charge upon which he has been imprisoned rests only upon the partial testimony of certain Canadian witnesses, whose statements and motives may be peruse at will as so; and that it would be asking a great deal to require an American court to yield jurisdiction, and surrender up a prisoner charged with offences against the law, upon the mere ipse dixit of any man, no matter how high its authority. Whether McLeod be guilty or not guilty, is the very point upon which an American jury alone have a right to decide. Jurisdiction in such tribunals over criminal cases, and trial by jury of the verum, are essential points in American jurisprudence. And it is a total misapprehension as to the nature of our system to suppose that there is any right to exercise so exclusive to arrest the verdict of the one or thwart the jurisdiction of the other. If such a power existed, and were exercised, it would effectually overthrow, and upon a vital point, the separate sovereignty and independence of these states. The federal executive might be clothed with power to deliver up fugitives from justice for offences committed against a foreign state, but even then it might not be obligatory to do so, unless it were made matter of treaty stipulation. This duty and right in an executive has generally been considered as dormant, until made binding by treaty arrangement. But when the matter is reversed, and demand is made, out of fugitives from justice for offences committed against a foreign power, but for the satisfaction of a man charged with crimes against the peace and dignity of one of our own states, then it is, that the demand becomes preposterous in the extreme. The fact that the offences were committed under the sanction of provincial authorities does not justify the federal executive in assuming to exercise such cases as the present, the power to deliver up could not be conferred upon the federal executive by treaty stipulation.

It could not be conferred in those cases over which jurisdiction is clearly delegated to the federal constitution. Such, for instance, as treason, which is an offence against the conjoined sovereignty of the states, as defined in the constitution. Over all cases except those defined in the constitution, and those coming clearly within the laws of nature, the states have exclusive jurisdiction, and the trial and punishment for offences against them, are incident to their separate sovereignty. It is not pretended in this case that there is any treaty stipulation under which the demand is made; and the federal executive, under our system, has no power but what is conferred by the constitution, or by special law of congress. In the former it is declared that "the executive power is vested in a president of the U. States," and that power is then pointed out and defined. In the latter, the power is then passed from such duties as are thought proper and expedient by congress.

Your committee deem it dangerous for the executive to exercise any power over a subject-matter not conferred by treaty or by law, and to exercise it in any case in conflict with state jurisdiction, would be worse than dangerous; it would be usurpation.

But your committee forbear to press these points further at present, and they would not have said as much on such clear questions of international law, but that to this case, the demand for liberation has been made by the accredited agent of a great power, and under circumstances of peculiar aggravation and excitement.

We have other points of difference with Great Britain, which add interest to every question that arises between us at present. Neither our northern or northwestern boundaries are yet settled with her, and the subject is not entirely free from difficulty. She has recently seized our vessels and exercised her power in extending to and exercising in any case in conflict with state jurisdiction, would be worse than dangerous; it would be usurpation. But your committee forbear to press these points further at present, and they would not have said as much on such clear questions of international law, but that to this case, the demand for liberation has been made by the accredited agent of a great power, and under circumstances of peculiar aggravation and excitement.

All these subjects make every question between us, at this peculiar juncture, of the deepest interest. Besides this, we are both permanently destined to exercise the most extensive and exclusive commercial navigation. Our flags float side by side, over every sea, and bay, and inlet of the known globe.

She moves stealthily upon her objects with an ambition that knows no bounds. And wherever she has a conflict of interest she has rarely yielded to the power of the United States.

At this moment she presents to the civilized world the spectacle of the greatest military and commercial power in combination ever known.

Her power positions in the western quarter of the globe, and her peculiar commercial system, she has made the reservoir of the wealth of nations.

Her internal resources, capital, labor and machinery, with her capital, are beyond calculation. Her natural position, being about midway the coast of Europe, gives her great control over the outlets and currents of commerce.

Her military occupation of Gibraltar, Malta, the Ionian island, and recently of St. Jean d'Acre, gives her ascendancy on the Mediterranean and the Levant, while St. Helena and the Cape of Good Hope give her possession over the current of trade along these extensive seas. Then Bombay, Calcutta, and her immense possession in the East Indies, together with her recent movements in the China seas and islands, enable her to extend her power over those vast regions that have slumbered for ages in solitary and enervated magnificence. She possesses the Falkland islands, but to control the commerce that passes around Cape Horn—while Trinidad gives her all she desires in the Caribbean sea. Halifax, at one point, and Bermuda at another, stand out in great force over our own coast from one extremity of the other.

Her positions all over the world are at this moment in a military point of view, equal to a million of men under arms. Her continual conflicts in the mighty regions of the east, only improve her officers to become better acquainted with the art of war, while her great armies, and extensive fleets draw their support from the immense countries seized and occupied. In the present juncture of affairs, no statesman can overlook these things.—Steam power is but a few years old, and we so near together, that in the event of any future war, the war with its effects will be precipitated upon us with much more rapidly than formerly.

Avarice and ambition are the ruling passions of our age, and it is vain to shut our eyes to the state of things around us. It remains to be seen what effect steam power is to have upon changing and modifying the whole art of defence and war. It may be a great engine for again leveling mankind, and reducing every nation to a contest of mere physical force. In that event it might be difficult to conjecture what system of national defence will stand the test of time and experience.

We have a deep stake in peace, and fondly hope the repose of the world will not be disturbed. We have certainly no wish to see any rupture. Firmness, and a wise preparation, will long preserve us from such a catastrophe. But while no temptation should ever prompt us to do injustice on the one hand, so no consideration on the other hand, should ever induce us to permit to ourselves anything from any power on earth, no matter what the consequences may be.

Your committee would conclude by expressing a firm belief that all our points of difficulty may be honorably and amicably adjusted, and that harmony may long be preserved by both governments pursuing a liberal and generous policy, congenial to the interests and feelings of both people, and compatible with the spirit and genius of an enlightened age.

Mr. Pickens moved that the report be laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. Everett suggested the propriety of collecting and printing together, in one pamphlet, all the documents upon the subject.

Mr. Hanes objected to the reception of the report, unless it was in order to make it so. The speaker said the report could not be received, unless by consent of all parties. Mr. Hanes then objected.

Several members suggested that it was now too late to make the objection, as the report was actually before the committee, and no objections had been made and entertained respecting it.

The speaker had decided that the objection should have been made when Mr. Pickens proposed to submit the report; that, not hearing any objection, he had received the report, and propositions were entertained respecting it; and that it was now too late to raise the objection.

The report having been read, Mr. Everett moved that all the documents, a list of which he furnished, should be printed together, and the report.

Mr. Granger moved to divide the question, which being granted, and the question for printing being debatable, he entered into a discussion in opposition to the report. He was followed by Mr. Pickens, in a warm and eloquent defence of the report.

After he had concluded, Messrs. Adams, Bennett, Grinnell and Willmore participated in the debate.—[The debate is one of profound interest, and we regret that we have not room for it this week; but we shall give it in our next issue.]—After the latter had concluded, the question occurred on printing the documents; which was lost. The house refusing to print them with the report.

The question then occurred on printing the report, which was carried in yeas 63, and nays 68. And, at twenty minutes after four o'clock, the house adjourned.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The steamship St. Andrew, arrived at Boston on Monday morning, at half past seven o'clock, from Liverpool, which place she left on the evening of the 4th of February. After experiencing boisterous weather and head winds during the greater part of the passage, she vessel touched at Halifax on Saturday evening the 20th instant, and arrived below at Boston on Sunday night. The Britannia brought eighty-five passengers.

Considering the space of time over which the dates extend, the matter is of very little interest. There is nothing later from China.

The eastern question is settled. The intelligence was received in London on the 1st instant in despatches from Admiral Stoddard, in which it is stated, that Commodore Aspin had arranged affairs with great success at Alexandria, that the power of the Turkish fleet was given up to Admiral Walker on the 11th January, and that Mehemet Ali had completely submitted to the sultan. And on the 12th of January one of the officers of the sultan's fleet, Constantine, the commander of the fleet, by which his highness officially acceded to Mehemet Ali's hereditary possession of Egypt.

It further appears that Ibrahim's army was immediately to evacuate Syria and to return to Egypt, and arrangements had been made to send transports to Caïra, to bring away the women and children, and sick of the army.

The arrival of the Cambridge, of 8th January, and the accounts she carried of the bad condition of the United States bank of Pennsylvania, and the ill in its stock—excited much uneasiness in London. What will it be when the whole truth is known?

The British parliament assembled on the 20th inst. and was opened by the queen in person. Her speech on this occasion is more remarkable for what it does not say than for what it does. The absence of allusion to the state of the relations between England and France is the omission to which we have already alluded. The French paper the original draught of the speech a friendly paragraph towards France, but that a few hours before the opening of parliament an account of the two projects of law presented to the chamber of deputies, the one calling for a levy of $2,000,000, and the other providing for the organization of an army of reserve, had been received and was the cause of the studied silence observed in the speech.

The French papers comment on the omission of any allusion to France.

The French funds declined in consequence of the unfavorable impression produced by the speech. The reports of the debates on it had not then reached Paris.

The publication in the Paris papers subsequently of the debates on the address seem to have satisfied the Paris guardians.

The debate on the fortifications of Paris in the chamber of deputies of France, had been very animated but had not yet terminated. The opposition to the Guizot administration continues fierce and unrelenting.

GRATY HATH.

Speech of the British queen. The British parliament met on the 26th of January. Her majesty attended in person, and read from the throne the following gracious speech, with good emphasis and good effect.

My lords and gentlemen: I have the satisfaction to receive from foreign powers assurances of their friendly disposition, and of their earnest desire to maintain peace.

The posture of affairs in the Levant had long been a cause of uneasiness and a source of danger to the general tranquillity. With a view to avert the evils which a continuance of that state of things was calculated to occasion, I concluded with the emperor of Austria, the king of Prussia, the emperor of Russia, and the sultan, a convention intended to effect a pacification of the Levant, and maintain the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire, and thereby afford additional security to the peace of Europe.

I have given directions that this convention shall be laid before you.

I rejoice to be able to inform you, that the measures which have been adopted in execution of these engagements have been attended with signal success. I trust that the objects which the contracting parties had in view are on the eve of being completely accomplished.

In the course of these transactions, my naval forces have co-operated with those of the emperor of Austria, and with the land and sea forces of the sultan, and have displayed upon all occasions their accustomed gallantry and skill.

Having deemed it necessary to send to the coast of China, a naval and military force to demand reparation and redress for injuries inflicted upon some of my subjects by the officers of the emperor of China, and for indignities offered to an agent of my crown, I at the same time appointed plenipotentiaries to treat upon these matters with the Chinese government.

These plenipotentiaries were by the last account in negotiation with the government of China, and it will be a source of much gratification to me, if that government shall be induced by its own sense of justice to bring these matters to a speedy settlement in an amicable arrangement.

Serious differences have arisen between Spain and Portugal about the execution of a treaty concluded by those powers in 1835, for regulating the navigation of the Douro. But both parties have accepted my mediation, and I hope to be able to effect a reconciliation between them upon terms honorable to both.

I have concluded with the Argentine confederation, and with the republic of Hlyly, treaties for the promotion and assistance of my parliament. I have directed to be laid before you.

Gentlemen of the house of commons: I have directed the estimates of the year to be laid before you. However scrupulous of the importance of adhering to the principles of economy, I feel it to be my duty to recommend that adequate provision be made for the exigencies of the public service.

My lords and gentlemen: Measures will be submitted to you without delay which have for their object to secure the regular and regular administration of justice. The vital importance of this subject is sufficient to insure for it your early and most serious consideration.

The powers of the commissioners appointed under the act for the amendment of the law relating to the poor, have expired at the termination of the present year. I feel assured that you will earnestly direct your attention to enactments which so deeply concern the interests of the community.

It is always with entire confidence that I recur to your wisdom and assistance in my parliament. I place my reliance upon your wisdom, loyalty and patriotism, and I humbly implore of Divine Providence that all your counsels may be so directed as to advance the great interest of morality and religion, to promote the welfare and happiness of all classes of my subjects.

At the conclusion of the speech, the queen retired from the house. Upon the reassembling of the lords, Lord Russell proposed the usual address. He commented upon the queen's continued maintenance of peace, and gave credit to the measures of the government for securing it. In the Levant, in China, in India, the efforts of the government had been attended with success, while the nation prospered and extended at home. The restoration of credit in the United States, he said, was another subject of congratulation, and while the cessation of the blockade in the South American ports would render communications with that country, the recognition of Texas would open a new and most extensive field for enterprise.

Lord Hrougham replied that he felt compelled to notice a passage in the speech of the mover of the address, in which he congratulated them upon "the unabated assurance received from all foreign powers of their disposition to maintain the most friendly relations with this country." There was no passage to that effect in the speech from the throne, although there had been last year, and the omission suggested to his mind the most gloomy apprehensions. He feared that a material change had taken place in the relations with France, that an interruption had occurred to the good understanding which had existed for ten years, and that an alliance so well calculated to promote peace throughout the world was in danger. The alliance between England and France gave the only competent security for Turkey against the designs of Russia, and the cessation of that alliance would be an evil, which no success in arms, however brilliant could compensate. He feared that the alienation which had long existed between France and Russia might, in case of any estrangement with the latter, give way to a new course of policy, and that these two powers might combine for the furtherance of their joint interests. He trusted that neither in France nor in England would it be thought that the war for an instant felt indifferent to the evils of peace.

The duke of Wellington expressed his approval of the course of foreign policy which had been adopted. He had long viewed with anxiety the dangers that were likely to result from the state of affairs in the Levant, and he rejected to think that those dangers would be now averted, and that France would join with the other powers in carrying out measures for continuance.

In the house of commons, on moving the address to the queen, an animated debate arose on the posture of British foreign affairs, both the speakers upon both sides seemed to insist on the necessity of providing friendly relations with France. Sir Robert Peel complained that the queen had made no reference in her speech to the affairs of Canada, to the United States, boundary question, and the repeal agitation in Ireland. The addresses to the queen were carried in both houses without amendment.

Money market. The public securities were much depressed, on the 1st, by the intelligence received in London, respecting the United States bank. The sales of the Saturday previous, to the extent of £100,000, had some influence on the prices of stocks.

The late news from America, relative to the affairs of the bank of the United States, has produced some anxiety among those interested in American affairs; but although there seems to be no doubt that the accounts are correct in so far as they state that the American money market was depressed, and that the shares of the bank had fallen, there is great reason to believe that the assertion, "of all confidence in the institution being gone," is unfounded, and we have no difficulty in stating that the statement of the immediate assets and liabilities is fallacious.

The house of Garry and Cutts, a leading firm in the Riga trade, has stopped payment. Their engagements are stated at £60,000.

Cotton markets. Liverpool, 4th February, 1841. Referring back to our circular of the 13th ult. we have to advise that the cotton market continued firm and steady up to about the 19th ult. when prices fell, and continued so until the 27th, with a decline in prices of 4s.

The sales for the week ending 13th ult. were 31,470 bales, and for the week ending 20th ult. they were 36,050, and for the week ending 27th ult. 34,620 bales. Of the latter 3,800 were Upland at 67; 14,170; Orleans at 57½; with some choice lots of fancy marks, at 67½; 1,450 Alabama and Mobile at 67½; and 790 S. S. Island at 156½. For the past four days the last average has been estimated at about 20,000 bales, about 4,800 of it to speculators, but yesterday's portion of the sales was only about 2,500 bales, and none of it to speculators. For Upland may now be quoted 62½; and for Orleans and Mobile, 61 per lb.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers of the 31st January are occupied chiefly by the discussions on the fortifications of the capital. An amendment to the project proposing to limit the works to detached forts, placed at 4,000 yards distance from the present wall, was rejected late on Saturday by 236 votes against 173. This was considered decisive of the law, which will no doubt pass, and M. Thiers and the king of the French will both have carried their point of enclosing Paris with a fort of about twenty fortresses, connected by an entrenched wall.

Death of an American consul in France. Died on Sunday evening, January 31, in Paris, in the 65th year of his age, of typhoid exhaustion, Peter W. Daniel Brent, esq. consul of the United States of America for Paris, and agent of American claims.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

Letters and papers from Lisbon to the 18th January announce that, so far as Portugal is concerned, the Douro question may be considered as settled; for although the opposition members of the chamber of deputies had thrown obstacles in the way of its adjustment by absenting themselves from the chamber, the several articles of the convention had been fully discussed, and the measures finally approved, on the 16th.

The correspondent of the Morning Chronicle thinks, however, that Spain is bent upon a quarrel; and will find other pretexts, though the present be removed.

The Globe, of Cadiz, of the 18th ult. mentions that the garrison had retired, and compelled the city intendant to deliver up to the military authorities the funds placed at his disposal for public service. This journal endeavors to excuse the conduct of the troops, by observing that they were left without either clothes or shoes, and reduced to depend on public subscriptions for maintenance.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

GEN. HARRISON AT RICHMOND. The Richmond Compiler of yesterday states that General Harrison has mingled freely with the citizens, during his sojourn at the capital, and that the people of the old Virginia city—with all courtesy, respect and hospitality—without the pomp and parade which are the characteristics of public demonstrations in many other states. The general, it is added, bears up bravely under the excitement and consequent fatigue of the incessant collision with company, and the constant exercise of his colloquial powers.

A dinner was given to Gen. Harrison at the log cabin on Saturday, at which the president was present. Gov. Gilmer was among the guests. In response to a sentiment of the company, after removal of the cloth, Gen. Harrison made a speech which is characterized as forcible, and replete with wisdom and sound sense.

Gen. Harrison was to remain at Richmond yesterday, and would be present at the interesting reception of the presentation of the awards, to the nine gallant officers of the land and naval service, to whose heroism in the time of trial, these testimonials have been awarded. To-day, it was the purpose of the president elect, to set out for the old mansions of the Harrison family on James River, to spend a few days with his relatives, before assuming the responsible duties of the station to which he has been elevated.

The Whig says:—General Harrison arrived in Richmond on Wednesday evening in the northern car, and was received by mayor Lambart and Mr. Lyons, president of the city. He then proceeded to the place of that association, and conducted to the Powhatan house, escorted by a large multitude. After arriving there, Gen. Harrison appeared for a few minutes at the balcony, but did not address the crowd. Gen. Harrison appears in decidedly better health than in 1836.

He was at the Merchants' Coffee house yesterday at noon, and at the Powhatan house between 10 and 12 o'clock, to receive his letters.

The Richmond papers state that on Thursday last General Harrison visited the Merchants' Coffee house, where he met a large number of citizens who had assembled to pay their respects to him. The Compiler states that in the brief address made by General Harrison he took occasion "to refer to the charge of abolitionism preferred against Mr. Granger, a member of his cabinet, that to be, He said, that Mr. Granger had seen the charge emanating from Richmond, and denied positively that he was an abolitionist, and remarked that if he should ever do any thing showing him to be one, it would be the duty of Gen. Harrison to reject him from his cabinet."

During the same day he also visited the house of delegates, then in session, and was introduced to many of the members.

VICE PRESIDENT TYLER. Gov. Tyler arrived in Richmond on Saturday, on his way, we presume, to the seat of the federal government. The senate of the United States convene on the 5th March in its simple executive capacity.

Mr. Tyler, we are gratified to find the vice president looking to well, having heard that he had recently been indisposed.

MR. BADGER, of N. Carolina, has accepted the offer of the post of secretary of the navy under the new administration.

FOREIGN RELATIONS. Case of L'Amistad. In the senate on Friday, a message was received from the president of the United States transmitting copies of correspondence between the state department and the representative of foreign governments relative to the negroes taken on board L'Amistad, which has occurred since his message of the 21st March, 1840.

[Globe.]

Washington, Jan. 20, 1841.

Sir: I am instructed to reply to the letter that the attention of her majesty's government has been necessarily directed to the case of certain African negroes, found on board the Spanish ship "Amistad," the same persons whose cause has been brought before the court of the United States, and who, in your opinion, a powerful and humane interest appears to be felt in this country as well as in England.

It is known to her majesty's government that these negroes were imported into Cuba direct from the coast of Africa, in the summer of 1839, and that, shortly after their arrival, they were purchased as slaves at the Havana by two Spaniards of the name of Jose Ruiz and Pedro Montez. Ruiz and Montez then placed the negroes on board the schooner Amistad, intending to convey them to another port in Cuba. It appears that during the voyage, the negroes with a view of recovering their liberty, seized possession of the vessel, put the master to flight, and ordered the remaining whites to navigate the vessel to the coast of Africa. The whites, however, directed their course towards North America, until they were fallen in with by the United States brig-of-war Washington, when the Amistad was first brought into the port of New London, Connecticut. The proceedings which have taken place subsequently to the arrival of the negroes in the U. States are sufficiently well known to you.

Now, her majesty's government laws to observe, that since the 1st of May, 1820, it has become unlawful, according to the law of Spain, to import negroes from Africa as slaves into the Spanish dominions, and that as the negroes here referred to had been newly imported from Africa into Cuba, and could not be lawfully imported as slaves, they must in the eye of the law be considered as free persons.

And Great Britain is also bound to remember that the law of Spain which finally prohibited the slave trade throughout the Spanish dominions, from the date of the 30th May, 1820 (the provisions of which law are contained in the king of Spain's royal cedula of the 10th December, 1817), was passed in compliance with a treaty obligation to that effect, by which the crown of Spain had bound itself to the crown of Great Britain, and for which a valuable compensation, in return, was given by Great Britain to Spain as may be seen by reference to the 2d, 3d and 4th articles of a public treaty concluded between Great Britain and Spain on the 23d of September, 1817.

Her majesty's government, therefore, are moved by special and secular reasons to take an interest in the fate of these unfortunate Africans, who are shown to have been illegally and feloniously reduced to slavery by subjects of Spain.

It is next to be observed that Great Britain and the United States have mutually engaged themselves to each other by the 10th article of the treaty of Ghent, to use the best endeavours to secure the abolition of the African slave trade. And there can be no doubt of the firm intention of both parties religiously to fulfil the terms of that engagement.

Now the unfortunate Africans whose case is the subject of the present representation, have been shown by accidental circumstances to be the wards of the authorities of the United States, and it may probably depend upon the action of the U. States government, whether these persons shall recover the freedom to which they are entitled, or whether they shall be reduced to slavery, in violation of known laws and contracts publicly passed, prohibiting the continuance of the African slave trade by Spanish subjects.

In these circumstances, that her majesty's government anxiously hope that the president of the United States will find himself empowered to take such measures in behalf of the aforesaid Africans as shall secure to them the possession of their liberty, to which, without doubt, they are by law entitled.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

H. S. FOX.

The hon. John Forsyth, &c. &c. &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

Department of State, Washington, Feb. 1, 1841. Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ultimo, in which you state that you are instructed to represent to me that the attention of her majesty's government has been necessarily directed to the case of the negroes of the Spanish ship "Amistad," and that you are desirous that the president of the United States will feel himself empowered to take such measures in their behalf as will secure to them the possession of their liberty.

Viewing this communication as an evidence of the benevolence of her majesty's government, under which aspect alone it could be entertained by the government of the United States, I proceeded by the direction of the president, to make, in reply, a few observations which I thought it appropriate to deliver. The narrative presented therein, of the circumstances which brought these negroes to our shores, is satisfactory evidence that her majesty's government is aware that their introduction did not proceed from the act of any individual, but from the agents of the United States. A formal demand having been made by the Spanish minister for the delivery of the vessel and property, including the negroes on board, the grounds upon which it is based have become the subject of discussion to the proper authorities of the country, which have not yet pronounced their final decision thereupon. You must be aware, sir, that the executive has neither the power nor the disposition to control the proceedings of the legal tribunals when acting within their appropriate jurisdiction. With regard to the other considerations presented by you in behalf of the negroes of the "Amistad," I have to remark that it is not understood that the facts upon which they are founded are admitted by the ministers of her Catholic majesty; and this government would, with great reluctance, erect itself into a tribunal to investigate such questions between two friendly sovereigns. If, however, these facts are established, they cannot be without the sanction of her majesty's government, and this government would, with great reluctance, erect itself into a tribunal to investigate such questions between two friendly sovereigns. If, however, these facts are established, they cannot be without the sanction of her majesty's government, and this government would, with great reluctance, erect itself into a tribunal to investigate such questions between two friendly sovereigns. If, however, these facts are established, they cannot be without the sanction of her majesty's government, and this government would, with great reluctance, erect itself into a tribunal to investigate such questions between two friendly sovereigns.

JOHN FORSYTH.

THE ARMY.

Movement of troops. One hundred and twenty recruits under the command of Lieut. Meek, U. S. A. arrived at Savannah on Saturday, 13th inst. in the ship Gaston, capt. Chadwick, and embarked on Sunday for Florida, in the steamer Iris, captain Paul.

Army surgeons—Official. An official notice appears in the Washington papers that a lord will convene at Philadelphia on the 25th of May, or as soon thereafter as practicable, for the purpose of examining and selecting a surgeon who may be ordered to appear before it, and such applications for appointment in the medical staff of the army as may be invited to attend. The board will consist of surgeon Mower, surgeon Finley, and surgeon McDougall.

THE ARMY.

Promotions. The names of forty-four passed midshipmen have been sent to the senate of the U. States for promotion to lieutenants. Also, thirty lieutenants for promotion to captains, and, if the old ratio is observed, ten commanders will be promoted to post captains. This will make a hole in the register, as they will no doubt be confirmed.

The Norfolk Beacon says:—We learn that Capt. McCauley will be the flag captain of the Dolphin, which ship is, as we have stated, destined for the Mediterranean station, and is to be commanded by commodore Morris, who is to take charge of the Mediterranean squadron.

It is rumored that Commodore Warrington is to succeed commodore Morris as president of the navy board.

STATES OF THE UNION.

MAINE.

War movement. The resolutions on the subject of repelling British invasion, offered in the house of representatives of Maine, have been taken up by the senate, and after being amended by inserting $1,000,000 instead of $400,000, for the defence of the state, was referred to the committee on the northeastern boundary. Mr. Davis then offered the following resolution, which was also referred to the committee on the northeastern boundary:

Be it resolved, That the president of the United States be requested and urged to cause the immediate removal of the foreign armed force, by which our state is invaded, stationed upon the upper territory of the St. John's, and that the government of the United States be earnestly invoked to relieve this state from the present heavy needless burthen of its own defence."

MASSACHUSETTS.

The hon. Rufus Choate has been nominated by a meeting of the whig members of the Massachusetts legislature as the successor of Mr. Webster in the U. S. senate.

The Massachusetts house of representatives have lately proposed the proposition to indemnify the proprietors of the nunnery burnt at Charlestown a few years since. The vote on the question of indefinite postponement was, yeas 207, ays 49.

NEW JERSEY.

U. S. senator. The hon. Jacob W. Miller, (W.) of Morris, N. J., has been elected to the United States senate for the term of six years from the 4th of March next, in the place of Mr. Wall, (V. B.) whose term of service then expires.

The Newark Advertiser says:—Mr. Miller is a distinguished member of the New Jersey bar, and has served with honor in both branches of the state legislature. His services in the legislative council during the exciting discussions of the last year, and his eloquent appeals to the people during the great political campaign which has terminated so happily for the country, furnish a sufficient guarantee that he will discharge the responsible duties of the high station to which he has now been called, with credit to himself and his native state. Hucceforth New Jersey will be fairly represented in the councils of the nation.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Banks. The resolutions suspending for 40 days the penalties imposed by recent acts in the case of bank suspensions, have passed the senate of Pennsylvania. The vote on final reading was—yeas 18, nays 14. They were then referred to the conference, on Saturday, and made the order of the day for the 1st of March. In the mean time, it is understood that the committee on banks will report a bill to the house, which bill, with the action thereon, may supersede the necessity of adopting these temporary resolutions.

In the house, Mr. Singer's resolution of inquiry, asking the governor to communicate all information in his possession, relative to the late suspension, was up on second reading, on Thursday, and was adopted.

The banks and the state. According to a table which has been carefully prepared by Mr. Lightner, of the state legislature, it appears that the state of Pennsylvania has within the last twenty years, received, either in bank dividends or bonuses, $7,133,755. The dividends on bank stock paid out by the state have, during the time named, 20 years, averaged 6 27 100 per cent.

MARYLAND.

Census. Our foreman arranged the position of the tables of the census of this state, on page 340, according to printers' rules for printing, but the effect was, to place the column of grand total, out of position; and on a transient glance at the table, a reader might mistake the "total numbers," to be the totals of the colored population only, instead of the aggregate of the entire population.

The results of the valuable statistics of the state, as collected, arranged and published by the marshal, whose duty it was to take the census of 1840, was inserted in the last number of the REGISTER.

It will be observed that there is no column of the totals of the white population, nor of the aggregate of colored population. In order to obviate the omission, and to place the progress of the population of the state in relation to some of its most interesting aspects, more fully before the readers of the NATIONAL REGISTER, we have prepared, and add a few additional statements of our own. Our motive for this, and for devoting more than an average space to the consideration of the statistics of the population of this single state, must be obvious. The attitude of Maryland in relation to her population is very peculiar, and should be at least as interesting and exceedingly interesting, not only to the people within her borders, but also to the people of the north, and still more so the people of the south.

Maryland may be considered as the very centre of the union—having for Capitol itself in what was the central territory. As between the northern and southern states, she is a kind of neutral ground, it being matter of dispute with which she ought to be classified. Some writers assume, that east of the Alleghenies, the Potomac as distinctly marks the central boundary between the north and south, as it is admitted that the Ohio does west of that range, and therefore classify Maryland as a northern state. Others recognise the artificial distinction which "MASON and DIXON'S LINE" affixes to the central boundary between the north and south, as it is admitted that the Ohio does west of that range, and therefore classify Maryland as a northern state. Others recognise the artificial distinction which "MASON and DIXON'S LINE" affixes to the central boundary between the north and south, as it is admitted that the Ohio does west of that range, and therefore classify Maryland as a northern state. Others recognise the artificial distinction which "MASON and DIXON'S LINE" affixes to the central boundary between the north and south, as it is admitted that the Ohio does west of that range, and therefore classify Maryland as a northern state.

But it is not only geographically that Maryland may be said to be the central state of this union. In several other particulars she is singularly so. Although in regard to dimensions, she is but the nineteenth state in the union, eighteen of the states having more, and seven states less territory than she has, yet to regard to population she is exactly in the medium, half the states having more, and the remainder less. In 1840 the population of Maryland in density of population, she is the fifth state of the union. The surface of the state, embraces about 13,950 square miles, of which nearly one-fifth is water.

In 1820, the total number of inhabitants in the union being 9,225,721, and there being then twenty-four states, the average was 411,072. The population of Maryland was then 407,350, which was the nearest approximation of any state in the union to the average. In 1830, the total population of the states of the union, divided by the number of states in the union, gives an average of 526,591. At that time Maryland having a population of 417,010, was nearer the average number than any state in the union, except the state of Georgia, which had a population of 508,419. In 1840 the population of the twenty-six states, divided by the latter number, gives an average of 628,806. The population of Maryland being 467,567, falls 167,239 below the average, and Alabama 479,111, Maine 401,798, S. Carolina 534,429, Georgia 618,106, the nearest to Maryland, Indiana 682,314, North Carolina 753,141, and Kentucky 777,359, seven states approximate nearer to the average than she does. But it will be recollected that under the constitution of the United States, the proportion of representation is regulated, not by the actual number of inhabitants, but by the total number of free persons, "added to three-fifths of all other persons." This is the difference between the actual population, and the "federal numbers" recognised in making apportionments, and by which the influence of Maryland in the general scale has been exalted of each census, about 40,000 below her actual numbers.

The total number of representatives in the first congress under our present constitution, was sixty-two, of which Virginia had ten; Massachusetts and Pennsylvania eight each; New York and Maryland six each; Connecticut, North Carolina and South Carolina five each; New Jersey four; Georgia three; Rhode Island and Delaware one each.

The number of representatives assigned to Maryland by the ratio of one for every 33,000, adopted under the census of 1790, was nine, and she maintained that number under the ratio of 33,000, adopted in 1800; of 35,000, adopted in 1810; and of 40,000, adopted in 1820; but under the ratio of 47,500 adopted in 1830 her representation was reduced to eight.

Twelve years since, in a publication then printed by the writer of this, in reference to the advantages of this state it was observed:—"Happily for Maryland, the political influence of a state is not entirely dependent upon its representation. Position is of great importance. Natural conveniences of navigation and an free sea. In both the respects as well as in the facilities offered for internal improvements and manufactures, Maryland has advantages unrivalled by any state in the union, except N. York, and might justly contend for the palm with that prosperous state, to which she is made inferior in extent only. Her political position as a central key-stone to the union, as partaking of the climate of both the sections, and able to resist to the pursuits of either or both, as having in her bosom, it not under the extent of the regular increasing capital of the nation with its vast advantages of a harbor, commanding an extent of coast, not indeed of sea coast, but of water course superior for domestic conveniences to any sea coast, and larger in extent than that of any other state, in having a key of communication with the north, the north-west and the west, not only equal, but fairly superior to that of N. York itself, and which will certainly be improved as soon as the people of the state are awakened to its vast advantages, possessing a capital city, which has had a growth as remarkable as that of any city of the world, and whose commerce has been so extended, that for population, enjoying a commerce which ranks the state as the third, and tonnage that elevates her as the second state in the union, not in proportion but in actual amount. In proportion to extent and population, Maryland has had a greater tonnage and a greater commerce than any state in the union. What would they be, if the avenues were opened which would connect her with the Mohawk and the western counties of New York,—with the actual chains of commerce, and the navigation of the Ohio, the Ohio, the Mississippi, the Missouri, avenues that wait only to be improved, and Maryland will truly become the centre of the union, in the most intimate of all political connexions, that of commerce and profitable intercourse.

Since the above paragraph was penned, Maryland has, for her resources, made such gigantic strides towards opening those several avenues of intercommunication—and she is at this moment struggling spiritedly in that peculiar attitude of a course, where the interest upon the expenditures are at the heaviest amount, the works being almost completed, and yet the most of them, not sufficiently so, to yield the income which can only be expected upon their completion. One mainly and effective effort more—and a rich harvest of trade, commerce and prosperity will be insured.

There is, however, another striking peculiarity in the statistics of this state; she lies directly between the slaveholding and the non-slaveholding states; and though no state in the union, either by public opinion or by legal estimates, more distinctly recognizes the claims of the slaveholder to property of that description, yet in no state of the union has emancipation so rapidly progressed, and whilst several of the counties of the state have now a larger number of slaves than of white inhabitants, yet there are no states at present, not yet the largest proportion, but actually much the largest number of free colored people, of any state in the union; free according to common parlance, though in fact neither freemen nor slaves, nor are they ever likely to be really free even under her laws. The attitude of Maryland in this respect, as the pivot of her commerce to turn upon which we can do that, and leave others to deduce conclusions therefrom.

The first emigration to Maryland under lord Baltimore's charter, took place in 1634, and consisted of about 200 gentlemen. In 1660 the population amounted to 12,000; in 1665 to 16,000; in 1710 to 25,000. In 1724, one hundred years after its first settlement, there were 34,000 "taxable inhabitants" in the province. In 1749 there were 53,000 inhabitants.

In 1755 there were 53,319 free white males; 49,909 free white females; 1,474 free white males; 197 female convicts, 3,592 male convicts, and 42,761 negro slaves—making a total population of 133,261.

Aggregates of whites, free colored, and slaves under each census from 1790 to 1840.

In 1790, whites, 208,640; free colored, 8,043; slaves, 102,560—total 319,243.

In 1800, whites, 216,356; free colored, 19,387; slaves, 105,633—total 341,375. Increase in ten years, 21,830.

In 1810, whites, 255,117; free colored, 33,921; slaves, 111,352—total 350,516. Increase in ten years, 33,968.

In 1820, whites, 253,622; free colored, 41,780; slaves, 106,993—total 402,395. Increase in ten years, 26,904.

In 1830, whites, 291,108; free colored, 52,923; slaves, 122,560—total 473,010. Increase in ten years, 39,610.

In 1840, whites, 316,544; free colored, 64,837; slaves, 89,736—total 461,117. Increase in ten years, 21,077.

It will be observed that our aggregate of 1840 varies from the aggregate of the marshal's table. It is because we have not been able to make the items, which we derive from his table, correspond exactly with his aggregate—and we cannot determine where the error lies.

The proportion of whites to the colored population in the year 1753, was 2 3 white, to one colored; in 1790 it was 1 84; in 1800, 1 75 to one; in 1810, 1 62; in 1820, 1 77; in 1830, 1 88; and in 1840, it was 2 088 109 whites to one colored person.

The condition of the colored population, last, however, during this period, undergone a very marked terial change. Sixty years ago, nearly all the descendants of Africa within the state were slaves. In 1790, not quite one out of every fourteen were free. In thirty years from that period, (1820), the number of free had increased to 44,730, and bore the proportion of considerably more than one fourth of the total number of their race to the state. During the same period, the entire increase of the slaves, was but 8,868, being less than four per cent. In 1830, more than one third of the colored people of the state were free, and in 1840, the proportion of free colored to the slaves was as 61 to 89—approximating one-half.

The number of free blacks had increased in the last ten years 8,869, and in the last thirty years 27,810—being an average of over nine hundred per year.

The number of slaves in the state had diminished within the last thirty years 21,796—within the last ten years, the diminution has been 12,158—or over twelve per cent.

The entire colored population of the state, has diminished according to our authentic, 3,359 within the last ten years, being over two per cent.

The white population has increased in the same time 28,436, or eight or three quarters per cent.

The aggregate increase of the population of the state within the last fifty years has been 148,329, on an average of very nearly 3,000 per year.

The city of Baltimore alone, has increased in population within the last fifty years from 13,563 to 162,500—or 89,000, leaving 59,937 increase for the residue of the state.

The population of the Eastern and Western Shores from 1790 to 1840, inclusive, are as follows:

	1790.	1800.	1810.	1820.	1830.	1840.
East Shore.	107,638	115,336	117,121	115,110	119,592	117,392
West Shore.	92,089	127,150	126,433	133,921	171,327	146,350

It will be perceived that the population of the Eastern Shore within the last fifty years has only increased 9,744, or nine per cent.—and that within the last ten years the population of that shore has diminished 2,200, or about two per cent.

The population of the West-Shore, has in the last fifty years, increased 148,634—and in the last ten years 28,281.

Legislature. The legislature was to adjourn on the 6th, but probably continued in session a few days longer. A law has been passed exempting loans execution the real estate of a debtor to the quantity of 160 acres, or $1,500 worth of town lots. This is in addition to the personal estate, previously exempt.

A resolution has passed the house by a majority of one vote, and will probably pass the senate, in favor of a national bank. A resolution has been passed, recommending the creation of a land district, embracing the country on the Mississippi between the line dividing the Chickasaw and Choctaw tribes and the mouth of the Yazoo; the land office to be at Vicksburg. A law has been passed providing for the inspection of bale rope and bagging, and one prohibiting the use of cotton hogs.

The last, we are told, was actually recommended in the message of his excellency. The bagging inspection law will prove very vexatious and expensive.

MICHIGAN.

In the house of representatives of this state, on the 4th inst. Mr. Speaker Price introduced a series of resolutions—founded on the subject of controversy between New York and Virginia—which may be held to be of so small importance, as looking to their effects, and to ulterior results, consequent upon similar action, pro and con, in other states of the union. The resolution set forth the cause of difficulty between Virginia and New York, and pronounced the refusal of the governor of New York to deliver up the fugitives from justice who escaped from Virginia, charged with felony in stealing slaves in that state, as a violation of the constitution of the United States, and injurious to the rights of the slaveholding states; and they characterize the reason assigned by gov. Seaward, for this slight violation of the constitution, as "a violent and wholly unworthy act of a tyrant." The concluding resolution—the pith and marrow of the matter—is as follows:

6th. Resolved, That in granting licenses to sell goods, wares and merchandise in this state, it is expected, and it shall redress shall be afforded, to make a discrimination unfavorable to goods, wares and merchandise manufactured in the state of New York, or imported into that state and brought from that state to this state. Provided, said discrimination does not apply to goods, wares and merchandise in the original cases or packages, in which they were imported into the United States.

After some remarks from the speaker, explanatory of the reasons for proposing the resolutions, it was moved that 500 copies of them be printed—which number were ordered by the house.

How long would the union of the states endure—that union which is the only security to amity and concord amongst its members—if one member is generally bad, in cases of difficulty, as that looked to, or recomended, in the foregoing resolution!

THE BANKS.

A report obtained circulation last week, that the banks in New York had or were about to suspend payments. The papers of that city contradict it, and assert that their banks are perfectly easy, nay, really want good paper.

It is said that the city of New York never stood so strong as at this day. The amount of specie in their vaults yesterday was $5,504,100; an amount deemed more than sufficient for any emergency that can arise.

It appears that upwards of eleven millions of dollars in specie or specie funds were drawn from the Philadelphia banks within twenty days of their last suspension, of which six went from the vaults of a single bank, leaving but a minute amount to be left at this time in all the banks of the city of New York.

The difficulties existing amongst the banks in Philadelphia is increased by the determination of all but the United States bank, to suspend all transactions from their general arrangements and refuse their notes as payment. The United States bank of course refused the notes of those that refused hers.

Several public meetings have been held, with a view of suggesting measures to the legislature. George M. Dallas presided at one held on the 6th and Josiah B. Chandler acted as secretary—Josiah Randall proposed a series of resolutions, which on account of Josiah B. Randall were referred to a committee of seven to report to the legislature.

On Tuesday the 9th. Mr. Ingersoll then reported resolutions "that the community is in need of legislative assistance and relief" that certain banks, naming them, and extending the term of the United States bank, be authorized to receive, and to render assistance to the people, the contemplated relief and assistance; that the banks had not attempted to carry out the act of 1840, requiring them to resume on the 15th January, and that the United States bank be withdrawn in the absolute attempt to give permanence to the same"—and they say, that the following measures of relief and assistance are called for by the present emergency:

1. A suspension of the penalties provided by any statute of this commonwealth, for the omission of any of the above named banks to pay their deposits and obligations in gold or silver coin.

2. A re-enactment of the provisions of the act of 3d April, 1840, relative to dividends.

3. An arrangement by which each bank shall be required to pay out its own notes, and not the notes of any other banks.

4. Such other measures of relief and assistance as the legislature in its wisdom may deem proper.

5. That a committee of seven persons be appointed to proceed to Harrisburg for the purpose of obtaining the necessary relief and assistance.

The proceedings of the legislature on this occasion are of course of great interest to every citizen.

Whether governor Butler and the party that he is attached to, will materially relax from the course they have hitherto maintained, remains quite doubtful.

specie payments, to and the discharge of the accruing interest on the state debt. This loan was of course a direct charge upon her operations at the very moment that the payments in specie began; and it was moreover the fortune of the bank to provide for a still larger portion of that loan in the precious metals, as much of it was paid by others in the promissory notes of the bank.

The statement thus briefly submitted exhibits therefore a direct application of the capital of the bank to purposes of the state, an amount exceeding twelve millions of dollars, and of nearly a million more, to works of public concern, conducive to the profit of the state works and the interest of her citizens.

That these applications of the capital have proved a severe burden upon the bank, and both directly and indirectly, an obstacle to the success of the effort which has just failed, does not admit of reasonable doubt. The demands of the state for large loans, which have never been negotiable by the bank, except as securities to borrow money, and then only upon estimates much below the price paid, and at the expense of heavy charges of interest, premium and commissions, may be stated with all confidence as a heavy burden imposed upon the institution. More than $7,500,000 of these loans have been within the last two years, a period of unexampled difficulty in the negotiation of money, and no part of them can be said to have been taken with the free will of the institution, or even with a regard to her own benefit, except as the directors conceived the interest of the state and of the institution to be closely connected.

Your memorialists humbly submit, that contributions like these do not constitute a ground of discrimination unfavorable to the bank, as would seem to be the sentiment of those who would deny her the common relief that is now solicited at the hands of the legislature for all other banks.

By subscriptions voluntarily made to promote public works of like nature, and to extend the use and profit of the state works, the bank has paid nine hundred and seventy-eight thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine dollars.

It is not lower upon the ground of service to the state by the institution that the directors present this memorial. They represent great interests, the sacrifice of which will be extensively prejudicial to both public and private interests. The interests of these interests, that they are for relief by the legislature. They do not ask to be relieved from the obligations imposed by the constitution, nor from the legal and moral liability of all debtors to pay their debts; but they confidently ask to be exempted from penalties which the law imposes upon those which the legislature can lawfully repeal or suspend, and they ask it because the infliction of these penalties will inevitably retard the payment of the debts, and will produce a wasteful sacrifice of capital, and increase of the prevailing embarrassment of the community. On each of these tendencies they ask leave to make one or two suggestions. The sufficiency of the assets of the bank to meet all her engagements to creditors, is, in the opinion of your memorialists, as much a matter of moral certainty as that the assets of any bank in this state or elsewhere are sufficient for a like purpose. If through mismanagement, folly or madness, all personal securities shall be annihilated, and real estate be made a mere speculation, who owns it, the liability of the bank will be confined in its effects to the Bank of the United States, and unless they are so annihilated, the sufficiency of the bank assets is, morally certain. The first question then for the assent of the legislature, and the legislature, it ought to receive the consideration of all persons before they express an opinion upon it, is whether the bills and liabilities of this bank, ought to be struck down at once as an available resource to the creditors by the destruction of the charter, the consequent delays and difficulties of winding up the concern in another form.

Is it not a measure of more wisdom and justice also, to these creditors, to let these liabilities take their true position, according to their estimated value, assisted as the liabilities of other banks are by the facilities which a charter gives to make provisions for them? Is it of advantage to any man or body of men, whose pursuits in business are profitable to the community, that this paper shall become a thing to waver upon at the exchange, blown up one day by hope, thrown down the next by fear, and at all times the subject of contrivances to bring about the gain of one by the loss of another? Will the legislature, by a distant legislation are the bona fide holders of it likely to obtain its true value in such a state of artificial agitation? Can either the public or individuals, pursuing a useful calling, be benefited by at once putting a stop to the active commercial value of more than two millions of dollars of this paper, now believed to be principally in the hands of the inhabitants of this state? It is not at present a question whether the Bank of the United States is at once to become a bank of extensive circulation and deposits as before. Upon this point this bank must stand, like others, upon its own strength and the confidence of the community. But the question is, whether, be her resources what they may, her creditors are to be deprived of the assistance which the charter will give by the infliction of penalties which are withdrawn from all other banks?

It must be obvious to your honorable bodies that by destroying the charter, not only will the property of creditors be sacrificed, but that the same is more extensively true in regard to the capital of the stockholders.

What the stockholders have done to fall under the edge of public resentment, it is difficult to perceive. If there has been error, or mismanagement in the bank it has not been theirs. If money has been too liberally loaned to the state of Pennsylvania, to improvement companies and to individuals, the stockholders have not made the loans. The law prevents them from acting personally in such matters, and compels them to act by representatives.

To many of them the law denies the right of selecting their representatives. They are widows, orphan children, persons retired from business and advanced in age, and many of them, and of them have been, and are sufferers, against their will, without their personal agency, and beyond the possibility of redress by themselves. Why should persons in this situation become the objects of hatred and persecution, and because part of their property has been impaired, the rest of it be sacrificed by forced sales upon a prostrate market, at the mandate of the law, and through the inflexible agency of trustees or liquidators? Can the public gain by this? In some times these are their very imaginary advantages to the public or individuals in swelling the mass of stocks, debts and lands for peremptory sale in a market already burthened with more than can be absorbed.

Your memorialists humbly submit that but one answer can be given to these inquiries. It is the true interest of the public, as it is also the dictate of mercy and humanity, that the stockholders should be satisfied.

It is not for themselves as it is for their children, and that they should not be crippled by penal restrictions, nor hunted down by persecution; and if the penalties are enforced, these are the only characters which the enforcement of them will have. It is not for the public to be troubled with the care of the regard of the legislature. To the extent of more than eight millions the bank is the owner of the public debt of this state, which has been pledged for the repayment of money borrowed. When the bank incurs the debt, it incurs these loans of the state at the mercy of those to whom they are pledged, enables them to throw them into the market upon the default of the bank, to depress them in price, and to become the purchasers of them at an immense sacrifice. In the face of this contingency, what is to be the market price of the public debt of Pennsylvania, held to a great extent by her own citizens? What is to be the ability of the state to complete and to bring into profitable operation the great works which she has undertaken? What effects upon all property in the public debt or dependent upon it?

Your memorialists deem it necessary only to suggest these considerations to the wisdom of the legislature. They hold it to be clear, that the value of this while the value of this or any other charter for banking has become greatly impaired, so that the private interests of the stockholders in the general are of this power is now of inconsiderable magnitude, at the same time the value of the bank in giving security to the debts of the bank until paid its value in turning all the assets of the bank to the best account for all parties, and its value in sustaining the price of state debt, and in furthering the financial operations of the state, was never higher than at this moment.

They therefore respectfully pray the legislature to continue to the bank, the relief granted by the present resolutions. The legislature provides the legislative power to be fit to impose upon the Bank of the United States in common with other banks, to give security to their operations and to bring them at the earliest day practicable, to that state which is alone consistent with the public welfare, this bank will be the first to deference to the wishes of the representatives of the people, and faithfully endeavor to observe. By order and on behalf of the board,

Bank of the United States, Feb. 13th, 1841.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—24 SESSION. SENATE.

February 16. The vice president presented memorials from Florida praying that the southern portion of that territory may not be ceded to the Seminole Indians, but that they be compelled to remove west of the Mississippi.

Mr. Williams reported a joint resolution authorizing the secretary of the navy to enter into contract, without advertising, for American water-rotted lumber for the construction of a new fort.

Mr. Nicholas reported a bill making appropriations for certain military roads leading to the frontier posts bordering on Texas and Indian settlements.

Mr. Waller reported the bill from the house of representatives to amend an act entitled "an act to authorize the state of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described," without amendment. Laid on the table until tomorrow.

Mr. Eaton reported a bill supplemental to an act entitled "an act for the appointment of commissioners under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians."

Mr. Hubbard moved a resolution appointing Thursday the 27th inst. a day on which the senate would proceed to the appointment of a printer for that body for the 27th congress.

Mr. Waller submitted the following resolution, which was adopted.

Resolved, That the map of the country west of the Mississippi, made under the direction of the war department, by J. N. Nicollet, and the report in reference to the same, be printed for the use of congress, under the direction of the chief of topographical engineers, and that 200 copies thereof be delivered to the war department and to the bureau of topographical engineers, one hundred, and 300 additional copies for the use of the senate.

The following bills were also considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed:

A bill authorizing the erection of certain light houses and light boats, and the establishment of certain buoys and beacons lights.

A bill to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the agents or attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made under long term treaties between the United States and certain foreign powers; which awards have been retained in the treasury in payment of debts due the United States.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy; when Mr. Tappan rose and delivered his views in favor of the amendment of Mr. Hubbard to include banks and trading companies.

Mr. Nicholson followed against the bill and amendment, though he intimated that the vote he should give would not commit him on any future occasion.

Mr. Eaton spoke at length in favor of the amendment, but against the general policy of the bankruptcy bill.

Mr. Calhoun rose to enter his protest against the doctrine broached by Mr. Nicholson in his remarks, that where the general policy of the bill and the states came in collision, the states must yield.

Mr. Benton said as the mover of the amendment (Mr. Hubbard) was not then in his seat, and might desire to say something further on it, he would move the adjournment of the British subject, and asked the senate then adjourned.

February 17. Mr. Ruggles presented the credentials of Mr. GEORGE EVANS, elected a senator of the United States from the state of Maine, for six years commencing on the 4th of March next.

Mr. Preston reported a bill providing for the investment of the Smithsonian funds; and the establishment of the Smithsonian institution.

Mr. Norrell presented a memorial from certain citizens of New York, in relation to certain persons designated as "American patriots" who were taken captive in arms during the Canadian frontier difficulties and sentenced to punishment as felons by British authorities. The memorial contained a prayer for their release, and the British subject, and asked the adoption of resolutions by congress declaring them cruel and inhuman, and for the interposition of the government to procure the release of these persons from imprisonment.

The memorial having been read, Mr. Norrell moved that it be referred to the president of the U. States.

Mr. Preston opposed the motion. He had the strongest objections to any interference with the interests of New York, and of foreign nations. The advice given by Jefferson against any such interposition was worthy of all attention and consideration. He subscribed to it most heartily. Mr. P. said he had seen with regret the excited proceedings on the northeastern frontier. They were calculated ed to excite emotions of uneasiness and apprehension for the preservation of peace and harmony; for no one could contemplate the possibility of a conflict between Great Britain and the United States, and all the train of calamitous consequences which would follow to the two countries, to civilization, and to the world, without the greatest pain. It was an evil, and, until it was removed, it was proper to interfere with the political affairs and proceedings of other states; but most especially, as regards the British North American affairs ought all such measures tending to excitement be scrupulously avoided.

Mr. Predon adverted to the recent correspondence between the British minister and Mr. Forsyth in relation to the negroes of L'Amistad. He characterized the course of the British government in this matter as unwarrantable interference; and he hoped that no department of the government would give it the slightest sanction or favor. He hoped, too, that no countenance would be given for such interference by a similar example on our part. In his opinion, the senate ought to mark with its most decisive rebuke even this proposition, to interfere in behalf of the persons referred to by the memorialists. With what face can we censure the intervention, on the part of Great Britain, in the affairs of the United States, if we entertain the memorial. He was against entertaining it so far even as to suggest the idea that the president might consider the propriety of interfering. He moved to lay the memorial on the table.

A few weeks since Mr. Norvell, the question was put, and carried in the affirmative. So the memorial was laid on the table.

The Tennessee land bill was taken up; and, after a brief discussion, was passed.

Some private bills were disposed of, and then the senate adjourned.

February 19. Mr. Clay gave notice that, to-morrow, as early as possible after the morning's business was disposed of, he should call up the resolution introduced by him some time since for the repeal of the sub-treasury.

Mr. Williams presented the joint resolutions of the legislature of Maine in relation to the currency, the repeal of the sub-treasury, the establishment of a national bank, and the tariff and other matters. Mr. Williams to carry into effect the will of his constituents or resign his trust.

The resolution for the admission of Indiana during the residue of the session to the privileged seat was taken up, and some one proposed its consideration.

Mr. Norvell said that citizens were in unusual numbers. All were aware of this fact. All were aware that, among those crowds, ladies from all quarters of the union, who had never visited the city before, were to be found. It was right and proper that as many of the citizens of the United States as could be accommodated with convenience to the senate should have an opportunity of witnessing the proceedings and debates of this body. By admitting the ladies below, many of whom would probably never have another opportunity to hear our debates, more room would be left in the galleries for the accommodation of gentlemen. He, therefore, hoped that the resolution under consideration, which he had thought it right to submit, would be adopted.

Mr. Benton moved to lay the resolution on the table. Upon this motion the yeas and nays were taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Ala., Calhoun, Culbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mason, Phelps, Patten, Prentiss, Rives, Smith, of Indiana, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Clay, of Ky., Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Knight, Mangum, Merriek, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Rogers, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, Young—30.

The senate then proceeded to consider the resolution proposing to elect a public printer for the 27th Congress.

Mr. Hubbard, who introduced the resolution on a former day, made some few remarks as to the joint resolution under which the senate had, from time to time acted.

Mr. Huntington remonstrated at considerable length against the proposition, going into a succinct examination of all the resolutions and laws which had been passed in relation to this subject from the year 1817 to the present time. He said that the joint resolution of 1819, (referred to by the introducer of the motion), was obligatory; that it had been treated by the other house as a perfect nullity, and could not be relied on by the senate. He denied the justice, the propriety, or the expediency of going into such an election at this late stage of the session. There was no necessity for it, because the printer was already provided for until the 4th of March, and there was no justice in it, because it was setting on foot a public officer of the minority on the majority of the senate. He said, if it passed, he, for one, should not regard it as obligatory, and should move to rescind it as soon as the next congress met. He would therefore move to postpone its further consideration until the 4th of March next.

Mr. Hubbard said he would take occasion to answer the remarks of the senator in detail to-morrow, and meantime, he would desire that it be postponed until the 4th of March, which he was ready to do.

The senate then proceeded to consider the special order, being the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, when Mr. Benton rose and addressed the senate at great length.

Mr. Clay, of Ala. rose, but gave way for a motion to adjourn, and then the senate adjourned.

February 19. The resolution to proceed to the election of a public printer was taken up and discussed until after 4 P. M. The debate was somewhat animated, the motion proposing being to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until the 4th of March next.

This motion was sustained by Messrs. Harrison, Henderson, Bayard, Mangum, Dixon, Prentiss, Clay, of Ky., Prentiss, and others, and opposed by Messrs. Hubbard, Sevier, Linn, Clay, of Alabama, Norvell, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Knight, Mangum, Merriek, Prentiss, Rogers, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, White, Young.

The question having been taken on the postponement, was decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Knight, Mangum, Merriek, Prentiss, Rogers, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, White, Young—19. NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Ala., Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mason, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Rogers, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—36.

Mr. Hubbard did not desire to go into the election of Mr. Merrick until next Monday. The blank was filled with to-morrow.

Mr. Clay then moved to take up the resolution introduced by him some time since, for the repeal of the sub-treasury. On this question the yeas and nays were called. When there appeared as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Clay, of Ky., Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Hubbard, Huntington, Kerr, Knight, Mangum, Merriek, Prentiss, Rogers, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, White, Young—23. NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mason, Nicholas, Norvell, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Rogers, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Young—22.

Mr. Clay observed that what he had to say would take a very few minutes. There were some cries, in an undertone, of "adjourn." Mr. Clay then moved an adjournment.

Mr. Allen asked the yeas and nays, when there appeared for the adjournment 32, against it 12.

And the senate adjourned. February 20. On motion of Mr. Anderson, a resolution was adopted calling upon the secretary of war for certain information relative to claims under the Cherokee treaties of 1835 and '36, as also relative to the proposition introduced by Mr. Mangum.

The resolution introduced by Mr. Hubbard relative to payments made to delinquents was considered and adopted.

The senate proceeded to the election of a printer to the senate, and the vice president having notified the members to prepare their ballots Mr. Mangum rose and said that after what had transpired here yesterday in relation to this election, he felt it due to himself, as well as other members of the body seated and acted with him, and in some sort to the people whom they represented, to state the course he meant to pursue in regard to it. He did not complain of the determination of gentlemen on the other side yesterday: that was their affair; but inasmuch as it indicated what would be the course of the majority to pursue to-day, Mr. Mangum would for a few days longer remain in the minority, he would now say, that he should decline any participation in this election at all. He regarded it as unbecomingly to the purposes for which it was designed, in an undertone, his course would be no one; but for himself he must decline all participation in the matter.

The ballots were now cast, and on their examination the secretary's table it appeared that Blair & Rives had received 36 votes. Francis P. Blair 1.

So the vice president announced that Blair & Rives had been duly elected printers to the senate for the next congress.

The resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, to repeal the sub-treasury law, and the amendment offered as a substitute therefor by Mr. Allen, of Ohio, came up for consideration, when Mr. Clay, gave his usual notice of large upon the propriety of adopting his resolution; he was followed by Messrs. Allen and Williams in opposition. The latter stated that certain resolutions passed by the legislature of his state, Maine, in relation to the sub-treasury law, rendered it necessary for him to say something in explanation of the vote he should now give. Mr. W. then went on to explain, in substance, that he did not regard the resolution as an instruction to him to vote to repeal this bill; because, though the resolution declared that it was the will of his constituents that the sub-treasury should be repealed, the legislature refused to take the responsibility of explicitly instructing him to vote to repeal it. Had they done so, he would have obeyed. But, as they only instructed him that such was the opinion of his constituents, he must take leave to judge as to that fact; it might or it might not be their will; but, as the legislature had not taken the responsibility of a positive instruction so as to make his act theirs, he should vote against the repeal.

Mr. Walker went at great length into an explanation as to the evidences of public sentiment in Mississippi on the subject of the sub-treasury; and arrived, after stating a number of facts, at the conclusion that it was doubtful which way public opinion preponderated. But his course was decided by the consideration that, if the law should be repealed, the treasury would be left either upon the regulated or unregulated state bank system, which he was utterly and irreconcilably opposed, and so were the people of Mississippi.

Mr. Sevier renewed the motion to lay the whole subject on the table, when the question being taken by yeas and nays, (every senator voting), it was decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Culbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mason, Merriek, Norvell, Pierce, Rogers, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—47.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Knight, Mangum, Merriek, Nicholas, Prentiss, Rogers, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, White, Young—25.

So the subject was laid on the table.

Mr. Linn solicited the senate to indulge him in taking up the bills relating to the territories.

Mr. Merrick desired to have the senate take up the bill for the district of Columbia, and yield the point to Mr. Linn, giving notice that he would call it up on Monday without fail.

The following bills, after being advocated and explained by Mr. Linn, were ordered to be engrossed in third reading:

The bill granting to the county of Johnson, in the territory of Iowa, the right of pre-emption to a tract of land for a seat of justice for said county, and repealing the second section of an act, approved the 3d day of March, 1839, which had enacted making a donation of land, to the territory of Iowa, for the purpose of erecting public buildings there; and the bill to provide for running and marking the northern boundary line of a tract of land reserved for the Indian tribes of said Fox tribes of Indians.

The following bills were also ordered to be engrossed:

The bill authorizing the erection of certain light houses and light boats, and the establishment of certain buoys and beacons.

The bill to provide for the allowance of (invalid pensions to certain Cherokee warriors.

The senate went into executive session, and afterwards adjourned.

February 22. Mr. White presented a report made to the general assembly of Indiana, on the subject of the sale of the public lands, accompanied by a joint resolution of the legislature of said state, asking that the permanent prescriptive pre-emption bill be so amended as to divide the proceeds of the sales in just and equitable proportions, to grant the right of pre-emption to 320 acres at the minimum price, and to limit the right to actual bona fide settlers.

Also, a resolution of the general assembly, that the government should be supported by the taxes to be raised by duties on foreign goods, and wholly opposed to any system of direct taxation.

Mr. Clay presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the eastern part of the state of Tennessee, engaged in the growth and manufacture of silk, asking that a duty may be imposed on the foreign article.

Mr. Young presented the memorial of citizens of Randolph county, Illinois, asking the opinion of congress as to the true meaning and construction of the federal constitution in relation to the right of property in slaves, the right of the states to issue bills of credit, and the power of congress to establish a national bank.

Several bills ordered to be engrossed on Friday were read and passed.

Mr. Crittenden then lears to bring in a bill to prevent the interference of certain federal officers in elections. Mr. C. spoke at length, showing the object of the bill in question. When the debate was further continued between Messrs. Norvell, Crittenden, Wright, Clay, Johnson, Buchanan, Culbert, Preston, and others.

The debate became very animated, so much so that, when Mr. Preston closed, there was a strong burst of applause from the galleries, and some indications in the lobby. Immediately there were cries of "clear the galleries—clear the galleries."

Mr. Clay, of Ala. with much earnestness: Clear the galleries. Mr. Anderson, striking his band on the desk: I insist that the galleries be cleared. Mr. Norvell: Clear the galleries—clear the blackguards. Mr. Calhoun rose also, and called for the galleries to be cleared. Mr. Clay: Spare the ladies—they have not sinned. I hope they may be suffered to remain. The next gallery was cleared, though crowded to suffocation—the citizen sitting as speedily as the nature of the case would admit.

Mr. Calhoun closed the debate on Mr. Crittenden's bill, and, on the question of granting leave to introduce it being taken, it was decided in the negative; yeas 14, nays 56.

The next president laid before the senate the following letter from Mr. Webster.

Hon. R. M. Johnson, vice president U. S.

"Sir: It is the object of this letter to make known to the senate the resignation of my seat as one of the senators from Massachusetts, having already informed the executive of the state that from this day my place would be vacant.

"In retiring from a situation in which so considerable a part of my life has been passed, I hope I may be permitted to express my high respect for the body of which I have been a member, the interest I shall ever feel in the preservation of its character and dignity, and my cordial wishes for the health and happiness of all those with whom I have been associated.

"With much personal regard, I have the honor to be your obedient servant, D. WEBSTER."

As soon as the letter was read—

Mr. Culbert rose to express his regret that the senator from Massachusetts was not present to answer certain questions which he had to present.

On this announcement by Mr. C. a very spirited discussion arose, in which Messrs. Clay, Preston, Culbert and Rives participated. And then the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Saturday, Feb. 23.—In continuation. The report of Mr. Pickens, from the committee on foreign affairs, on the message of the president, transmitting a correspondence with the British minister in relation to the burning of the steamboat Caroline, and the demand made for the liberation of Alexander McLeod, being under consideration.

Mr. Everett renewed his proposition to include in the printing all the documents upon the subject, a list of which he furnished.

Mr. Granger moved and moved a division of the question—first, on the motion to lay on the table; and then, on the motion to print.

And the motion to print being debatable—

Mr. Granger said that he considered the report, if it were adopted by the house, as approaching very nearly, in its consequences, to a declaration of war, if the British government should desire so to consider it. He would take occasion to say, as a member of the committee on foreign affairs, that the report did not receive his sanction. And he felt constrained to detain the house for a few moments whilst he assigned, very briefly, his reasons for this conclusion.

What, (continued Mr. G.) was the position of the committee on foreign affairs when they entered upon the consideration of this question? My colleague (Mr. Fildare) had called upon the state department for the correspondence which had taken place in relation to the demand for the liberation of McLeod. That matter, and that alone, was referred to the committee on foreign affairs. It is not my purpose to censure the conduct of this administration, for, so far as my judgment can now determine, I approve fully of the course they have taken; but opinion may, upon further reflection, be changed; but, as at present advised, I consider the course of Mr. Forsyth to have been such as was due to his high official station and due to the character and dignity of this nation. But, so considering, and representing a section of country deeply interested in the people, and of any other section of this union, I still dissent from the report.

What does it embrace? A report upon matters referred to the committee on foreign affairs? No; nothing of the kind is stated, and that is what I maintain; but the correspondence in relation to the demand for the liberation of McLeod. Does that committee act upon a call of the executive of this nation, made upon this house, to place before the country the world the true condition of things between the United States and Great Britain? No.

The executive, mindful, as we are bound to believe, of the honor of the country as well as of the character of his own administration, has not thought it expedient to refer the house of congress for advice in regard to our relations with Great Britain. What, then, is the position of that committee? Travelling beyond the record, they come forward and present (by the votes of a bare majority I will say, but Mr. G. says, with, and to the disadvantage of, it is not pacific in its character, and which is based upon complaints against the British government, not one of which has been referred to that committee—When, or by whom, have the committee on foreign affairs been called upon to make a report as to the high seas, or this alleged right of search which, I agree with the committee, is one which this nation is not likely to tolerate in the manner in which it is now exercised. When, or by whom, were the reports calculated to inflame the passions of the masses referred to the committee on foreign affairs, that they might make report upon them? And, if so, what have they reported? Have they sent here a document setting forth the alleged grievances of this country, of this nation, of this people, against Great Britain, and calling for the action of this house upon those matters? Has the chairman of the committee of ways and means come forward to say that he is prepared to recommend appropriations to meet the country in a proper state of defence against the emergency which this report as to this may create? Is your committee on military affairs ready to recommend the defenses which should be provided if such a report is to go forth to the world, no such sanction of this house?

And the committee on claims sent in requisitions to put your ships in commission, that you may be prepared to meet on the high seas the power you have before met and crippled? No. There has been no such action on the part of the committee. And the committee on foreign affairs, without recommending any action, without even coming to any conclusion, as it seems to me, except that Great Britain is the greatest power on earth and we the humblest, bring here a report calculated to inflame the passions of the people to let it go forth to the world that we are making an issue with Great Britain, which we voluntarily tender to her, and which, in my opinion, she has a right to take up on the instant.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are considerations connected with the honor and dignity of the state of New York, and with the administration of justice within her borders, that demand our attention. On a former occasion I stated on this floor that the person whose life was in jeopardy would receive at the hands of a jury of New York the same fair and impartial trial which would be secured to any citizen of that state who might be arraigned for a violation of its laws; but I mourn now to say that, from prejudice there is an exception made in the case of the western border of New York, growing out of the arrest of this man and of his liberation for the moment, which is already sufficiently great to make those who regard the lives and the liberties of the people here, to be greatly alarmed by the report. By this time, I suppose, the grand jury of Niagara county has closed its investigation. The current rumor through the newspapers of the day is, that McLeod has been indicted. The people of that county would be exercised with a higher glory to itself than when showing to the world that, whilst it took the position which its honor demanded, still that the humblest individual of this or any other country whose life was upon our soil should be sheltered by the aid of the justice and the humanity of our laws. I do not think that, without any call from the executive, without anything having been laid before the committee on foreign af-airs but the papers relating to the liberation of this man—I say, I do not think that the honor or dignity of this nation required this course, and that a declaration, not only of the powers of Great Britain and of our humility, but of our readiness to meet her at any moment, when no necessity existed for such a threat; and when the voice of this house, speaking potential power, might be considered as a watch-word by which every man on the northern frontier was to guide himself in hurrying on to execution this suspected foreigner. If he should be tried and found guilty, let the penalty of the law be executed upon the table of the state of New York and the people throughout the widest extremities of this land be prepared to meet the consequences. When those consequences shall present themselves, not only will the state of New York be ready to exert them, but I am sure that a patriotic feeling, which supersedes all local questions and merges all political differences, will rally this whole nation to the rescue. It will then be time enough to act; but in the name of justice, let us not anticipate that, but by infaming the public mind, and adding to the horrors of war the consciousness that we have interfered with the impartial operation of our laws or trifled with their supremacy.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. Adams, Mr. Grinnell, and others, which resulted in a motion by Mr. Grinnell to amend the motion of Mr. Pickens, (which was, that the report be laid on the table and printed, as above stated), so as to lay on the table the whole report, and to print the report and the motion to print the report, and on that motion Mr. G. asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Pickens inquired of the speaker whether that motion closed the debate? The speaker replied in the affirmative.

Some conversation ensued between various members, when a division of the question was called for.

Mr. Briggs suggested to Mr. Grinnell that, as he (Mr. B.) supposed no motion would be made, he was on his legs to lay the report on the table, it would save time to withdraw the call for them, so far as that part of the motion was affected.

Mr. Grinnell having assented, the question was taken, and the motion to lay the report on the table prevailed. The yeas were ordered.

The question then resumed, and was taken, on the second part of the motion of Mr. Grinnell—to lay the motion to print the report on the table—and it was decided in the negative on the amendment of Mr. Everett—Mr. Pickens said he had a few remarks to make in reply to the gentleman from New York (Mr. Granger).

That gentleman (continued Mr. P.) has delivered a regular lecture, prepared for the occasion, with tones as regular as if they had issued from a bagpipe. He was the very last gentleman here, judging from the sentiments he expressed a few weeks ago, who, I suppose, would suggest, would have found his patriotism and his valor oozing out so soon from the palms of his hands. His speech, in my opinion, is worthy of attention. He speaks as one clothed with authority, and I regret very much the course he has thought proper to pursue. I will declare to you and to this house that, so far from this report being the war report, as the gentleman from New York has characterized it, it is essentially the reverse. To speak our sentiments plainly, that we know our rights and dare maintain them—most, in my judgment, have a tendency directly the reverse of that which this gentleman seems to anticipate.

He has spoken of this report in two points of view. It is one which he asserts that the committee on foreign affairs have travelled out of the record. The subject matter in relation to the "Caroline" and to the demand for the liberation of McLeod, I consider as having been actually and directly introduced into the consideration of the house. They could not separate the two cases so as to present them in an intelligible point of view to the country. And does he say that that part of the report is beyond the record? Other matters have been introduced and inserted, by way of illustrating the interest thrown around this question, and with no intention to arouse any hostile feeling in this or in any other country. I deny the imputation, thrown out by the gentleman from New York, that the report has arrayed man from New York, of Great Britain and proclaimed our own weakness, or, as he terms it, our own humility before the world. It does no such thing. It challenges the gentleman to lay his finger, if he can, upon a single sentence which avows such an intention. It was proper to present the precise condition of things to the country; and I will here take occasion to say that the report was written by myself, without consultation with any human being, are the committee to whom it was presented. In drawing it up, I looked over the whole subject matter; I looked at the great interests involved; I looked at the position in which you Mr. Speaker, and this house had placed the committee on foreign affairs before the nation and the world, and I felt it to be a duty which I owed to this house and to my country to utter freely and without reverse the sentiments we entertained.

This gentleman tells us that the executive has called for no action; that it is due to the executive branch of the government that this house should wait until it hears from that quarter. Sir, I take exception to that position. I say that the executive is constituted under the federal constitution, as a co-ordinate and independent branch of this government; that this house is, in the contemplation of that constitution, the peculiar guardian of the interests and the rights of this confederacy; and that when any subject-matter is legitimately brought before it, it is not only our right, but it is our duty to the constitution and to the country to proclaim our sentiments upon it. I repeat the idea that we are to look to the executive branch of this government for dictation or counsel upon any question that may be supposed to involve the interests and the liberties of the people.

And, Mr. Speaker, my principal object in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York is to declare, as I have already done, that this, so far from being a war report, is of a precisely contrary character. I had hoped that the vote might have been taken upon it, and that the report might have been laid on the table and printed; that there should have been no panic; that no discussion should have sprung up; that no excitement calculated to arouse the people of this country by false appeals to their patriotism and their fears should have been manifested here. But the committee on foreign affairs have thought that it was proper to present to the people the exact questions at issue between us and a great and powerful nation. We thought, or, at all events, they have conceived, I thought, that the people in every part of the United States, and of every party, had for the last two years, been too much absorbed in the political conflicts of the day. I thought it was right that they should understand, in the most explicit manner, the points at issue between us and Great Britain, and, under these circumstances, I presented this report, acting, as I do on all other occasions, under a conscientious sense of my duty to the people, and to my country, and to the consequences of God. These are the principles upon which I have been taught to act. And when I hear from certain quarters appeals to the honor, the patriotism and the valor of the people of this land, and I hear the same announcements made from the accredited heads of this government have heretofore neglected their duty and slept on the rights of the country—I have a right to expect that those gentlemen who make such appeals and such announcements will themselves come forward on occasions of importance, and vindicate the sentiments which they have previously uttered.

As to the allegation that this report will have the effect of exciting the people on the border, I say I should rather think its tendency would be the reverse. The people there have been greatly excited; meetings of an angry, unnecessary and an unequalled character have taken place, and recommendations have been made, I was told, to the effect of sending in this very case in relation to McLeod. These things have been done, and why? Because the people have felt themselves wounded—they have been led to believe that this government was neglecting their interests. They desired to know whether right or wrong, that we have too long trifled and dabbled with their rights and feelings; and if we prove to them that this is not true—that this government is disposed to attend to their interests—to avenge their wrongs, and to vindicate their rights, they will once more look here for that protection which the constitution has pledged to them. Such a course will produce quiet, will allay excitement, and will produce repose and contentment on the extensive border. For it will satisfy the people that their rights will not suffer in the hands of those who hold the reins of government here. I will not go into any of those delicate matters referred to in the report with a view to excite any feeling; but I have declared my sole object was to call public attention to those questions—to prepare the people for the issues which might ultimately present themselves; to hold up to them the necessity of going into an enlightened system of domestic defence suited to the exigencies of the times—suited to the improvements of the age, not only with reference to Great Britain particularly, but with reference to our rights and position as a free and independent people among the family of nations. I think that these things have been too long neglected, and it was with a view to call attention to them, and to the great questions in which the people of this confederacy are so deeply interested that this report was made. It was with no view to the excitement of a war feeling. Far be it from me. The section of country from which I am called in to interfere in this matter is a peaceful one, and we should be the last people to be engaged in an unnecessary or an unjustifiable war. I do not believe there is any danger of war, if we do our duty here, as the guardians of the public border and public liberty—we now have no other duty prepared to assist our rights. But reply upon it, if you take the advice which indirectly has been given by the gentleman from New York—if you proclaim sentimentally from your seats here that these matters are not to be presented in their true light to the people, then there will be danger of a conflict for it is not in the nature of man—it is not in the nature of a nation like this when it sees a rival power contending for the ascendancy of the world, to speak the language of submission or the language of avoidance, to say the least of it. A gentleman like this cannot, under such circumstances, forbear; and they would be pressed upon every point, until at last an appeal to arms and to the God of battles would become inevitable.

It is to avoid these consequences—it is for the purpose of letting the people know the true condition of things and the real state of the issue—that this report has been presented. I ask no action upon it, and I say nothing to stir the passions, or to stir into an intimation or threat that war is to follow. I believe the contrary; and conscientiously viewing the matter in all its bearings, I presented this report upon my sole and entire responsibility. I repeat the idea that we are to look to the consultation of a majority of the committee of foreign affairs; yes a bare majority, as the gentleman from New York has told you. And I with regret again state that the gentleman from South Carolina has contended that it is only a bare majority report. I had hoped that that the question of our foreign relations there were no parties in this country, and that we should have met the issue, whatever it may be, as a united and free people ought to meet it.

And, Mr. Adams, I said, but yielded it to the Mr. Granger, who said: if the house will listen to my bag-pipe a few moments longer, I shall feel exceedingly obliged; and if its music is not so loud as the music of my friends from South Carolina, [Mr. Pickens], it will be because I cannot fill it with as much wind as he can blow into his. Sir, I speak by no authority other than that of a representative of the people of the state of New York. My country has desired to have this report to pass by in silence, leaving to the gentleman from South Carolina all the honor of its authorship; for I have no doubt, and never have had a doubt from the moment when he first read it, that every sentence, every word in it was his own. I have done to this time supposed that it was as much my right on this floor, and the right of any other member, to speak my own opinions without fear of dictation, as it was the right of the gentleman from South Carolina to utter his. I only declare that the opinions I have expressed are solely and exclusively my own, without consultation with any one. I should not have called for the reading of the report. I had supposed until the gentleman from South Carolina brought me the report, that the executive department of this nation conducted the negotiations upon all delicate matters between us and foreign governments. I had supposed that at any rate for the last twelve years the executive of this nation had claimed the right to conduct negotiations in all matters connected with our foreign relations; and I should have supposed that a party which had permitted our army to fall into disgrace—which had suffered our navy to run down to the state of even ancient dereliction—and which had permitted the whole border country to be left defenceless, would be the last upon earth to present such a document as this. I trust that the administration which is about to come into power, though it may not manifest equal bold a courage as breathing through this report, will show upon the high seas, upon the border, and, if need be, in the tented field, more power to resist the aggressions of a foreign foe than the gentleman and his friends have exhibited. If it does not, it will disappoint the hopes of the people of this country, and I for one, want none of it. Let preparation be made. Let the unfortunate man now in confinement be tried according to the laws of the state of New York, unbarred by the action of this house, and let the nation calmly await the issue.

The gentleman says that my courage has suddenly "oozed out from the palms of my hands." I acknowledge that life has for me many charms; probably no man clings to it with greater tenacity than I do, or is more closely bound by all the enjoyments of the present life and responsibilities of the future. I never speak of my courage, nor profess to have been "born insensible to fear." All I have to say is that when the laws of my own state and of the nation shall have been executed, and consequences as great as death, or different opinions between the gentlemen from South Carolina and myself upon this and all other questions will be buried in our love of country, and we will be found, shoulder to shoulder, battling in the common cause.

Mr. Pickens addressed an inquiry to Mr. Granger which the reporter could not hear.

[And, throughout the whole debate, there was much exclusion in the hall; and the difficulty of hearing was greatly increased, owing to the shouting, chiefly, to the members standing up in the aisle and talking loudly at the same time, in contravention of that excellent, but long forgotten rule, which is numbered "31." See edition of rules, December 7, 1840.]

Mr. Adams addressed the house at considerable length, in remarks of which it is in the power of the reporter to give only a brief outline.

Mr. A. expressed himself desirous, for the sake of the community, that the gentleman from South Carolina, who had declared himself to be the sole author of this report, that the gentleman should have an opportunity of examining it coolly and impartially, with reference to the opinions not of one party alone, but of the whole community.

Mr. Pickens was here understood to disavow all party considerations in the matter.

Mr. Adams disclaimed any intention to cast censure on the gentleman. All he wished, that the report which he had committed, in order that the gentleman might see whether both parties in the committee of foreign affairs could not come here with a report receiving their unanimous sanction, or, at all events, with the report of a majority, as a close early vote, as this had been. If it was not done, would, in the eye of the country, of the world, and of posterity, appear to be the policy of a defeated enemy in war abandoning a tenuous and setting fire to it after the victory was won.

After repeating the criticisms of Mr. Pickens on the party views here in reference to the controversy with Great Britain, and to the general unanimity of opinion which he [Mr. A.] contended had prevailed here on that subject, (with one or two exceptions, which were admitted,) he said, "I am to the ground takes that this was a conciliatory report. The people, Mr. A. thought, would form a very different estimate of it. What was the dissertation on the addition and the granting of the arms to the Indians? Were such charges generally received by nations as being of a trifling character? Suppose the charges to be true, was it conciliatory or courteous to array them here? It was something of the contrary; and conciliation which captain Puello (in one of the plays of the great dramatist) showed to Ancient Pistol, when he said to him, "Gut piss you, Ancient Pistol, you scurvy, lousy knave, Gut piss you."

He wished, therefore, that the report should be recomended, and that all those parts which related to the general policy of Great Britain, and to her ambitious character and power, might be left out. And, as to the question of right or wrong which, after all, was to be the basis of our conduct, and which, in the opinion of the gentleman, he wished a report on the subject itself, based on the correspondence here, that we might are whether, under the laws of nations, we could maintain the position we had assumed in regard to the Caroline. And, in relation to the arms to the Indians, he urged, urging upon the house not to put itself or the country in the wrong by any undue act of its own. If we were to go to war with Great Britain, it should be as a united people. He believed that a war would be a war of the people. A war of the people could defeat the country; and he confessed that it was with small degree of anxiety that he entertained fears that it would come to that inevitable result. He looked to it with apprehension and pain, but not without confidence that if we went into a war, we should come out with glory and honor, as we had already come out of two wars.

Mr. Everett followed at great length, and the general points of his argument were as follows:

He felt embarrassed, he said, in speaking on this subject, owing to the fact that it was being debated with open doors; and he had said many things in committee which he could not say here, but which he would say if the doors were closed. What was the position of the country? Our preparation was about to go out of power, and another to come in—and the one going out, (in 20 days), was taken unawares to compromise the one coming in—and to prescribe the course it should follow, or at least to embarrass it. If he knew himself, he had never viewed this as a party question; it was one which involved all parties. His own opinion was that no action on the part of this house was necessary, this correspondence being a private communication in answer to a call made by one of its members. It was the peculiar duty of the executive to conduct these matters, and it was not for this house to interfere unless there was some emergency on the part of the executive.

He was desirous that the report should be re-committed, and that the committee should make a specific report on the subject-matter which had been referred to it.

Mr. E. then asked what was the state of the question as it now stood, and what were the grounds taken by the British government, &c. and proceeded to read the following statement of facts as gathered from the following official documents: "The facts material to the subject submitted to the committee are, that, on the night of the 29th December, 1837, a detachment of the British forces stationed at Cripps, in the province of Upper Canada, crossed the Niagara River, in the vicinity of New York, and there made a hostile attack on the steamer Caroline, the property of an American citizen, killed and wounded a number of American citizens, captured the boat, towed her into the current, set her on fire, and sent her to destruction over the falls.

On the 3rd January, 1838, the secretary of state communicated to Mr. Fox, the British minister, a copy of the evidence furnished to the department of this 'exceedingly important and delicate subject.' British majesty's practice of Upper Canada on the persons and property of citizens of the United States, within the jurisdiction of the state of New York; and stating that 'it would necessarily form the subject of a demand for redress upon her majesty's government.'

On the 6th February, Mr. Fox communicated to the secretary of state a despatch from Sir Francis Head, then governor of Upper Canada, containing the distinct avowal, that the Caroline was destroyed by order of Col. McNab, commanding the militia in her majesty's service, and that he, (Sir Francis), approved the act.

On the 23d May Mr. Stevenson presented the subject to the consideration of her majesty's government. After referring to those avowals, he said that, "under such circumstances, it was not to have been expected that the whole proceeding could be regarded by the government of the United States as any other right, or as a matter of course. Still, a daring aggression upon rights and sovereignty, utterly inconsistent with all the principles of national law, and wholly irreconcilable with the friendly and peaceful relations of the two countries, is a case, in which no upper unqualified and unwarlike humanity." He concludes by expressing the confident expectation of the president of the United States that the whole proceeding would not only be disavowed and disapproved, but such redress as the nature of the case obviously requires will be promptly made." To this our government would the final answer of the British government.

On the 13th November last, Alexander McLeod, a British subject, was arrested and imprisoned by the authorities of the state of New York, on a charge of arson and murder, as having been engaged in the case of the destruction of the Caroline.

On the 12th of December, 1840, Sir F. Head made a demand on the president for the release of McLeod, on the ground that the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities; and that the act, accordingly to the usage of nations, can only be the subject of discussion between the two national governments.

To this demand the secretary of state has replied that the president has no power under the constitution and laws of the United States to interfere between McLeod and the constituted authorities of the state of New York—and that "the president is not aware of any principle of international law, or indeed of reason or justice, which entitles such officers to immunity before the legal tribunals, who commit voluntarily within their independent and undoubted jurisdiction, because they acted in obedience to their superior authorities, or because their acts have become the subject of diplomatic discussion between the two governments." And that "if the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her majesty's service, obeying the orders of their superior authorities, this fact has not been before communicated to the government of the United States, or presented to the public administration; and it will be for the court which has cognizance of the offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged, to decide on its validity when legally established before it."

The British minister, expressing his regret at the decision, had returned the subject to his government.

From these premises, Mr. E. after expressly disclaiming any intention to say who was right or who was wrong, and arguing as to what might be the course of the British government, drew the conclusion that the diplomatic discussion on the subject was not closed, inasmuch as Mr. Fox had referred himself to his government for instructions; that as yet, therefore, no definite issue had been made up, and that it would be time enough to act when the British minister had received the reply of his government.

Mr. E. deprecated the excitement which had been manifested on the border, declaring that it ought to receive no countenance from any one. He regarded any action on the part of this house as improper, so long as negotiations were pending; and hoped that the report would be re-committed to the committee with instructions to report something of the following character:

"On the appearance of the reciprocal complaints referred to the correspondence submitted on the subjects of diplomatic discussion between the governments of the two countries, the committee having entire confidence that the rights and honor of the United States would be maintained, and maintaining the hope that the controversy will be brought to a satisfactory termination, are of the opinion that no action of this house is, at this time, necessary. They therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject."

Mr. Fillmore rose and said that, in the course of the debate, he had been anticipated by other gentlemen in much that he had intended to say.

The question was of an important and important nature to this section of country than to any other; and he desired to express his opinion in relation to the vote he had just given in favor of the motion to lay on the table, coupled with a motion to print.

He may, he observed, be considered as having the purpose of this report; I have only heard it read once at the clerk's table, and I have had no opportunity to examine its contents. The gentleman from S. Carolina says it is conciliatory; that it will add to the harmony of the feelings between the two on the frontier. I believe that he thinks his report will have that effect; but I much fear, from what other gentlemen of the committee say; that he is mistaken. I voted in favor of laying the motion on the table, because I thought that the report would not be such as the gentlemen anticipated, and I wanted the report laid on the table that I might have time to look into it, and see if my original impression should be confirmed. If, upon examination, I had found that it was not calculated to produce the results I apprehended, no man would vote for its printing more freely than I would. The house, however, has refused to lay the motion to print on the table, and has thought proper to decide that the report shall be published.

Having, as I have stated, only heard the report once read, and judging from what others say of it, I concur in the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), that the subject should be re-committed to the committee on foreign affairs. I had hoped from the committee a calm, deliberate and dignified report in the case of the burning of the Caroline and the arrest of McLeod; that it would be coolly considered, and that it would be a record of embracing, as it apparently does, all our subjects of controversy with Great Britain, and that it would have set the country right with reference to the facts in that case. I may be mistaken as regards some of these facts, and upon a careful examination of the testimony, subsequent to the time when I last submitted a few remarks on this case, I observed I was mistaken in some of the facts connected with that transaction. As I was not present on the occasion, all the knowledge I have derived from the newspapers and from public documents, as they may, and probably do. But upon this question, which, as I have said, is one of vital importance to that part of the country where I reside, I cannot refuse to speak in the first place, and there is a judicial question depending. And I was in hopes that in this report, exciting and inflammatory in its character as I now think it is, nothing would have been said, and that, so far as this house was concerned, nothing would have been done, calculated to increase the excitement which already exists. I confess I have heard with regret and shame the reports from that part of the country in regard to the treatment of an individual, now on his way to be put on his trial for murder. I cannot for any consideration countenance for a moment the idea that the laws of this country are to be barely trampled on by any authority whatsoever. I cannot countenance the idea that the judiciary of the country shall for a moment be overruled, directed or controlled, by any other authority than that of the laws themselves. And, whilst I say this, I am also unwilling to see any thing that may tend to say anything here, which may tend to such results. I hope that we may have been misinformed as to the nature of the proceedings there; I am unwilling to believe that, in a community of citizens such as that, and with such a sense of right and wrong, and who are highly respectable and intelligent, such things have occurred. I say, I hope we have been misinformed. I trust we have. I have seen different statements of those transactions, and some of them are very different from what I have heard. But one thing, at all events, should be borne in mind by all whose duty requires them to act on this subject here. There is a great state of excitement on that frontier, which might by possibility lead to an outbreak; my objection to the printing of the report was, that it was calculated to inflame the public mind; and I was governed in that vote by three reasons. In the first place, I did not wish that any thing should be done here which might have a tendency to injure the individual who is now on his way to be tried by the laws of the state of New York. I desire that the law should have its free action; that no excitement should be raised against Mr. Leach which might prevent any impartial trial. In the second place, I do not desire that any part of the part of this house should compromise or control the executive of this nation in the negotiations now pending between the government of the U. States and that of Great Britain. I have no doubt but our confidence in the incoming administration, and this controversy can be amicably and honorably settled between the two governments. I desire that it should. But there is a third and very strong reason in my mind, and any thing that has done to exasperate the public mind on the subject of war with Great Britain. It is this: for three or four years I have used all the exertions in my power to induce this administration, which is responsible to the people, to remove the cause of our quarrel with the northern frontier. But all my efforts were in vain. And yet the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens), now tells us that the course to be pursued to avoid a war with Great Britain is, to stand up here, to injure the people, and to excite them to war; that, he says, will avert a war. I may have been mistaken in the meaning. I know that those were not his words. But I would submit to him that the best way to avoid a war with Great Britain is to show that we are not prepared to meet her if there is to be war; because reasonable preparations for defence are better than gauding.

Mr. Fillmore then alluded to the defenceless condition of the northern frontier. He desired, and he hoped, that the power of this country would yield nothing to the demands of Great Britain, to which she was not fairly entitled. But, at the same time, he regarded it as rather the act of a madman in precipitate haste to come into war before she was prepared for it, than the act of a statesman. In his section of country, the people would yield nothing to Great Britain, to which she was not justly entitled; or they would yield it only with the last drop of blood. But he did not wish to prepare to be drawn into war; he did not wish to induce Great Britain to invade our defenceless coast. The true plan was to prepare for war if we had yet to come to it, but to do nothing in the way of bragging, or in the way of showing that we were not his Mr. F.'s people-shrinking from their just share of responsibility. All they had—thirty population, their lives, every thing—they were willing to devote, if need be, to the service and honor of their country. But, as it was the power of wisdom and prudence, before we made a declaration of war, to prepare to fight. This was all he desired; and if this report was calculated to stir up a war feeling, without corresponding preparation being made to meet the consequences, he felt that it was not proper. He did not wish the country to be disgraced by defeat. When she must go to war, he desired to see her prepared for it; he desired to see her placed in a situation which would enable her to bid defiance to the power of Great Britain.

Mr. F. then alluded to the fortification bill reported from the committee of ways and means the other day by its chairman (Mr. Jones). That bill contained appropriations to the amount of nearly half a million of dollars, (though he believed, he was only about half of the amount usually appropriated for such purposes); and yet there was not a solitary fortification on the northern frontier to which any part of that money was to be applied. Was this the way in which to show our power? Did the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens), who presented the report, desire to de-out any mode by which the salary could be restored to the original amount.

Mr. Jones said the gentleman could accomplish his object by bringing in a bill fixing the salary of the commissioner of pensions at $3,000.

Mr. Adams suggested that there was another way in which the object might be effected. Let him propose a resolution as an amendment to this bill, declaring that the bill fixing the salary of the commissioner of pensions at $2,500 be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and that the salary be fixed at $3,000. And then the gentleman (Mr. Jones) might move to amend the title of the bill by adding, "and for other purposes," as might be done to a bill passed the other day. [Laughter.]

Mr. Jones proposed some fractional amendments, which were agreed to; and certain amendments in phraseology were also adopted.

On the item appropriating $2,250 for compensation of the superintendent and watchmen of the northwest executive building, some explanations took place between Messrs. Adams and Jones (which the reporter did not distinctly hear) in regard to laborers on the public buildings; but which led to a statement by Mr. Kim, that the committee on public buildings were prepared, at the proper time, to offer amendments in relation thereto; which closed the conversation.

Mr. Dodge moved to amend the bill by increasing the compensation of the surveyor general of Wisconsin and Iowa from $1,500 to $2,000.

The chairman decided the amendment to be out of order, (for the same reason as was applicable to the case of the commissioner of pensions.)

The items in reference to the compensation of the commissioner of public buildings gave rise to some explanations between Messrs. Sturdy, Jones and Adams; and Mr. Sturdy, in a view, he said, to expose the manner in which the present administration had increased the salaries of its officers, moved to strike out the items; and he then made a few remarks, and stated that, when the salaries of these public buildings came to be investigated, there would be found in them as much rascality, fraud and corruption, in every sense of those terms, as existed in any other branch of the public service.

Mr. Lincoln made some explanations in relation to this office, and the salary allotted to its incumbent, and the manner in which it had been fixed.

Mr. Adams followed in some remarks, in which he alluded to the manner in which the committee on the public buildings of this city had been treated by the government—which treatment he designated as cruel and unjust; and he hoped that the committee on the public buildings, when they came to offer an amendment they had in mind, would propose large and liberal appropriations.

Mr. Petricin replied, contending that injustice had not been done to the workmen, inasmuch as they had been duly notified of the course to be pursued by the government.

The discussion was further continued by Messrs. Petricin and Jones, (the latter of whom replied to that portion of the remarks of Mr. Sturdy which related to corruption, &c. and demanded to know why it was that, in every opportunity for investigation, that gentleman, and the party with which he acted, had slumbered for eight months of the last session and two months of this, content to sit still in their places without any one bringing to light any of those abuses of which they talked so much in general terms, but none of which they would assent to.) Mr. J. also replied to the remarks of Mr. Adams in relation to the workmen on the public buildings, and concluding the subject of the government in those proceedings, and that every thing had been done for the workmen that could be done.)

Mr. Sturdy replied at length to Mr. Jones, whose remarks in relation to investigation he characterized as singularly disingenuous and unfair, coming as they did from a gentleman of his general conduct. After which, Mr. S. withdrew his motion to strike out.

Mr. Leonard moved to amend the item appropriating $1,907 "for compensation of three assistants to the commissioner of public buildings, as superintendent of the Potomac bridge," by striking out "and inserting $1,300," and by striking out "$1,907" and inserting "$1,300." Which amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McCarty proposed as an amendment a bill (or the substance thereof) providing that the sum of $30,000 be appropriated for the repair of the Potomac bridge, (that being the amount estimated to be necessary by the engineers.)

Mr. Jones raised a question of order, and some conversation ensued on that point. [Mr. W. which the reporter understood that the amendment was before the committee in order.]

Mr. Jones raised the objection that the appropriation was not embraced in the estimates of the present year; and that if objects embracing appropriations of large sums of money which were not included in the estimates were to be made, it would become requisite to provide additional funds for the purpose.

Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson was understood to say that the estimates had been in it at a former session. The amendment was argued briefly, but urgently by Messrs. Reed, Monroe and Graham, of N. C. on the score of public necessity and convenience.

Mr. Barnard offered the following amendment to the main proposition:

"So much of this sum as may be applied for repairs shall be applied under the direction of the secretary of war; and in restoring the bridge after the general plan shall be agreed to."

Mr. B. advocated the amendment of Mr. McCarty at some length, showing the necessity of this appropriation with reference to the transportation of the mail and the keeping open the communication between the north and the south. And he wished that the question should be determined now, whether this passage across the Potomac river should be abandoned to a mere ferry, as it was at this moment, or whether they were willing that the bridge which formerly existed there should be replaced.

Mr. Mason hoped this appropriation would be made. The administration about to come in would have breaches enough to repair without this; and he hoped it would be the chairman of the committee of ways and means would be in favor of repairing this one, at least.

Mr. Pope was in favor of any reasonable appropriation for this object, insisting that we owed it to ourselves, to our pride, and our character as a nation, to restore this bridge.

Mr. W. C. Johnson asked Mr. Barnard so to modify his proposition as to bring the whole matter under the direction of the secretary of war. He then went briefly into the history and condition of the bridge, and showed that it would be an act of wisdom and economy to make this appropriation quickly.

Mr. Floyd gave notice that, if the appropriation was not made, he would move to strike out the item providing for compensation for the assistants of the commissioner of public buildings as superintendent of the Potomac bridge.

Mr. McCarty's amendment was then taken; and the vote stood as follows: yeas 40, no quorum voting. Mr. Lincoln called for tellers, who were appointed, (Messrs. Marrow and Hopkins.) And, the question being again taken, the vote stood: yeas 75, nays 42—still no quorum voting.

Mr. Vanderpool and Mr. Lewis Williams insisted that the fact be reported to the house. And the fact was accordingly reported in form.

Mr. Pope moved a call of the house. Mr. Vanderpool rose and answered in the affirmative.

The speaker was requested to count the house, which having been done, 123 members, (being a quorum and two over, including the speaker,) appeared to be present. The house then went back again into committee. And the question being again taken, (by tellers,) on the amendment appropriating $30,000 for the repairs of the Potomac bridge, the vote stood: yeas 79, nays 44. So the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. Barnard, he modified it to meet the suggestion of Mr. W. C. Johnson; and, as modified, it was agreed to.

Mr. Floyd then moved to strike out the entire clause; which motion was rejected.

Mr. Green, of Kentucky, moved to strike out all the items of appropriation having reference to the branch mints of North Carolina, Georgia and New Orleans, and the expenditures connected therewith. Mr. Green contended that these establishments had been created to give offices to favorites, and made some remarks directed to the necessity of carrying out the promises of retrenchment and reform which they had made before the people, and which the cowardly administration was bound to carry out.

Mr. Mason, of Ohio, contended that it would be time enough to vindicate the principles of general Harrison's administration after it had come into power; and that the friends of that eminent citizen should wait as long as they could in a helpless minority in this house, to attempt a work which could never be judiciously and properly executed without reference to a regular and general system of reduction and economy. He alluded to the just reprobation of which his might be taken to these establishments, but thought that there was no official information before the house which could authorize its action upon this at this moment. Why should the whole party undertake reforms now, when they were in a minority, and when they could neither carry a proposition of their own, nor prevent the success of any proposition which their adversaries might bring forward? Let them be patient till they came into power, and they would then find in him a judicious and considerate friend to all reforms. Mr. M. illustrated his views on this subject at considerable length.

Mr. Graham, of N. C. opposed the amendment. He could not assent to the proposition, or the proposition, that it would advance the purpose he had in view—economy. He (Mr. G.) wished the good administration of those establishments, not their destruction.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. Conner. Mr. Graves felt disposed to vote for the amendment of his colleague, and was anxious to embrace this as the most auspicious moment to test the question, and he should approve that the purposes of economy would be answered by abolishing these establishments, he, for one, was ready now to carry the principles of reform and retrenchment which he had professed. Mr. G. also expressed his views at length.

Mr. Byrnes then obtained the floor, but yielded to a motion that the committee rise, which motion having prevailed, the committee rose.

After the committee rose, Mr. Banks asked leave to move to amend the bill to establish a post road in his district. Mr. Peck objected. And, at half past 4 o'clock, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 17. Mr. Lane made an unsuccessful attempt to suspend the rules for the purpose of going into committee of the whole on the status of the national bank, and to inquire into the state of Indiana the land selected by her for the continuation of that part of the Wabash and Erie canal, which lies between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute.

On leave, Mr. Lincoln reported a bill to confirm land patents, which was read twice and laid on the table.

The house, then, on motion of Mr. Jones, of Va. resolved itself into a committee, and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. Bell, of Tennessee, was called to be chair. The motion pending was that offered by Mr. Green, yesterday, to strike out, first, the following item:

"For compensation to the officers and clerks of the branch mint at Charlottesville, N. C. $6,000."

Mr. Byrnes, of N. C. being entitled to the floor, addressed the house in opposition to this motion. He perceived in this motion an insidious attempt to strike down the only prospects which this country has for a permanent currency, and an attempt to circulate for the transaction of the business of a great portion of the people of this country. He entered into an investigation, and replied to various remarks in support of this motion. He dwelt at great length, on the general subject of currency, the tariff, &c. and to opposition to a national bank. It was against the policy of abolishing these mints, and the independent treasury, which was a foundation to abolishing the constitution, and for building on their ruins a national bank, that he had felt it his duty to raise his warning voice.

Mr. Tilgham succeeded. He opposed this item of appropriation, and the principle, which would result in an appropriation for all the branch mints, which was proposed in this bill, to an amount of $73,850, and could not agree that the general question of the currency, which he has been discussing, had any immediate connexion with the proposition before him. It is said that this proposition is in effect a proposition to strike down the only chance of this country for a permanent and suitable currency for the country. He desired the repeal of the law abolishing these mints, and thought it would be much more easily carried after the house had expressed an opinion against it, by refusing these appropriations. The mints were totally useless, and therefore he opposed appropriations for them.

Mr. L. Williams should oppose this motion—as he was not satisfied of the inexpediency of these mints; after the experiment had been fairly made, and the country convinced that the country required their abolishment, he would go against him. He disclaimed opposition to this motion from any local feelings, but for the interest of the common country.

Mr. Hebranson noticed the remarks of the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. Tilgham.) He opposed so decided action as the abolition of these mints, until further investigation had been made, and advocated their continuance, on account of the convenience of the people, and because it was constitutional for government to establish them. He disclaimed opposition to this motion from any local feelings, but for the interest of the common country. He should oppose the abolition of these minis, till the experiment had been fairly tried of their operation.

Mr. Everett opposed the striking out of these mints, because he considered it as a vicious legislation. The house was bound by the appropriations, as such as appropriations for the salary of officers. The house was bound by the constitution, to make appropriations for the salary of officers, and by law, to appropriate for these mints. As long as they were supported by the law of the land, they were bound to appropriate for them.

Mr. Cooper, of Geo. opposed this motion, and contended that these mints should not be repealed, because the points sought to be established by them had been sustained by experience. He referred to the fact, while they had been considered as minor mints, that nearly two-thirds of all the U. States gold that has been coined, has been by these two mints at Charlotte and Dahlonega.

Mr. Tilgham followed in explanation of his former remarks, and in reply to other arguments.

Mr. Stansly would not now support this motion, and leave the machinery there to run to waste and decay. He thought this was not the time to abolish these appropriations.

He said he would offer a resolution, at the proper place in the bill, directing the secretary of the treasury to inquire into the operation of the branch mints at Charlotte, Dahlonega and New York, and to report on the propriety of continuing them; how the machinery might be sold, &c.

Mr. Graves said he had stated yesterday that he thought perhaps another occasion would have been more suitable for going into this subject, and, as he was, he was as ready as any man now here to make this motion. As the motion had been made, however, he should support it. He was satisfied that these mints were not necessary, and not more than our necessary in the United States, and should vote to strike out these mints.

Mr. Dawson said the question was, "Is it for the benefit for the country to prevent these appropriations?" The only consideration that could be urged against these mints, is that they produce no profit. But he said that they were not intended for this, but for convenience. They were for the glory and honor of the country—for the purpose of creating a coinage under the constitution. And what billion could we count. Mostly that of our own country. And where is it raised? Some of it is raised in the states of Georgia, Alabama and North Carolina, and there he contended it should be coined.

Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson, asked if the resolution of the committee from North Carolina, (Mr. Stansly's) was in order? The chairman said it was.

Mr. Stansly proposed to the chairman of the committee of ways and means to adopt it and insert within the bill, so that it might be acted on next session. Mr. Jones made a reply.

Mr. W. C. Johnson said his object in speaking, was to indicate his preference for the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina. (Mr. Stansly's), to the vote he should give. He should vote for striking out the appropriation. As informed he was asked the hint was a source of great expense to the government. To a government like ours, we ought not to scatter the power of coining money all over the union, simply because congress has power to do it. He was for having our government supreme within its sphere of action—and having the states supreme within their sphere of action—one coinage of money, and one solitary mint for the purpose of coining money all over the United States. He was constrained to vote for striking out the appropriation, but should not vote, if he could, for the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. Graham briefly gave his views in opposition to this motion.

The motion was then taken and negatived—affirmative 53, negative 73. On which the committee rose, and (at 5½ o'clock), the house adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 15. The journal of yesterday was read; when on motion of Mr. Edward Darley, of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That henceforth, for the remainder of the present session, the house will daily take a recess from half past 2 to 4 o'clock, P. M.

Mr. Ames, of Virginia, moved to suspend the rules, and that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, with a view to proceed with the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic bills, directing the secretary of the treasury to report to congress the next session information in relation to the branch mints, the better to enable congress to act upon the subject of their discontinuance.

Mr. Jones said the proposition of the honorable member had been decided by the chair to be out of order when offered by him as an amendment to the bill; and that it must have been offered at the time that, in addition to the fact that it was out of order, gentlemen were preparing to debate it. And that at this late period of the session, with most of the appropriation bills to act on, he could not consider any business should take precedence of those bills.

Mr. Stansly remarked that the chairman of the committee of ways and means and his friends had the majority in this house, and could prevent debate on the subject, and he refused to assent to that resolution at the time, when no rule of order interfered, and when a public good was to be achieved, on the heads of the administration party let the responsibility rest. Mr. S. had discharged his duty.

The house then again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and resumed the consideration of the bill for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government for the year 1841. Mr. Bell was again called to the chair of the committee.

Mr. Green moved to amend the bill by striking out the item, "for compensation to the officers and clerk of the branch mint at Dahlonega, Georgia, six thousand dollars."

Mr. Green supported his motion at some length, when the debate was continued by Mr. Nebel, who alluded to Mr. Afford's speech on the treasury note bill relative to his view of the tariff question.

Mr. Afford explained. The difference between the tariff and the treasury note bill, was that the object of the tariff was to raise money for the treasury. The object of the treasury note bill was to raise money for the treasury. The object of the tariff was to raise money for the treasury. The object of the treasury note bill was to raise money for the treasury.

When I proper time arrive, and we come to the tariff in good faith, there will be no difficulty. If gentlemen will do as they say, abide the compromise. Let the proper committee take the whole subject before them—wines, silks, sugars, salt, and all the rest of the tariff. In the spirit of the compromise act, legislate on the subject as becomes the American congress, and all will be right. But I do object to this partial revision, at this time; and I am satisfied it had the object I alluded to in my speech.

Mr. Chairman, all agree it could not be done this session for want of time. What then is the motive, unless it is to imbue upon the in-coming administration the principles of the tariff party? If any impartial man will look upon the tariff, and see the duties taxed, and those which are free of duty, he can but see that an ad valorem duty of fifteen or twenty per cent. on all will raise a revenue not only ample but superabundant. And, I am of opinion, if all are taken together, a lower rate will do; and, if there is to be discrimination at all, it will best be to diminish the duty on necessities. We can let better at the proper time. By that time the actual deficit will be known and provided for. I know my friend would not misrepresent me willingly. If between us there is the best of feeling, and certainly no great difference in principle, I desire not to be misunderstood. I have no letter writers, no hangers, and neither myself nor the reporters of either party, are able to write the speech correctly; they, from the rapidity of my manner of speaking, and I, because I speak without notes, and generally when I am excited by the course of debate indulged in this house.

The debate was continued at great length by Messrs. M. J. Cooper, (Clifford and Black in explanation), Stearns, (Graves, in explanation), and Warren.

Mr. Warren availed himself of this opportunity to repeat what he said with much effect. He stated as gentlemen advanced some state in a speech made by Mr. M. J. Cooper, in committee of the whole on the state of the union on the treasury note bill, and vindicated the whig party of the state of Georgia in reference to their action upon certain exciting topics discussed in that speech. Mr. W. before entering on his subject, condemned the practice of making one speech on the floor of the house and writing out another for the newspapers, stating that he would be glad if the reporters would write out his remarks and publish them as they were spoken, without submitting them to his revision—courteously adding, that the usages of their profession should be complied with on this part, whether he might be called upon to do so or not. He yielded the floor several times, for explanation, to Mr. M. J. Cooper, and some questions of order were made. Mr. W. concluded at half past 2 o'clock.

Mr. W. Thompson obtained the floor, but the hour designated in the resolution of this morning having arrived. The house took a recess until 4 o'clock.

Evening session. At 4 o'clock, Mr. Bell, the chairman of the committee of the whole on the state of the union, resumed his seat, and called the committee to order.

The question being on striking out the clause for the salaries of the officers of the branch mint at Dahlonega, Georgia, which was negatived without a division.

Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson proposed an amendment appropriating $3,000 for the support of pauper lunatics in the district of Columbia in the lunatic hospital of Baltimore. The amendment was adopted without division.

Mr. Hand moved to strike out the proviso fixing the compensation of district attorneys, marshals and clerks.

Mr. Jones, chairman of the committee of ways and means declined the proviso.

Mr. A. G. Brown opposed the proviso.

Mr. Evans thought it was a violation of the rules of parliamentary law to place the proviso in the bill.

Mr. Briggs thought it strange that Mr. Jones should have delayed the use of his pruning knife until now, though he thought the eloquence of the officers in question should be curtailed. Mr. Jones explained.

And after much debate, in which several members participated, the committee rose, and the house adjourned.

Friday Feb. 19. Immediately after the journal was read, Mr. Holmes of South Carolina, rose and asked leave to say a few words.

The speaker said it could only be done by general consent.

Mr. Holmes then commenced by saying he was not in the house last night, and consequently did not hear the speech of the gentleman from South Carolina, (looking towards Mr. Stansly, who had spoken on the night before).

Mr. Stansly rose and objected to Mr. Holmes proceeding, unless it was understood that he should have the liberty of replying. Mr. H. could reply in committee of the whole, where each side could be heard; and in committee of the whole, a fair field, Mr. S. said he should be happy to meet him.

Mr. H. was objecting for this reason, Mr. Holmes could not proceed.

Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, rose and said he impud his colleague [Mr. Holmes] would treat the attack upon South Carolina, made by the gentleman from North Carolina, with great contempt and derision. His arms, Mr. C. said were not long enough to reach the state of South Carolina.

Mr. Stansly said the gentleman's colleague then would only treat this [Mr. S's] remarks with the same contempt which he had treated the attack upon South Carolina, made by the gentleman from North Carolina, with great contempt and derision. His arms, Mr. C. said were not long enough to reach the state of South Carolina.

Mr. Stansly said the gentleman's colleague then would only treat this [Mr. S's] remarks with the same contempt which he had treated the attack upon South Carolina, made by the gentleman from North Carolina, with great contempt and derision. His arms, Mr. C. said were not long enough to reach the state of South Carolina.

At the adjournment of the house yesterday, a motion by Mr. Eastman was pending to suspend the rules to consider the bill to extend for five years the provision of certain voters.

Mr. Eastman declining to withdraw or waive his motion, the question to suspend was taken by yeas and nays; and there appeared yeas 106, nays 42.

Two-thirds voting in the affirmative, the rules were suspended, and the bill was read by the clerk, and committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union on the bill. Mr. Evans, of Maine, was called to the chair of the committee. The bill was read.

Mr. Eastman explained briefly the provisions of the bill.

Mr. Hand also made some explanations in relation to the previous laws on the subject, and the construction which had been given thereto, and sent to the clerk to table a report made by the committee on resolutions proposed by Mr. Hand, relating to the case marriage should not exclude a widow from the claim, &c. The report was read by the clerk.

Mr. Prentiss said that there was no better mode of killing time than of talking it to death. He moved that the committee rise and report it to the house; and, for his own part, he should vote for it. He supposed they were all going to vote for it.

Mr. Stansly said the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Prentiss) was wrong in supposing that there would be an opposition to the bill. He (Mr. S.) assented to it, and for the reason, he was understood to say, that they were not going to take up the tariff. Let us wait until the next session of congress.

The treasury was bankrupt, and we get into a bad before we contract more. If we make these appropriations before the new administration came in, the whigs would be made to take the responsibility.

cola, of Massachusetts, was called to the chair of the committee.

Mr. Abbott took the floor, and in the course of his remarks Mr. Mason rose to order, on the ground that his remarks were irrelevant to the bill before the house.

Mr. Stensy asked Mr. Mason to withdraw his call. He was not heard to do so, but the chair made a decision which we could not hear. The result was, that Mr. Abbott continued his remarks till 7 o'clock. When he concluded, Mr. Underwood obtained the floor; when the committee rose.

The speaker, by permission, laid before the house sundry communications from the departments. And then the house adjourned.

Saturday, Feb. 20. The journal of yesterday being read—Mr. Smith, of Indiana, moved to amend it by inserting in substance the following:

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, asked the general consent of the house to allow him to lay before the house and have printed a number of joint resolutions which had been accumulating on his hands from his legislature.

It being objected by Mr. Russell, Mr. Smith then moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of leave, which was ruled out of order by the chair. Mr. Jones, of Virginia, then obtained the floor, and moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Smith said he wished to have his motion noticed on the journals, that he had attempted, as he had frequently, to obtain the chair for that purpose, but he thought it due to his state, and especially to himself, as the resolutions he was satisfied were intended for himself and other of his colleagues who acted with him politically.

Mr. Cady thought the journal ought not to be amended, as it would give an undue advantage to the member from Indiana on the public records.—Members from almost every state had resolutions or memorials from their legislatures to present, and wished to present them at the earliest opportunity. They could do so in order, but did not like to be making motions to suspend the rules so as to get that motion on the journal to show their zeal. It was not customary to enter them now, &c.

Mr. Lincoln said motions to suspend the rules, when they were ineffective, were not entered on the proceedings, unless they led to results which it became necessary to journalize.

Mr. Smith replied, though it was unusual, if he was dispensed, he would make it appear on the journal, by calling the yeas and nays; but, as the time of the house was precious and far spent, he would not consume the time by doing so, and would willingly forego the proposition, but would not allow every opportunity to introduce these resolutions, and he hoped the house would afford the opportunity.

Mr. Jones, chairman of the committee of ways and means, moved the special order on the general appropriation bill.

Mr. Russell moved that the rule in favor of the special order be suspended, and that the house proceed to the consideration of private bills.

This question was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: for the suspension 79, against 46. There not being two-thirds in the affirmative, the rule was not suspended.

The motion of Mr. Jones was then agreed to.

The house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill for the service of the year 1841; (Mr. Lincoln was again called to the chair of the committee.)

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. Stensy, in the instant, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. Underwood addressed the committee for two hours and a half, first, as to the abuses of the government and the means by which they were to be corrected; and then in reference to several of the leading questions of public policy—the currency, distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands, &c. Mr. U. was followed by Mr. Sergeant, who spoke for about half an hour, partly in reply to some of the positions assumed by Mr. Underwood; when he gave way to a motion by Mr. Grinnell that the committee rise; which motion having prevailed, the committee rose, and reported progress.

Mr. Russell moved that the house do adjourn.

It was carried by yeas and nays as follows: for the adjournment 76, against 1160.

So the house adjourned until Monday, 11 o'clock A. M.

Monday, Feb. 22. Mr. Thompson, by leave reported a bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States generally for the year 1841, and for armament of fortifications, also for raising a company of sappers, miners and pontooners, and appropriating $300,000 for steam ships of war. The amount proposed by the bill to be appropriated for fortifications is $1,678,075.—which bill was twice read and committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The rules were suspended for one hour for the purpose of taking into consideration the bill from the senate to confirm to Indiana the land cessions for the Wabash and Erie canal, and the bill of this house making further appropriations for the exploration and survey of the northeastern boundary.

The house then resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The Indiana canal land bill was read by the clerk, and no objection being made, it was laid aside, to be reported to the house.

The house then considered further appropriations for the exploration and survey of the northeastern boundary was taken up and read by the clerk.

When this bill was under consideration on the 13th inst, a motion was made by Mr. Underwood that the bill by striking out $75,000, the amount proposed to be appropriated, and inserting $37,500. Mr. Pettkin, on the same day, moved to reduce the appropriation to $12,000.

These propositions now came before the house. Mr. Proctor, who held the floor at the time the bill was last up, said he would not now occupy the time of the committee a minute. He had paid some attention to the bill when it was last under consideration; and he was convinced that the sum now proposed by it was necessary for the purpose. He, therefore, should withdraw all opposition in every shape, and he would vote for the bill. He had ascertained that there were three lines to be run instead of one.

Mr. Cady then proposed the amendment at some length, and made some general observations on the northeastern boundary question. He hoped that no member would vote to reduce the amount, as, if the whole sum was not necessary, it would not be expended.

Mr. Pettkin insisted that the appropriation was extravagant—and, in proof of this, referred to appropriations made in other surveys and explorations.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

And the question was then taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

The committee, on motion of Mr. Johnson, then rose and reported both bills to the house.

The bill in relation to the Indiana canal lands was then forthwith ordered to a third reading, was read the third time accordingly, passed, and returned to the committee by which it was reported.

The bill appropriating $75,000 for continuing the exploration and survey of the northeastern boundary was then taken up in the house. Mr. Campbell, of Tennessee, renewed the motion to strike the bill by striking out $75,000, and inserting $37,500.

Mr. Pettkin renewed his motion to amend by inserting $20,000.

Mr. Lewis withdrew moved $30,000.

The question was then taken on the question, which was ordered; and Mr. Pettkin moved to reconsider.

It was not in order, as the previous question had been moved.

The questions were severally put on striking out $75,000 and inserting $30,000, $37,500, and $20,000, and they were severally rejected.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time forthwith.

It was read the third time accordingly; when the previous question was moved, seconded, put, and carried in the affirmative; and the main question was put, that is, that the bill do pass? and was decided in the affirmative. It was then sent to the senate for concurrence.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, and took up the general appropriation bill. The question occurred on the motion of Mr. Hunt to strike out the proviso of the bill relative to the compensation of the several district attorneys, marshals and clerks.

Mr. Sergeant resumed and concluded his remarks at one o'clock, when Mr. Stensy withdrew his remarks to strike out the enacting clause. After some explanations between Messrs. Stensy, Abbott and Kives, Mr. Cushing renewed the motion to strike out the enacting clause, and addressed the committee for about twenty minutes. At the conclusion of his remarks, he withdrew the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The question then occurred on Mr. Hunt's motion, when Mr. Hunt addressed the committee. Mr. Reed entered into a history of this matter, and of the various parts that had been made to provide a remedy for what he considered an evil which ought to be corrected. The fees were exorbitant and should be reduced.

Mr. C. Davis submitted an amendment, and explained the effect of his proposition. He had not concluded when the hour of half past two o'clock arrived, and the house then took a recess until 4 o'clock.

Evening session. At 4 o'clock the committee re-assembled—the general appropriation bill being under consideration, and the amendment of Mr. Davis, of Ky. relative to the fees and emoluments of district attorneys, marshals and clerks being pending. Mr. Davis, of Ky. who was interrupted in his remarks by the arrival of the hour foretold, resumed the floor and advocated his amendment.

He was followed by Mr. Sallomatt, who advocated the reduction of the fees and emoluments of the officers named.

Mr. Thompson, of S. C. followed, repudiated the idea that the treasury was to be replenished by the reduction of the fees and emoluments of its officers; entered into a vindication of the south from the charge of its having been the father of the tariff system, and denied that the tariff of 1816 was protective in its character.

Messrs. Mason, of Ohio, Thompson and Erown, of Mississippi, Friederick, Grinnell, Copier, of Georgia, Mr. Davis, of Ky. and Mr. Dickson participated in the debate. The latter suggested an amendment to the effect that after an attorney, marshal or clerk's compensation amounted to the maximum fixed in the proviso, they should be entitled to a per centum on all order that maximum of 10, 20 or 30 per cent.

Mr. Thompson, of Mississippi then moved to strike out the proviso in the bill and in lieu thereof insert a substitute giving the United States district attorneys, marshals and clerks respectively the same fees as are received, or are now or may hereafter be allowed by the laws of said states respectively, where said courts are held, to the clerks, attorneys and counsel and sheriffs in the higher courts of said states in which like services are rendered, except that the marshals shall receive for summoning every jury, thirty dollars, and for every day attendance upon any court five dollars, &c.

Mr. Reed submitted a question of order in relation to this amendment, the amount of which question was, whether it is competent to introduce in this bill any proposition going to increase or diminish the compensation of any officer which is not provided by law.

The chair decided, in substance, that, although he did not conceive it was strictly in order for the committee of ways and means to have reported the proviso in the bill, yet, as it was in the bill, and not in the power of the committee to rule it out of order, it was competent to amend it.

Mr. Hunt advocated Mr. Thompson's amendment.

Mr. Fillmore opposed it on the ground that its details were defective, and stated that all the difficulties arose from placing the subject in the appropriation bill.

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, was against Mr. Thompson's amendment, and in favor of the proviso as it was reported in the bill.

The question was then put on the amendment, and there appeared yeas 66, nays 66.

The committee being equally divided, the chair voted in the affirmative, and so Mr. Thompson's amendment was agreed to.

At a quarter of nine o'clock, Mr. Underwood moved that the committee rise. The motion was rejected.

Mr. Core Johnson moved a long additional proviso which the chair ruled to be out of order, on the ground that it was subject different from that under consideration.

Mr. Core Johnson appeared.

The chair then stated at large the grounds of his decision, and referred to numerous precedents in support of it.

Mr. Carey asked Mr. Johnson to withdraw his appeal. Mr. Johnson declined.

Mr. Underwood was opposed to the decision of the chair, and referred to precedents in support of his position.

Mr. Wise explained as to one of the precedents referred to by Mr. Underwood, and showed that it ought not to be cited, as it was made under extraordinary circumstances.

Mr. Underwood resumed on the appeal, but before he had concluded, he gave way to Mr. Core Johnson to move that the committee rise.

It was five minutes past nine o'clock.

The motion prevailed, though less than a quorum voted.

The speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. Fillmore moved the printing of the amendment adopted on the motion of Mr. Thompson, of Mississippi. And then the house adjourned.

Niles' National Register.

JEREMIAH HUGHES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Sixteen pages published every Saturday---Price five dollars per annum.

Already has the Register attained an enviable reputation. Nearly the entire edition of the fifty volumes published during the life time of the elder Mr. NILES, has been disposed of, and the few remaining copies in the hands of his administrators, are rapidly going off at the price fixed by the orphans' court, 125 dollars per set, bound.

THE NEW SERIES of the work, in an enlarged form, and in a better sized type, commenced with September, 1836, since which a volume has been regularly completed every six months. Price $3 50 per volume, or $5 per annum.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, at five dollars per annum, will be received, commencing either at the time of subscribing, or with the current or any preceding volume.

The numbers will be forwarded by mail every week, carefully packed and directed, or if preferred, they can be retained until a volume is completed, and then forwarded to subscribers in volume.

The present proprietor of the work has already introduced several very material improvements—amongst which, is not only a more comprehensive index of the contents of each volume than has heretofore accompanied the work, but also a brief index of the contents of each separate number, contributing vastly to that convenience for reference, on which so much of the value of a register depends.

Again, each number of the Register, instead of having the articles promiscuously thrown into its pages, has them now arranged, so far as they will admit, after the following plan :

1st. FOREIGN ARTICLES, 1st, of a general character, as of Europe, &c. 2d, British affairs. 3d, France. 4th, Germany, and so of the various sovereignties and sections of the globe, succeeding geographically.

2d. NATIONAL CONCERNS, 1st, of a general character, Executive, Diplomatic and Official Documents; Appointments, &c. 2d, Foreign relations, Trade, Commerce, Tariff. 3d, Concerns of the Departments. 4th, Post Office. 5th, Public Lands. 6th, Army. 7th, Navy. 8th, Indian Frontier, &c.

3d. STATES OF THE UNION, under heads arranged geographically, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, &c. including Statistics, Election returns, &c.

4th. PASSING INCIDENTS, Local affairs of places, persons, and including a regular account of the latest market prices and statistics of staple articles, such as Flour, Cotton, Tobacco, &c. so as to furnish a regular compendium of each.

5th. LAW AND CASES IN COURT, Trials and Legal Decisions.

6th. POLITICS OF THE DAY, An impartial record of movements and principles of parties.

7th. INVENTIONS AND IMPROVEMENTS in arts and manufactures, &c.

8th. CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS AND SPEECHES, to the recording of which, a considerable portion of the work is necessarily devoted.

9th. A CHRONICLE, alphabetically arranged, occupies the last page of each number.

On forwarding to his subscribers the title page and index of the FIFTY volume of the new series, or SIXTIETH volume of the entire work, which this sheet will complete, the editor is bound in gratitude to acknowledge the many favors that he has met with from an intelligent public, as well as from contemporaries, in countenancing and supporting the publication, by aid of which, notwithstanding the pecuniary difficulties of the period that has transpired since he has had charge of the establishment, he is still cheered on to the performance of his task, and encouraged to devote every energy to its progress.

To have charge of one of the most authentic histories of events which have transpired within the last thirty years, as well as of innumerable reminiscences of interesting incidents prior to that period—and of keeping up a continuance of such a valuable register of events, is a responsibility of which the editor feels the full weight. The duties which such a possession implies, requires that the whole soul should be enlisted in its performance—and also that a generous aid should be afforded by all who have it in their power, without material inconvenience, to contribute to the work. The editor ventures to solicit that aid in behalf of so important an undertaking.

The first object of the publication is to furnish readers with an authentic and impartial account of passing incidents,—a record of those important official statistics to which reference can be made, with full confidence in their accuracy, on any future occasion. Of the value of the work in this respect, no better testimony need be adduced than is afforded by the frequency of the appeals that public men all over the union, make to its pages, upon almost every topic of discussion.—It is well known that during the recent ardent political struggle in this country, NILES' REGISTER was a never failing magazine from which partisans on either side derived the facts, speeches, and reports in relation both to men and things that came under review. The work constitutes, in short, as authentic and comprehensive materials for the history of the period elapsed since its publication was commenced, as ever were placed in the hands of a historian of any period.

The value of such a work in the library of an American citizen who looks towards public life, is inestimable. Judge CLEM. DORSEY, the compiler of the new publication of the "Laws of Maryland," and who was, previous to his appointment to the bench, long recognised as one of the most talented members of the legislature of Maryland and a leading politician of the state, lately remarked to the editor, "One great secret of the advantage which I always contrived to have over my opponents on any question coming before the legislature for discussion, was owing not so much to an excellent memory, which was credited to me, for being so well posted up with facts to which I could recur, and which others had forgotten, as to the precaution I used, never to go to Annapolis without taking with me my full set of Niles' Register, to the pages of which I had nothing to do but to appeal; and, sir, I never did go there without taking the whole of them with me."

RECOMMENDATIONS.

As a current weekly publication, there is perhaps none that comprises more of the USEFUL, to the generality of readers. Confined to MATTERS OF FACT, the vast volumes of fiction which occupy so large a portion of nearly all the weekly journals of the country are excluded from our pages; and even facts themselves are, as far as in our power, divested of the thousands of rumors and speculations relative to them which many papers are employed in trumpeting over the land, and to correct the errors of which, constitutes one half of their subsequent labor. With the still larger volume of advertisements, ship news and local incidents, of interest for the day and the spot only whence they are issued, the Register has nothing to do. The great body of American people, we presume, have no disposition to be incommode with such reading.

Those items of intelligence that ought to interest citizens of a republic, every one of whom have a right to partake in the government of the community of which he is a member,

ARE OUR THEMES. To furnish more or less of the TRUTH, in relation to every public transaction, in proportion to its APPARENT IMPORTANCE, is our OBJECT. To maintain what we believe to be the true interest of the family of man, and of our COUNTRY in particular, is our INTEREST no less than our DUTY—and from the performance of that duty we shall not swerve.

As appertaining to a record of the times and of especial current use to the community, we shall keep our readers regularly apprised, in very brief statements, of the PRICES of the principal staples of our country, and of incidents in relation to their value—of the rate of EXCHANGES at the prominent points—of the fluctuations of the MONEY MARKET, at home and abroad—of the prospects in anticipation, and of the products realized, of the principal crops—and of various other items of which the CHRONICLE page of each number of the Register is made up.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From the National Intelligencer.

Niles' Register. It is not necessary, we are sure, for us to say a word in commendation of that valuable repository of facts and documents which is already almost the only authority that can easily be referred to, and entirely relied upon, for an important portion of our country's history.

From the New York American.

Niles' Register, long known, and whose known, most valued as a careful and comprehensive register of all the important public documents and political and statistical details.

From the Richmond (Va.) Enquirer.

Niles' Register. It is the best general collection of historical facts and references, that is published in the United States with a table of contents.

From the New Hampshire Patriot.

Niles' Register. As a record of facts, notwithstanding a slight tinge of whig coloring is generally apparent, the Register stands among the first publications in the country.

From the New Hampshire Statesman.

As a record of facts, and documents, and events, legislative, biographical, historical and statistical, there is no work in the United States securing so full and faithful an account; in fact it is not only a great aid to every business man, but has become almost indispensable to such as have occasion to refer to public documents or public proceedings, for important statistical facts.

From the Baltimore Chronicle.

Niles' Register. As a faithful chronicler of events, the Register stands pre-eminently and deservedly high; indeed, no other publication in the country furnishes equal facilities for reference to things past.

From the Ohio Republican.

Niles' Register. As a record of documents, facts, and news of the day, this work has no equal in the United States. Its pages abound with valuable information of all kinds, but more particularly with facts and incidents connected with the history of our country, and is essentially useful as a book of reference, and is now a standard work of all the principal libraries in the United States. We recommend it with pleasure to all wishing a faithful record of the times—the price per annum is five dollars.

From the New York Evening Post.

Niles' Register. As a record of facts and documents, and the news of the day, this journal stands among the foremost, and some improvements in contemplation will still further enhance its value to its subscribers.

From Freedom's Sentinel, Schenectady, N. Y.

Niles' Register. This old, faithful and valuable paper—is so well known, as well in Europe as the United States, that the Register is chiefly composed of all the important public documents, and political and statistical details—which are recorded with the utmost accuracy and impartiality—that it is scarcely necessary to add one word in its commendation. We hope the proprietor will be amply compensated for his efforts to render the Register still more valuable.

From the Charleston (S. C.) Mercury.

Niles' Register. We take this opportunity of saying something of the character of this publication, and to claim the patronage of the community. As a political journal, the Register stands quite alone—it has no partisan character—its object is not to propagate the opinions of one man, or to advocate the advancement of any one party, but to present from week to week, a judicious collection of facts and documents connected with, and tending to elucidate the political history and condition of the country. Too much praise cannot be given to the uniform judgment, and good sense, which have governed the conductor of the Register in the selection of its articles. The citizen will find in it every thing necessary to give him a complete acquaintance with the spirit of the political world, and to the future historian, the Register will be an invaluable treasury of the most authentic and ample materials for the history of this country.—The great popularity, and indeed authority which it has attained, both in this country and in Europe, attest that this is no exaggerated praise, and the unqualitative character of its conductor is another proof, if any other were needed, that its reputation depends exclusively upon its merits. We sincerely wish it, both for the benefit of the editor and the community, a universal circulation.

From the St. Louis (Mo.) Republican.

Niles' Register. There is no periodical in the union, probably in the civilized world, that has won for itself so lasting and so enviable a reputation as this. Every where, as it is valued, by the public men of our own and of other countries, without distinction of party, it is regarded as a strictly correct register of passing events, and upon all occasions, its pages are cited and respected as authority, and although the editor has never surrendered the integrity of his own opinions, he has won from those of opposite sentiments their respect and confidence. The many testimonials given by congress and other public functionaries, is a certain evidence of the integrity and ability with which facts pertaining to the history of the country have been presented and preserved.

From the Boston Atlas.

Niles' Register. As a work of reference, the Register is invaluable. It has been conducted with judgment, and presents a mass of political and historical matter which is to be found in no other publication.

From the Lynchburg Virginian.

Niles' Register. As a record of facts and documents, it is decidedly the best publication of the day, whilst an ample portion of its pages is devoted to the publication of the current news. The back volumes of the Register are now uniformly appealed to, whenever it is necessary to recur to past events—furnishing, as they do, a complete documentary and of course authentic history of the times. We cordially recommend it to public patronage.

From the Zanesville (O.) Gazette.

Niles' Register. The Register has been published for 29 years, and is well known to be the best record of the events of the day that is published in the United States.

From the Lexington (Ky.) Intelligencer.

Niles' Weekly Register. As a channel of authentic intelligence to the great public, of political and other events, it is without a rival in America for its accuracy as to facts; and so far as political speculations are concerned, it is marked by a calmness, correctness of discrimination, soundness of judgment, and a courtesy to contemporary writers, which being already well known can receive little additional celebrity from our approbation. The Register has for many years been a depository of all the most important public documents elicited by the sessions of congress.

From the United States Gazette, Philadelphia.

Niles' Register may now be deemed one of the most valuable repositories of facts—political, statistical, geographical, historical, religious and miscellaneous. It is when we need such information that we learn to know the value of Niles' Register.—We observed while at Harrisburg a few weeks since, that "Niles' Register" was a text book for those that dealt in facts and wished to chasten the little extravagancies of the fancy men.

From the Charlestown (Va.) Free Press.

Niles' Register. The Register presents a faithful documentary record of the political and other important events of the country, and should be cherished by the public with affection and liberality.

From the Pittsburg (Pa.) Gazette.

"This valuable work has been for years before the public, and has obtained a most enviable reputation with men of all parties. The editor intends making improvements in his plan of publication, which will render it still more valuable, while the terms are to remain as heretofore—five dollars per annum, payable in advance."

From the Delaware Journal.

Niles' Register. We have frequently heretofore expressed our opinion of the Register with which we have so long been familiar. It is in our judgment decidedly the most useful and valuable book of reference published in the country, for one who has occasion to refer to public documents, congressional debates and transactions, and passing events—and who has not. For nearly thirty years in which the Register has been published, it constitutes the fullest and most authentic history of the country, which is to be found any where else within the same compass. We heartily wish it a prosperous continuance.

From the Alexandria (D. C.) Gazette.

As a record of facts and documents, and of the news of the day, Niles' Register is unrivalled.

and perhaps invidious, to enumerate the evils of which, in the opinion of many of our fellow citizens, this error of the sages who framed the constitution may have been the source, and the bitter fruits which we are still to gather from it, if it continues to direct our system. It may be said, however, as a general remark, that republics can count no greater error than to adopt or continue any feature in their systems of government which may be calculated to create or increase the power of a few, to the bosoms of whom the exercise of the offices tends to commit the management of their affairs. And, surely, nothing is more likely to produce such a state of mind than the long continuance of an office of high rank. Nothing can be more encouraging to all those who desire all those noble feelings which belong to the character of a devoted republican patriot. When this corrupting passion once takes possession of the human mind, like the love of gold, it becomes insatiable. It is the never-dying worm in his bosom, grows with his growth, and strengthens with the declining years of his victim. If this is true, it is the part of wisdom for a republic to flout the service of that officer, at least, to whom she has entrusted the sacred trust of her liberties, and to the execution of her laws, and the command of her armies and navies, to a period so short as to prevent his forgetting that he is the accountable agent not the principal, the servant, not the master. Until an amendment of the constitution be effected, which, in his opinion may secure the desired object, I give my aid to it, by renewing the pledge heretofore given, that, under no circumstances, will I consent to serve a second term.

But if there is danger to public liberty from the acknowledged defects of the constitution, in the want of limit to the continuance of the executive power in the same hands, there is, I apprehend, not much less from a misdirection of that instrument, as it regards the powers of the executive. I cannot conceive that, by a fair construction, any or either of its provisions would be found to constitute the president a part of the legislative power. It cannot be claimed from the power to recommend, since, although it might upon him, it is a privilege which he holds in common with every other citizen. And although there may be something more of confidence in the propriety of the measures recommended in the one case than in the other, in the ordinary legislative decision, there can be no difference. In the language of the constitution, "all the legislative powers" which it grants "are vested in the congress of the United States." It would be a solecism in language to say that any portion of these is not included in the whole.

It may be said, indeed, that the constitution has given to the executive the power to annul the acts of the legislative body, by refusing to execute them. So a similar power may necessarily result from that instrument to the judiciary, and yet the judiciary forms an part of the legislature. There is, it is true, this difference between these grants of power; the executive can put his negative upon the acts of the legislature for other cause than that of want of conformity to the constitution, whilst the judiciary can only declare void those which violate that instrument. But the decision of the judiciary is final in such a case, whereas in every instance where the veto of the executive is applied it may be overcome by a vote of two-thirds of both houses of congress. The negative upon the acts of the legislative, by the executive authority, and that in the hands of the judiciary, are, therefore, to be an inconviction in our system. Like some others of a similar character, however, it appears to be highly expedient, and if used only with the forbearance, and in the spirit which was intended by its authors, it may be productive of great good, and be found one of the best safeguards to the union.

At the period of the formation of the constitution, the principle does not appear to have enjoyed much favor in the state governments. It existed but in two, and in one of these there was a plural executive. If we would search for the motives which operated upon the purely patriotic and enlightened assembly which framed the constitution, for the adoption of a provision so apparently repugnant to the leading democratic principle, that the majority should govern, we must reject the idea that they anticipated from it any benefit to the ordinary course of legislation. They knew too well the high degree of intelligence which existed among the people, and the enlightened character of the state legislatures, not to have the fullest confidence that the two bodies elected by them would be worthy representatives of such constituents, and of course, that they would be so careful in exercising and maturing the measures which the circumstances of the country might require. And it is preposterous to suppose that a thought could for a moment have been entertained, that the president, placed at the capital, in the centre of the country, could better understand the wants and wishes of the people than their own immediate representatives, who spend a part of every year among them, live with them, often labour with them, and bow to them by the triple tie of interest, duty and affection. To assist or control congress then in its ordinary legislation, could not, I conceive, have been the motive of the sages who framed the constitution. This argument acquires additional force from the fact of its never having been thus used by the first six presidents, and two of them were members of the convention, one providing over its deliberations, and the other presiding at its close, and expounding the labors of that august body than any other person. But if bills were never returned to congress by either of the president's above referred to, upon the ground of their being inexpedient, or not well adapted as they might be to the wants of the people, the veto was applied upon that of want of conformity to the constitution, or because errors had been committed from a too hasty enactment.

There is another ground for the adoption of the veto, which is, that it gives to the president, in recommending it to the congress, than any other, I refer to the security which it gives to the just and equitable action of the legislature upon all parts of the union. It could not but have occurred to the framers of the constitution, that the vast and embracing so great a variety of soil and climate and consequently of products, and which, from the same cause, must ever exhibit a great difference in the amount of the population of its various sections, would require a great variety of measures of the people, that the legislation of the majority might not always justly regard the rights and interests of the minority. And that acts of this character might be passed, under an express grant to the president, of the power to withhold assent, without the competency of the judiciary to declare void. That however enlightened and patriotic they might suppose, from past experience, the members of congress might be, and however largely partaking in the general sentiment of the people, it was impossible to expect that bodies so constituted should not sometimes be controlled by local interests and sectional feelings. It was proper, therefore, to provide some umpire, from whose impartiality and mode of appointment, and the silence and freedom from such influences might be expected. Such a one was afforded by the executive department, constituted by the constitution. A president, in every section, state and territory, and the union, must consider himself bound by the most solemn sanctions, to guard, protect and defend the rights of all, and of every portion, great or small, against the injustice and oppression of the rest. To consider the veto power, therefore, granted by the constitution to the executive of the United States, solely as a conservative power. To be used only, first, to protect the constitution from violation; and, secondly, the people from the effects of hasty legislation which thus will have been probably disregarded or not well understood; and, thirdly, to prevent the effects of combinations vindictive of the rights of minorities. In reference to the second of these objects, I may observe that I consider it the right and privilege of the people to decide disputed points of the constitution, arising from the general grant of power to congress to carry into effect the powers expressly given. And I believe with Mr. Madison, that the great principle of separation of powers, and the interests of the legislative, executive and judicial branches of the government, accompanied by indications, in different modes, of the coexistence of the general will of the nation, as according to the president's sufficient authority for his considering such disputed points as settled.

Upwards of half a century has elapsed since the adoption of the present form of government. It would be an object more highly desirable than the gratification of the curiosity of the public, to know, if its present situation could be ascertained, a fair exhibit made of the operations of each of its departments, of the powers which they respectively claim and exercise, of the collisions which have occurred between them, or between the whole government and those of the states, or either of them. We could then compare our actual condition, after fifty years trial of our system, with what it was in the commencement of its operations, and ascertain whether the predictions of the just statesmen who proposed, or the confident hopes of its advocates have been best realized. The great dread of the former seems to have been, that the reserved powers of the states would be absorbed by those of the federal government, and a central government established, leaving to the states the shadow, only, of that independent action for which they had so zealously contended, and on the preservation of which they relied as the last hope of liberty. Without denying that the result to which they looked with so much apprehension, is in the way of being realized, it is obvious that the result did not nearly so far exceed its accomplishment, as the federal government has seized upon some of the reserved rights of the states. As far as any open warfare may have gone, the state authorities have amply maintained their rights. To the extent, however, of the system of the pursuit of discord between the different members which compose it. Even the addition of many new ones has produced no jarring. They move in their respective orbits in perfect harmony with the central head, and with each other. The executive still pursues the current of work, by which, if not seasonably checked, the worst apprehensions of our anti-federal patriots will be realized; and not only will the state authorities be overwhelmed, by the great increase of power in the executive department of the general government, but the character of that government, if not its designation, be essentially and radically changed. This state of things has been in part effected by causes inherent in the constitution, and, with the exception of the necessity of political power to increase itself. By making the president the sole distributor of all the patronage of the government, the framers of the constitution do not appear to have anticipated at how short a period it would be so completely in the hands of the president, the free operations of the state governments. Of trifling importance at first, it had, early in Mr. Jefferson's administration, become so powerful as to create great alarm in the mind of that patriot, from the danger it would be to the state governments, and the freedom of the elective franchise. If such could have been the effects of its influence, how much greater must be the danger at this time, quadrupled in amount, as it certainly is, and more concentrated in its character, than when it was first given their construction of their powers allowed, or the forbidding character of all the early presidents permitted them to make. But it is not by the extent of its patronage alone that the executive department has become dangerous, but that the power of appointing may be made of the appointing power to bring under its control the whole revenues of the country. The constitution has declared it to be the duty of the president to see that the laws are executed, and made him the commander in chief of the armies and navy of the United States. If the opinion of the most approved writers upon that species of mixed government, which in modern Europe, is termed monarchy in constraint, in respect to the power of the executive, be correct, in addition to the powers of our chief magistrate to stamp a monarchical character on our government, but the control of the public finances. And to mention a few more, indeed, the any one should doubt, that the entire power of the public monies, or the officers who have the custody of the public money, by the power of removal, with or without cause, does for all mischievous purposes at least, virtually subject the treasury, as it is to his disposal. The first Roman emperor, in his attempt to seize the sacred treasure, and used the opposition of the officer to whose charge it had been committed, by a significant allusion to his sword. By a selection of political instruments for the ease of the public treasury, a reference to their commissions, by a president, would be quite as effectual an argument as that of Cæsar to the Roman knight. I am not insensible of the great difficulty that exists in drawing a proper plan for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public money, and the importance which has been attached by men of great abilities and patriotism to the disburse, as it is called, of the treasury from the banking institutions. It is not the duty of the president to complain of, but the united wisdom of the treasury, and the executive department, which has created such extensive alarm. To this danger to our republican institutions, and that created by the influence given to the executive, the great instrumentality of the federal officers, proposed to be removed, may be a great error in the framers of the constitution, not to have made the officer at the head of the treasury department entirely independent of the executive. He should at least have been removable only upon the demand of the popular branch of the legislature. I have determined never to remove a secretary of the treasury, without communicating all the circumstances attending such removal to both houses of congress.

The influence of the executive in controlling the freedom of the elective franchise through the medium of the public officers can be effectually checked by recent legislation, and was successfully done by Mr. Jefferson, forbidding their interference in elections, further than giving their own votes; and their own

Independence secured by an assurance of perfect immunity, in exercising this sacred privilege of freemen, under the dictates of their own unbiased judgments. Never, with my consent, shall an officer of the people, compensated for his services only by his post, become the pliant instrument of executive will.

There is no part of the means placed in the hands of the executive which might be used with greater effect, for unallowable purposes, than the control of the public press. The machinery of the press derived from the mother country, that "the freedom of the press is the great bulwark of civil and religious liberty," is one of the most precious legacies which they have left us. We have learned too, from our own, as well as the experience of other countries, that golden shackles, by whomsoever or by whatever pretence imposed, are as fatal to it as the iron bonds of despotism. The presses in the necessary employment of the government should never be used to clear the way for its policies. A decent and manly examination of the acts of the government should be not only tolerated, but encouraged.

On another occasion I have given my opinion, at some length, on the impermissibility of executive interference in the legislation of congress. That the article in the constitution making it the duty of the president to communicate information, and suggesting him to recommend measures, was not intended to make him the source of legislation, and in particular, that he should never be looked to for schemes of finance. It would be very strange, indeed, that the constitution should have strictly forbidden our branch of the legislature from interfering with the legislation of the executive. It is, therefore, to be considered proper that an altogether different department of the government should be permitted to do so. Some of our best political maxims and opinions have been drawn from our parent Isles. There are others, however, which cannot be introduced in our system without singular incongruity, and the production of much mischief. And thus I conclude to be true. No matter in which of the houses of parliament a bill may originate, nor by whom introduced, a minister or a member of the opposition, by the fiction of law, or rather of constitutional principle, the sovereign is supposed to have prepared it agreeably to his will, and then submitted it to parliament for their advice and consent. Now the reverse is the case here. The executive is supposed to be the principle, but the forms prescribed by the constitution. The principle certainly assigns to the only body constituted by the constitution (the legislative body) the power to make laws, and the executive is directed that he execute the laws so prescribed to them. The senate in relation to revenue bills, have the right to propose amendments; and so has the executive, by the power given him to return bills to the house of representatives with his objections. It is in this manner that amendments in the existing revenue laws, suggested by his observations upon their defective or injurious operation. But the delicate duty of devising schemes of revenue should be left where the constitution has placed it—with the immediate representatives of the people. For similar reason, the mode of keeping the public treasure should be prescribed by them, and the farther removed it may be from the control of the executive, the more wholesome the arrangement, and the more in accordance with republican principles.

Connected with this subject is the character of the currency. The idea of making it exclusively metallic, however well intentioned, appears to me to be at variance with the principles of our government, or other scheme, having no relation to the personal rights of the citizens, that has ever been devised. If any single scheme could produce the effect of arresting, at once, that inflation of currency by which our currency is so much swollen, and our citizens, by their industry and enterprise, are raised to the possession of wealth, that is the one. If there is one measure better calculated than another to produce that state of things so much deprecated by true republicans, by which the nation is continually adding to their hoards, and the poor sinking deeper into poverty, it is an exclusive metallic currency. Or if there is a process by which the character of the country for generosity and nobleness of feeling, may be destroyed by the great luxury and necessary toleration of usury, it is an exclusive metallic currency.

Amongst the other duties of a delicate character which the president is called upon to perform, is the supervision of the execution of the laws of the United States. Those of them which are destined to become members of our great political family, are compensated by their rapid progress from infancy to manhood, for the partial and temporary deprivation of their political rights. It is in this District, only, where American citizens are to be found, who, under a settled policy, are deprived of many important political privileges, without any inspiring hope as to the future. Their only consolation under circumstances of such deprivation, is the fact of the devoted exterior guards of a camp—that their sufferings secure tranquility and safety within. Are there any of their countrymen who would submit then to greater sacrifices, to any other humiliations than those essentially necessary to the security of the object for which they were thus awarded from their fellow citizens? Are their rights alone to be guaranteed by the application of those great principles upon which all our constitutions are founded? We are told by the greatest of British statesmen, that, at the close of the war of the revolution, the most stupid men in England spoke of "their American subjects." Are there indeed citizens of any of our states who have dreamed of their subjects in the District of Columbia? Such dreams can never be realized by any agency of mine. The people of the District of Columbia are not the subjects of the people of the states, but free American citizens. Being in the latter condition when the constitution was formed, the institutions of that instrument were never intended to deprive them of that character. If there is any thing in the great principle of unalienable rights, so emphatically insisted upon in our Declaration of Independence, they could neither be the subjects of the United States nor of their liberties, and become the subjects, in other words, the slaves, of their former fellow citizens. If this be true, (and it will scarcely be denied by any one who has a correct idea of his own rights as a citizen,) it is a contradiction, and a self-evident, exclusive jurisdiction in the District of Columbia can be interpreted, so far as respects the aggregate people of the United States, as meaning nothing more than to allow to congress the controlling power necessary to afford peace and safe exercise of the functions assigned to the general government by the constitution. In all other respects, the legislation of congress should be adapted to their peculiar pollutions and wants, and be conformable with their deliberate opinion of their own interests.

I have spoken of the necessity of keeping the respective departments of the government, as well as all the other authorities of our country, within their appropriate orbits. This is a matter of difficult management, and the rights of the citizen are often claimed are often not defined by any distinct lines. Mischievous, however, in their tendencies, as collisions of this kind may be, those which arise between the respective communities which, for certain purposes, assume one and the same character; so far as such action can long exist without the careful culture of those feelings of confidence and affection which are the effective bonds of union between free and confederated states. It is wrong as to the rights of the citizen, and as to the interests of the whole. Men, blinded by their passions, have been known to adopt measures for their country in direct opposition to all the suggestions of policy. The alternative, then, is, to destroy or keep down a bad passion by creating and fostering a good one, and this seems to be the corner stone upon which our American political architects have reared the fabric of our government. The criminal which was to bind it, and perpetuate its existence, was the administrative element between the executive and the people. To insure the continuance of this feeling, produced at first by a community of dangers, of suffering and of interests, the advantages of each were made accessible to all. No participation in any good, no exemption from any evil, was reserved to any one, except in domestic government, was withheld from the citizen of any other member. By a process attended with no difficulty, no delay, no expense but that of removal, the citizen of one might be made the citizen of any other, and the citizen of the whole. The lines, too, separating powers to be exercised by the citizens of one state from those of another, seemed to be so distinctly drawn as to leave no room for misunderstanding. The citizens of one state were to be distinguished from those of another, which character confers, and all that they may claim as citizens of the United States; but in no case can the same person, at the same time, act as the citizen of two separate states, and he is therefore positively precluded from any interference with the reserved powers of any state but that of which he is, for the time being, a citizen. He may indeed refer to the citizens of other states his advice as to their management, and the form in which it is tendered, but he is not to be considered as their representative.

It may be observed, however, that organized associations of citizens, requiring compliance with their wishes, too much resemble the recommendations of Athens to her allies—supported by the arms and power of fleet. It was, indeed, to the ambition of the leading states of Greece to control the domestic concerns of the others, that the destruction of that celebrated confederacy, and subsequently of all its members, is mainly to be attributed. And it is owing to the absence of that spirit that this Hellenic confederacy has not, as many years been preserved. Never has there been seen in the institutions of the separate members of any confederacy, more elements of discord. In the principles and forms of government and religion, as well as in the very objects of their confederacy, so marked a discrepancy was observable, as to promise any thing but harmony in their intercourse, or permanency in their alliances; and yet, for ages, neither has been interrupted. Content with the positive benefits which their union has produced, the independence and safety from foreign aggression which it secured, these sagacious people respected the institutions of each other, however repugnant to their own principles and prejudices.

Our confederacy, if able citizens can only be preserved by the same forbearance. Our citizens must be content with the exercise of the powers with which the constitution clothes them. The attempt of those of one state to control the domestic institutions of another, is a source of the feelings of distrust and jealousy, the certain harbingers of disunion, violence, civil war, and the ultimate destruction of our free institutions. Our confederacy is perfectly consistent with the principle which underlies a common co-partnership. There is a fund of power to be exercised under the direction of the joint councils of the allied members, but that which has been reserved by the individual members to their respective local governments, or the individual members composed of. To attempt it finds no support in the principles of our constitution.

It should be our constant and earnest endeavor mutually to cultivate a spirit of concord and harmony among the various parts of our confederacy. Experience has abundantly taught us, that the agitation, by citizens of one part of the union, of a subject not confided to the general government, but exclusively under the guardianship of the local authorities, is productive of no other consequences than bitterness, alienation, discord and injury to the very cause which is intended to be advanced. Of all the great interests which appertain to our country, that which respects the management of the union—is by far the most important, since it is the only true and sure guaranty of all others.

In consequence of the embarrassed state of business and the currency, some of the states may meet with difficulties, from which they are unable to free themselves. How deeply we may regret any thing imprudent or excessive, in the engagements into which states have entered for purposes of their own, it does not become us to disparage the state governments, nor to discourage them from making such engagements for their own relief. On the contrary, it is our duty to encourage them, to the extent of our constitutional authority, to apply their best means, and cheerfully to make all necessary sacrifices, and submit to all necessary burdens, to fulfill their engagements and maintain their credit; for the character and credit of the several states form a part of the character and credit of the whole country. The resources of the country are abundant; the enterprise and activity of our people proverbial; and we may well hope that wise legislation and prudent administration, by the respective governments, each acting within its own sphere, will restore former prosperity.

Unpleasant and even dangerous as collisions may sometimes be between the respective authorities of the citizens of our country, in relation to the lines which separate their respective jurisdictions, the results can be of no vital injury to our institutions, if that ardent patriotism, that devoted attachment to liberty, that noble and generous feeling, which our countrymen were once distinguished, continue to be cherished. If this continues to be the ruling passion of our souls, the weaker feeling of the mistaken enthusiast will be corrected, the upstart of the demagogue will be rebuffed, the diplomat and the complicated intrigues of the demagogue rendered harmless. The spirit of liberty is the sovereign balm for every injury which our institutions may receive. On the contrary, no cure can be used in the construction of our confederacy, no division of powers, no distribution of checks in its several departments, will prove effectual to keep us a free people, if this spirit is suffered to decay; and decay it will without constant nature. To the neglect of this best of all political remedies, attributing the ruin of all the republics with whose existence and fall their writings have made us acquainted. The same cause can never produce the same effect; and as long as the power is a dominant passion of the human bosom, and as long as the understandings of men can be warped,

The foregoing remarks relate almost exclusively to matters connected with our domestic concerns. It may be proper, however, that I should give some indications to my fellow citizens, of my proposed course in relation to the foreign world, and to the various nations. I assure them, therefore, that it is my intention to use every means in my power to preserve the friendly intercourse which now so happily exists with every foreign nation. And that although, of course, I shall not shrink from any measure involving negotiations with any of them, I see, in the personal characters of the sovereigns, as well as in the annual interests of our own, and of the governments with which our relations are most intimate, a pleasing guaranty of their liberality so important to the welfare of their subjects, that our peaceful intercourse will not be interrupted by the advancement of any claim or pretension upon their part to which our honor would not permit us to yield. Long the defender of my country's rights in the field, I trust that my efforts will be directed to the preservation of peace with foreign powers, any indication that their rights will ever be sacrificed, or the honor of the nation tarnished, by any admission on the part of their chief magistrate unworthy of their former glory. I shall, therefore, endeavor to secure, as my object, the same liberty and justice which marked the course prescribed to me by two of my illustrious predecessors, when acting under their direction in the discharge of the duties of superintendent of the Indian Affairs, and strictly observed. I can conceive of no more suitable motto than that more likely to propitiate an impartial and common creature—than a rigid adherence to the principles of justice, on the part of a powerful nation, in its treatment of a feeble and uncivilized people, under circumstances that lay the latter under the

Before concluding, fellow citizens, I must say something to you on the subject of the parties at this time existing in our country. To me it appears perfectly clear that, the interest of that country requires that the violence of the spirit by which those parties are at this time governed, must be greatly unfought, if not entirely extinguished, or consequences will ensue which are appalling to be thought of.

If parties to a republic are necessary to secure a degree of vigilance sufficient to keep the public functionaries within the bounds of law and duty, at best they are a necessary evil, and at worst a destructive of public virtue, the arena of a spirit antagonistic to that of liberty, and eventually its inevitable conqueror. We have examples of republics, where the love of equality and of liberty at the expense of the rights of the minority, has become the passion of citizens, and yet, with the continuance of the name and forms of free government, not a vestige of these qualities remaining in the bosom of the people. In the Annals of Tacitus, we find the mark of a distinguished English writer, that "in the Roman senate Octavius had a party, and Anthony a party, but the commonwealth had none." Yet the senate continued to meet in the temple of Mars, and the people continued to assemble in the commonwealth, and gaze at the statues of the elder Brutus and of the Curius and Dentii; and the people assembled in the forum, not as in the days of Cato, to elect or to depose, but to witness the annual magistrates, or pass upon the acts of the senate, but to receive from the hands of the leaders of the respective parties their share of the spoils, and to shout for one or the other, as those who were to be elected or re-elected. The result would furnish the larger dividend. The spirit of liberty had fled, and avoiding the abuses of a ritualized man had sought protection in the wilds of Republicanism. The result would be the triumph of the same cause and influence it will fly from our capital and our forum. A calamity as awful, not only to our country, but to the world, must be deprecated by every patriot, and every tendency to the perpetration of this crime must be checked. Such a tendency has existed—does exist. Always the friends of my countrymen, ever their flatterer, it becomes my duty to say to them, from this high position, that the partiality has existed many times that exists in the land. It is not only their best interests—hostile to liberty itself. It is a spirit contracted in its views—selfish in its objects. It looks to the aggrandizement of a few at the expense of the rest of the community. The entire repose is with the people. Something, however, may be effected by the means which we have placed in my hands. It is union that we need. It is the support of the party, but a union of the whole country for the good of the whole country. For the defence of its interests and its honor against foreign aggression—for the defence of those principles for which our ancestors so gloriously fought—let us be united. If this union it shall be accomplished. All the influence that I possess shall be exerted to prevent the formation at least of an executive party in the halls of the legislature. I will support no member of that body to any measure, unless I can satisfy his judgment and his sense of duty to those from whom he holds his appointment. Nor any confidence in advance from the people but that which will be the result of their own free effect to the legal administration of their affairs.

I deem the present occasion sufficiently important and solemn to justify me in expressing to my fellow citizens a profound reverence for the Christian religion, and a thorough conviction that sound morals, religious liberty, and a just sense of religious duty are the only solidly founded basis of all true and lasting happiness and that the only Being who has blessed us by the gifts of civil and religious freedom—who watched over and prospered the labors of our fathers, and has hitherto preserved to us institutions far exceeding in excellence those of any other people, let us unite in fervently praying that the God of our fathers, the God of our country in all future time, (Oath administered.)

Fellow citizens: Being fully invested with that high office to which the patriotism of my countrymen has called me, I now take an affectionate leave of you. You will bear with you to your homes, the remembrance of the pledge, I have this day given, to discharge all the high duties of my exalted station, according to the best of my ability; and I shall enter upon their performance with entire confidence in the support of a just and generous people.

Washington, March 4, 1841.

THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN. We earnestly congratulate our readers on the information concerning the relations between the United States and Great Britain, which they will find exactly stated in the report of yesterday's senate proceedings. Considering the rumors that have been in circulation, nothing could be more interesting to the whole country at the present moment than these disclosures to the senate, unless perhaps it be the chart of the principles of the new administration which may be expected in the inaugural address of the president elect.

We learn from the statement of Mr. BUCHANAN that, in regard to the boundary question, the governments of Great Britain and the United States have agreed upon the main points of a convention for the final adjustment of that question; and that in the opinion of the executive, there is every reason to look with entire confidence to a prompt and satisfactory termination of the long negotiation upon this question.

We learn, further, with great pleasure, that there is no foundation for the rumor that an angry correspondence has recently taken place between Mr. Fox and Mr. Forsyth, or any correspondence, the character of which would justify a call for its publicity.

The remarks of Mr. CLAY, whose wisdom and experience in our foreign relations stamp every thing he says on that subject with a more than common impress, are no less popular than acceptable. Happy must it be accounted that upon this very interesting and important matter, the leaders of the party coming into power and of that which is about retiring, entertain opinions upon it between which there is hardly a discernible shade of difference.

The statement of the chairman of the select committee on foreign relations, the reader cannot fail to perceive, has all the effect of a counter-blast to the martial appraisal of the other day by the distinguished chairman of the committee on foreign relations in the other house. The effect, mark! We do not say the intention, as we are not in the confidant of the honorable senator from Pennsylvania or of the administration whose confidence he enjoys.

DEBATE ON THE PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

In senate, Thursday, January 14

Mr. SUTTON of Indiana, said: While the original bill granting pre-emption to actual settlers was the only question before the senate, I felt no desire to take any action since the amendment proposed by the senator from Kentucky, to the amendment to that proposition submitted by the senator from South Carolina, have fairly brought before the senate for discussion the whole subject of the public lands, and I feel that I have no right to interpret or misinterpret me to take some part in the debate. And, sir, permit me to say that I enter upon this discussion with the more pleasure, because I have not the least idea that the question will be settled at this time, and I feel that I have no objection to any willing but anxious that my sentiments should be fully known by the people of my state before the next session of congress, during which I hope to see the whole subject amicably and finally arranged; and I feel that I have no objection to present, on this occasion, and upon all other subjects, both the interest and wishes of my state, and to those wishes and that interest I will at all times, on all questions of expediency, conform my own action here, so that I may be able to say to the people of my state that I consider the bill and the proposed amendments as bringing the whole subject before the senate; for, sir, I cannot agree with the senator from Missouri that they are unnecessary, I cannot agree with the senator from Virginia that they are unimportant, nor for argument and legislation. The whole subject may well be arranged in a single bill; and as the basis of such a bill must include the principles of the original proposition, I am inclined to think it proper that it should be discussed with the original proposition.

Previous to the views which I intend to submit upon this subject, the senate will pardon me if I notice the curious remarks of the senator from Arkansas, (Mr. Sevier), who has just taken his seat. He has said that the "union of the two common-sense views of the relation between cause and effect, has just told us that the in coming party need do nothing to meet the expectations of the people; that it must bring up and support new measures; that it could not let it down in the seats of the people, and say that it was satisfied with the measures which have been adopted." He has said that the measures under which the government has been administered were hostile to the interests of the people, and says that the "in coming party are numbered; the days of the in coming or Harrison party are numbered—it will go out at the end of four years by a larger majority than it came in. I entirely concur with the senator in his position, and think him far too honestly and candid for the admission he has made, and he has honestly made the ground of the safety of the nation, and of the people, and result of the political campaign in the minds of some senators, and especially in that of the honorable senator from Missouri, (Mr. BEXTON), who declared, a few days ago, that the result was a mystery he could not understand. The senator from Arkansas perfectly understands it, and I concur with him that, if the incoming party pursues the same line of general policy that was the ruling policy of Mr. Van Buren, its days will be numbered; that it may or may not be ruinous. The people have adopted that policy; they have willed that those who supported it shall no longer fill the highest offices within their gift; they have willed that a different policy shall prevail; they have willed that their government shall have the purpose of carrying out different policy; those agents stand pledged to do so, and it would be a direct violation of faith to the people to refuse to conform to their will. It would be such a breach of faith as ought to number the days of those who should presume upon such a dangerous experiment. I trust, however, that there is no cause for alarm from any quarter on this subject. I merely notice the remark of the senator to say that I heartily concur with him, and, so far as I am concerned, the charge shall have no application.

Another remark of the senator I must briefly notice, in which I am not so fortunate as to concur. I understood the senator to say that the senators from the old states had uniformly voted against the pre-emption of the new states in which they held any interest.

[Here Mr. SEVENROSE said he had made several exceptions.]

So I understood the senator, but I do not feel disposed to let the remark pass, even with the exceptions, as I do not think it does justice to the senators from the old states, as they are called. How many senators compose this body, sir? The answer is fifty-two; of that number only eighteen are from the old states, so call them. Well, sir, does not the senator consider both the pre-emption and graduation bills western measures? And how could the new states, with their eighteen members, have passed any bill on either of these subjects without the aid of the senators from the old states? And still these bills have again and again passed the senate with the votes of senators from the old and new states. And, sir, I cannot let the occasion pass without doing to senators from the old states justice, so far as it is concerned in this subject. I have the honor to have been a member of this body, let the kind and support of many of the senators from the old states on subjects of vital importance and deeply interesting to any state, which a most able representative could come from the southwestern states, designated as new states. It affords me great pleasure to except from this remark the senator from Arkansas. So, sir, as one of the representatives of one of the new states, I claim to participate in the application of the remarks of this senator.

The senator from Arkansas also intimates that the new states would soon be strong enough to make their own laws on this subject, without the aid of the other states of this union. This he thinks may take place by the year eighteen hundred and fifty. The senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) also predicted a portion of his remarks upon the same hypothesis. Here again I am compelled to take issue with the position assumed by those senators. It seems to me that the senators overlook a most important fact in order to arrive at their conclusions; that is, that the states are becoming old faster than new; or, in other words, that the old states are increasing in number faster than the new ones. Use the words "old" and "new" in their confined acceptance. If the senators consider all new states that have been, and that may be, admitted into the union since the adoption of the federal constitution, and the rights of the states in the matter may be made to their advantage; they refer to states having a border interest in common, growing out of their frontier situation, and the quantity of public lands within their limits. In this sense, does it not strike the senator that the increase in the proportion? and that the power to control legislation on this subject must ultimately, unless settled soon, lie with them? It looks so to me, and I have been no argument to shake this view of the case. How stands the case with Ohio? How with Indiana, say, Indiana, that but a few years ago was upon the extreme frontier. The former no longer claims to be a new state; and the latter, so far as the land question is concerned, may be said to belong to that class of states. Others are following rapidly; and in a few years will all the present great states in the valley of the Mississippi be in the very centre of the union of old states, and not even a vestige of the subject. It is, then, wise in the senator in the extreme frontier of the states called the new states to raise any question founded upon local considerations exclusively, on this great land question? I submit these remarks in a spirit of kindness, for these senators, or, at all events, those who have ever stood there when the interest of their states was in question. But, sir, I must be pardoned for saying that I never bear these local and discriminating questions agitated here or elsewhere, when they can possibly be avoided without a deep sense of the impropriety of the course. Let us remember that we are brethren of the same family, embarked in the same vessel, bound to the same port. Let us never forget our motto, "United we stand, divided we fall." Let us must have the same feelings, the same interests, the same patriotism from the same race, united together by the same patriotic love of country, acknowledging the same Supreme Being, and cherishing the same free constitutional form of government, should we not have full confidence in each other, and should we not avoid every thing calculated to excite angry feelings or engender sectional hostilities? It may not become us to lecture other senators on this subject, but I shall rest my defense on the importance of the subject and the impression it has made on my mind. I will digress no further, but take up the subject under consideration, as I had originally intended before I was decoyed from the path by the remarks of the senator from Arkansas, which I have just noticed.

While we differ upon many points connected with the land question, we all concur in the magnitude of the subject, and its great importance. There is another point in which there is general concurrence, and that is, the propriety, nay, more, the necessity, of settling the whole matter as soon as it can be done satisfactorily to all. Upon the magnitude of the subject and its consequent connection with the legislation of congress, and the diversified interests of the states in all their varieties, the senator from South Carolina commented at large; and, as I do not design travelling over the same ground that other senators have occupied, when I concur with them, I will content myself by reading an extract from the report of the committee on public lands, to which the bill of the senator from South Carolina has been committed. This extract will show the quantity of the public lands over which our legislation extends, and the magnitude of the subject. It will also show the recollection of senators when I allude to it in my subsequent remarks. The report says:

"It appears from a report of the commissioner of the general land office (see document 46, 34 session, 25th January 1841), that the whole quantity of public domain on the 30th December, 1838, to which the Indian title was not extinguished, amounted to seven hundred and sixty six millions in round numbers. There were at the same time, as appears by the same report, in the states and territories three hundred and nineteen millions of acres to which the Indian title was extinguished; making the whole public domain in the aggregate at that time to be ten hundred and eighty-five millions of acres. By table marked A, herewith annexed, it appears that, on the first of January last, there were in the new states one hundred and fifty-four millions of acres to which the Indian titles were extinguished, and nine million five hundred thousand acres to which the Indian title was not extinguished. There were in the aggregate one hundred and sixty-three million five hundred thousand acres. From this deduction for disputed grants, many of which are large, to which the right of the government may not be established, and the small number of acres which would leave one hundred and sixty millions subject to the operation of this bill, (Mr. CALHOUN's amendment); being less than one-sixth of the whole public domain."

Who can read the above extract, and not see the immense magnitude of the subject under consideration? I listened to the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN), while portraying the importance of this great subject, with the attention due to that subject, and I said to myself—let me try to hear the whole argument; and, sir, I had the pleasure of concurring most fully with that senator up to the point of his argument where he declared that the pre-emption, graduation and distribution plans all will abort of the desired object of settling the question upon the terms of compromise upon which I desire to see it placed; and urged as the only panacea, or remedy for the disease, his amendment tending to the effect in which they use the words "within their limits, upon certain terms and conditions." I thought I was compelled to leave the company of the senator. I could not concur with him in either of his positions; and, sir, I confess that I was surprised to find that the senator declared that his amendment, or bill, was calculated to close the whole subject. Why, sir, does not the senator see that it falls greatly short of meeting the desired object? Can he shut his eyes to the fact that the garment he has made is entirely too small for the body he designs to put it on? His bill applies to the land lying in the new states alone, one hundred and sixty millions of acres; while the whole quantity of the public lands is over ten hundred millions of acres, as shown by the report which I have read.

The great object of the senator, as he has declared, are to get rid of this agitating question in congress, to withdraw executive patronage, and, finally, to settle the land question. How will the bill of the senator effect these desirable results? As I have said, the bill extends to one-sixth of the public domain; the other system, with its pre-emption, must still be kept up; congress will have just as much legislation, and the patronage will be about the same as if no such bill had been passed. But, sir, I forbear to push the argument on the senator's bill further at this moment, as I shall have occasion to examine it in its proper order in the course of my remarks. Our land system has been justly eulogized by senators on all sides of the chamber. When we compare it with the systems of other countries; how high does it stand in the comparison; or even contrast it with the manner of the disposition of the public lands, by granting large tracts, upon credit, to individuals or companies, as was first proposed by the senator from Arkansas, which does our present system stand. Still it is becoming too great in magnitude, too extensive in its demands upon the legislation of congress, intimately too much connected with the various affairs of the nation. There is a feeling, a general feeling, a desire to make changes, either in the manner of the administration of the lands or in the disposition of the funds proceeding from their sales. The debt of the revolution has been extinguished, the lands ceded by the states have been liberated from that charge, and a new state of the question has been presented by these considerations.

I propose to notice the different propositions that have been made for the disposition of these lands in as brief a manner as I can, and show how they stand. At the commencement of the last congress of the administration of Mr. Adams, I took my seat as a member of the house of representatives. At that time the questions of graduation and pre-emption were the favorite topics of discussion. Well, sir, pre-emption laws, in some shape, have been passed from that day to this, and we now have one before us differing somewhat in character from any former law, of which I will speak hereafter. Well, sir, the graduation bill has been passed, and very different from the pre-emption bill. The session of congress has been held without discussing or acting upon a graduation bill in some shape or other. Gen. Jackson came into power on the tide of unbounded popularity; his friends were devoted to his person, and his policies were followed with measures with great unanimity. He was most decidedly in favor of graduation; he held it up, as did his adherents, in the west as the antagonistic measure to the distribution principle as carried out in Mr. CLAY's land bill; and when the president defeated that bill, he proclaimed graduation as the proper measure. Well, sir, he held the station for eight years; and at the expiration of his term Mr. Van Buren came into power. Like his predecessor, he, too, recommended graduation; the secretary of the treasury favored it as a financial measure; his patrons in the west held it up to the people as an administration measure. At the last session of congress the bill passed the senate about the same time the pre-emption bill was introduced. The graduation bill, the pre-emption bill passed, and the graduation bill slept on the table. There was power enough to pass the sub-treasury bill and the pre-emption bill, but the graduation bill was forgotten. Thus, sir, twelve years ago, when the senator from South Carolina and Mr. Van Buren, have passed away, and the graduation bill stands precisely where it did when I came to congress first. From this I am led to believe either that there never was any serious intention of passing it, or that it was merely held up to the gaze of the people as the opposition measure to distribution for the purpose of defeating the latter measure; or the people were opposed to it, and the dominant party knew it and were afraid to pass it. Let me say to senators now, that I have not the least idea it ever will pass, unless it shall be connected with the pre-emption and distribution principles, upon terms of compromise of the whole subject.

The objects of the senator's proposed graduation bill are, first, that it settles the land policy; secondly, it reduces the price of the real estate of the country; thirdly, the principle of graduation, by the time the lands have been in market, is arbitrary and unjust, and it is a principle which would make lands which have been long in market still find purchasers at the minimum price of one dollar and foreigners overruling or injuring the government, by their votes or otherwise. Still, let me tell senators that this is not the class of men from whom danger is to be apprehended. These are honest, hard working, industrious men, who support themselves and their families by their own labor, and who intend to tend to their own business, and not the concerns of the public; they are not the class of political foreigners who hang around our sea-ports and the suburbs of your large cities, making politics their trade, preaching agrarian and free-trade doctrines in the streets, and begging for alms, and looking for protection at night—the levetters down, because they cannot level up. Men who do not betake themselves to honest callings for a livelihood, and who are the enemies of those who do; these are the men you may fear. These are the foreigners who come to settle into the western country, and to grow on a piece of wild land, commence his little improvement, surrounded and aided by his wife and children, you may rest satisfied that you have nothing to fear from him; he is of the useful class of foreigners that stimulates the progress of the country, and that prompts him to acquire property will induce him to protect and defend it. The other class are not affected by pre-emption laws, for they would not cultivate and improve the new lands if you would give them the privilege free of cost. I have seen many of these men, and I have seen them in the courts; I have never seen one of them claiming pre-emption privileges. The other class usually apply for the benefit of our naturalization laws, and become citizens at the earliest period possible; they are good members of society, and I desire to give them all the protection and aid consistently with the provisions of the constitution.

During the discussion of this question, the argument was pushed further than was called for by the speaker, who, in the first place, was not asked to defend, or rather sprang upon us, one of which, being an important one, I am not disposed to let pass without a brief notice. It has been contended that the right of citizenship is not a privilege conferred on citizens, or, in other words, citizenship on foreigners, notwithstanding the constitution of the United States on that subject. Others have contended that the power of naturalization is not a privilege conferred on the power of passing naturalization laws on the part of congress. I heard these opinions advanced by distinguished senators, and I confess I thought at the time that the speaker was not to be depended for the first of these positions were clearly and wholly unstates; and that those who admit the power is in the states, in the absence of the exercise of the power by the states, would be obliged to admit that that could not be maintained. I supposed the whole power to be exclusive in congress, and that in no case, under no circumstances, could the states, or a high authority, (Story on the constitution), that I was right. I will read to the senate what that learned commentator says on the subject.

"The priority of confiding the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization to the national government seems not to have occasioned any doubt or controversy in the convention. For aught that could be said against it, it proceeded without objection. Under the Confederation, the increased the state authority to exercise the power, as the dissimilarity of the system in different states was generally admitted as a prominent defect, and laid the foundation of many delicate and intricate questions. Under the Constitution, all citizens of each state were entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in all the other states; it followed that a single state possessed the power of forcing into every other state, with the enjoyment of every immunity and privilege, any alien whom it might choose to receive. In its own society, however repugnant such admission might be, it had no convenience and even prejudices. In effect, every state possessed the power of naturalizing aliens in every other state—a power as mischievous in its nature as it was indiscriminate in its actual exercise. In the formation of the new constitution, it was deemed proper to confer the rights of citizenship in some one place where certain requisites were required. And, therefore, incapacitated for the possession of certain rights by the laws of the latter, ought, by a previous sentence and naturalization in the former, to be at pleasure all their salutary regulations self-imposed. It was also deemed consistent with equal truth and justice, that it was owing to mere equality that the exercise of this power implied the confederation did not involve the union in the most serious embarrassments. There is great wisdom in the power to confer the right of naturalization throughout the United States. It is of the deepest interest to the whole union to know who are entitled to enjoy the rights of citizens in each state, since they thereby, in effect, become entitled to the rights in citizens of all the states. If aliens might be admitted indiscriminately to enjoy all the rights of citizens at the will of a single state, the union itself might be endangered by an influx of foreigners hostile to its institutions, ignorant of its powers, and incapable of a due estimate of its privileges."¹¹

"It follows from the very nature of the power that, to be useful, it must be exclusive; for a concurrent power in the states would bring back all the evils which the framers of the constitution sought to remedy by the constitution as designed to remedy them. And, accordingly, though there was a momentary hesitation, when the constitution first went into operation, whether the power might not still be exercised by the states, it was soon decided by the congress so far as the legislation of the latter extended, as the supreme law; yet the power is now firmly established to be exclusive. The Federalist, indeed, introduced this very case as entirely clear, and the only one which admitted of no possible implication, arising from the repugnancy of a similar power in the states. 'This power must necessarily be exclusive,' says the author, 'because if each state had power to prescribe a distinct rule of law, it would be a source of confusion and anarchy.' Mr. Sima's speech to be concluded in our next."

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—2d SESSION.
 SENATE.

February 23. Most of this day was taken up in the presentation of memorials.

Mr. Benton submitted a resolution directing the secretary of the senate to pay out of the contingent fund to each messenger of the office of the secretary, three dollars per day, and to the assistant messenger and laborers two dollars per day, in lieu of all dues.

Mr. King thought this a decidedly preferable mode: it was fixing the recompense of these people on some fixed basis instead of voting additional pay at the last hour of the session, as had frequently been the case. It was advisable to fix the matter definitely; and while he was averse to voting additional compensation at the close of congress, he was for paying those worthy public servants a liberal but not extravagant compensation. He moved that it be sent to the committee on the contingent expenses: which was agreed to.

The bills heretofore noticed as having been ordered to be engrossed were severally read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Merrick, the bill for chartering the banks of the District of Columbia was taken up, and amended by Mr. Clay, of Alabama, and Mr. Wright; when Mr. Tappan moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert as an amendment a bill embracing the following features:

Every stockholder shall record his stock in the clerk's office, the schedule of the same to be published every three months in the newspapers of the District; every sale and transfer to be placed on record and published within ten days.

To issue no notes of less than $20, under a penalty of five hundred dollars.

Making the passing of any note by any individual, of less than $20, liable to a forfeiture of double the amount of the note.

That if any person shall establish a bank and issue notes as money, without means of redeeming the same in current coin, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be imprisoned not less than three nor more than ten years.

Mr. Tappan spoke in favor of the principles of his amendment, and against banking generally, until a late hour, when he gave way for a motion to go into executive business; after which the senate adjourned.

February 24. Mr. Pierce, of New Hampshire, presented resolutions from that state, on the subject of appointing the same day throughout the United States, for the choice of presidential electors.

Mr. Bates, of Mass., presented resolutions of the state in relation to the claims of American citizens for French spoliations on commerce, prior to 1800.

After acting on various private bills, the senate proceeded to the discussion of the bill to revive and continue in force the banks in the District of Columbia, when Mr. Toppan rose and concluded his remarks. The question having been taken on his

On motion of Mr. Tappan, the committee on Indian affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the removal of the Wyandott Indians from the state of Ohio.

Mr. Buchanan said he was instructed by the committee on foreign relations to move to be discharged from the consideration of the resolution which had been referred to that committee, "requesting the president to communicate to the senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, any correspondence which may have taken place between this government and that of Great Britain, relative to the northeastern boundary not heretofore communicated to the senate."

He would state, with as much brevity as possible, the reasons which had induced the committee to believe that it would be looked upon at the present moment, to publish the correspondence to which the resolution referred.

It would be recollected by senators who had directed their attention to that subject, that, in consequence of the correspondence already published between the two governments, and to which he need not particularly refer, it became the duty of Great Britain to submit to our government the project of a convention for the settlement of this long disputed boundary question. This duty had been performed by the British government in the month of May, 1839. The president did not approve of this proposed convention, chiefly because it contained no ultimate provision by which war, inevitable and final, to determine the controversy between the two countries. Indeed, from its character, it was quite probable that, had it been adopted, it would not have produced this result, so much to be desired; and the president was finally convinced that it was an end to the delay—the state of mutual irritation existing along the border, and the imminent danger of actual collision—that the interest of both parties imperatively demanded the adoption of such treaty stipulations as must necessarily make an end to the question.

The British government had since unconditionally coincided with the president in these sentiments; and the two governments had already agreed upon the essential points of a convention based upon these principles, and already advantages and honor had been secured. There were still some provisions of this convention of comparatively minor importance, and involving detail rather than principle, which had not yet been agreed upon; but if it were the sincere wish of both parties to advance it, it was, to arrive at an amicable conclusion, the negotiation must soon be successfully terminated. Under these peculiar circumstances, the committee believed that it could do no good to either party, whilst it might embarrass the government, to publish to the world the correspondence and the different projects and counter-projects of treaties which had passed between them.

Mr. B. said that his official position in the senate had afforded him frequent access to this correspondence. He had examined it with care, and would now frankly state the impression which it had made on his mind. Although he would not pretend to say that there were no omissions of war in the conduct of the British government on our northern frontier, yet this he should assert with much confidence, that in the negotiation itself relative to our northeastern boundary, nothing had occurred inconsistent with the sincere and anxious desire which had always been professed by that government to preserve peace, which now so happily subsisted between the two countries, and to bring the question to a final and satisfactory conclusion. Probably this expression might be too strong, and that he ought to have qualified the general truth by saying, except during the delays we had experienced from the tardy movements of the British government at every stage in the progress of the negotiation. Still he felt himself justified in using, at the present moment, the language of the president in the opening of the commencement of the session, that, "from the character of the points still in difference, and the undoubted disposition of both parties to bring the matter to an early conclusion, I look with entire confidence to a prompt and satisfactory termination of the negotiation." He had reason to believe that such were still the anticipations of the president in regard to the northeastern boundary question.

Mr. B. said that, on the present occasion, he should purposely refrain from the expression of any opinion in regard to the case of the steamboat Caroline. This was unnecessary, by the fact that all the correspondence in relation to that case, of every general importance had already been published, and each senator had the same means of forming an opinion which he himself enjoyed. There was no truth whatever in the rumor now so current that there had been an angry correspondence between the British minister and the secretary of state since the date of the last correspondence between them, now before the public. There was no foundation for this rumor. It was true that, since that time, a single note bearing upon the subject had been addressed by Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth, which the latter had answered; but this note and answer were of such an unimportant character, that he did not deem it necessary to call for their publication, and their tone was far from being of any angry character.

Mr. Clay made a few brief remarks, understood in his sense to be that, in his position with the committee on foreign relations, he derived it to have been from the vice president, it might not be amiss in him to say a few words in relation to the subject. The questions in immediate dispute between the two countries were the northeastern boundary, the affair of Caroline, the case of McLeod, and certain seizures on the coast of Africa. The most important was doubtless that relating to the northeastern boundary. Reference had been made to an arbitration that was to be definitely the question, and all the principles that should regulate the composition of the arbitration had been settled on, except some minor points of detail. With regard to the Caroline, there had been some delay in answer to the demand of our government whether he captured within our jurisdiction had been previously authorized or subsequently sanctioned.

As to the case of McLeod, a good deal depended on what the government of New York should do in making his opinion, there ought to have been some attention by the executive to the proper authority in New York of the necessity of affording to the accused a fair and impartial trial; and to his person, he should be acquitted, per se, security.

If it could be obtained where he was, he should be brought to a part of the country, where strong prejudice did not exist, and where the safety of his person should be put beyond all question. He thought it probable that New York would take some view without suggestion from any quarter. He hoped he might have a full and an impartial trial, such as it was the duty of the country to have guaranteed to him.

With respect to the African captives, he did not think the correspondence had taken place between the two governments under no circumstances would this country submit to the right of search.

Mr. C. gave it as his decided opinion that the state of the correspondence between the two countries was not such as to require a special mission. The president there would be able to do all that would be necessary in the premises without difficulty, and that he thought without delay.

Each (in an undertone). I am sorry to hear that, I expected to be your secretary of legislation. Mr. Clay bowed.

After all, (said Mr. C.) I have not yet begun to think of the possibility of any immediate war with Great Britain; that time has not arrived yet. But however distant it may be, I would relax no effort to place the country in a proper state of defence. He looked to the absence of all means of floating defence, steam-batteries, &c. with the deepest concern. He thought the government should apply all its energies to place the country in such a state of defence as would prepare it to meet any possible emergency that might arise.

Mr. C. expressed his belief that both governments desired peace; that it was essential to the interests of each, and that if war did come, it would not be from the will of the governments, but from collateral causes, over which they would have no control.

The committee was then discharged, according to the motion of Mr. Buchanan.

Mr. Phelps, from the committee on Indian affairs, stated that the committee had had under consideration a memorial in relation to the Seneca Indians. The committee have an opinion to express on the subject in due season, but as they have understood that no opposition is to be made for this session, he was directed to move that the memorial be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial. The motion prevailed.

Mr. Culbertson said that on the resignation of the late senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster), he had charged to the senator read opinions on the subject of southern institutions. This had led to a discussion, in the course of which he (Mr. C.) had pledged himself to prove certain points. The most important point was, that Mr. Webster had charged that Congress had the power to prohibit the slave trade between the states. The next point was, that the legislature of Massachusetts had maintained the same doctrine, and quoted the opinions of that senator (Mr. Webster) to sus-tain them. He had pledged himself to produce the document to support and justify the charge.

Mr. Phelps rose to a point of order with some reluctance. There was no question before the senate, and he was not aware that the discussion could lead to action of any sort.

Mr. Culbertson said the senator from Vermont should not have taken him at the outset of the discussion on the previous day. The senator did not then stop him. He had pledged himself to produce the proof of the charge which he then made, and he insisted on his right to establish the position which he then made.

The president said the discussion was not in order according to the strict rules of parliamentary proceedings; but it had been the usual practice of the senate to permit such explanations as were necessary to vindicate gentlemen in a course they thought proper to pursue.

Mr. King said there was no rule to warrant the proceeding, and he regretted that the discussion should have arisen. But the senator from Georgia (Mr. Calhoun) had made a statement which had been called in question, and he had a right to justify himself. No case had ever occurred in which this courtesy had been refused to a senator. In the ordinary business of the senate, it was necessary to enquire into the conduct of a senator, and a senator claimed a privilege of this kind, it was uniformly accorded to him.

Mr. Preston hoped the point of order would be withdrawn. It was due to the senator from Georgia that he should have an opportunity to put himself right before the country.

Mr. Phelps said an apology was perhaps due from him for making the point of order. He was absent at the time of the discussion. If he had supposed that the senator from Georgia considered himself implicated in any way, he should not have intervened. That senator, under the circumstances, had a right to be heard on that floor, and he withdrew the point of order.

Mr. Culbertson desired the clerk to read an extract from a paper which he sent to the desk. It purported to be a memorial, drawn up by a committee of which Mr. Webster was a member. The memorial expressed the opinion that congress had the power to prohibit the slave trade between the states.

Mr. Culbertson then animatedly upon the remark made by Mr. Clay, complimentary to Mr. Webster, and spoke of three great events in the history of the two governments, which had taken place in opposition. The first crisis was the late war with Great Britain—Was there then any unity of action between the two senators?

The next crisis was when the southern underlook to resist the protective tariff. The gentlemen had divided on that question. The gentleman from Massachusetts had gone against the compromise—When it was compromise or war, that gentleman had sternly refused his assent to the measure.

The third crisis was when the senators of the north were pressing the subject of abolition upon congress. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts was opposed to the senator from Kentucky. When it was all important to have a unanimous vote of the senate, the discordant voice of the gentleman from Massachusetts was always heard in opposition to the majority.

Mr. Clay regretted extremely that he had been called out in this way. The discussion of the other gentleman was not a subject for every member of that body, with the exception of the senator from Georgia. He agreed with the senator from Vermont (Mr. Phelps) that it was all out of order. There was no necessity to create an occasion for the discussion of the subject of slavery. The gentleman from Massachusetts was soon to be nominated to that body, and then would be the proper time to bring out all the opposition to him. But the senator from Georgia had appealed to the courtesy of gentlemen, and he (Mr. Clay) was not willing to refuse the request.

No error could be greater than to judge of human character by a single act, a single sentiment or opinion. We were not to expect perfect coldness in every thing that should be practiced.

Mr. Culbertson then addressed the chair.

Mr. Clay said: I cannot be interrupted, Mr. President. I will not permit an interruption. The practice is much too common, and especially at the other end of the hall. I have a great deal to say, and I will have ample opportunity to reply when I have concluded. What was the question—what the subject of difference in the discussion? The senator from Georgia alleges that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts has expressed the opinion that congress had the power to regulate the trade in slaves between the states. On this subject great diversity of opinion exists. The power to regulate did not imply the power to prohibit. Congress possessed the power to regulate foreign commerce, but it had no right to prohibit it.

But the senator from Georgia had adverted to the fact that he (Mr. C.) and his distinguished friend (Mr. Webster) had agreed on some questions, and disagreed on others. Was this unusual, or singular in itself? The senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) and the senator from Georgia were now on the same side, had they always agreed? Was the gentleman from Georgia ever a nullifier? [Mr. Calhoun said, no.] No. He (Mr. Clay) presumed there were many nullifiers. He (Mr. C.) was not a nullifier, but he was a man on which those gentlemen differed. The only correct method of judging was to take human nature in the last ensemble, and not undertake to determine by a single instance.

The senator from Georgia had referred to three subjects in which he (Mr. Clay) had differed with the gentleman from Massachusetts. The first was the late war with Great Britain. Mr. Webster had regarded that as unnecessary, and in that Mr. C. thought he was wrong. But there was another war—a domestic war—it was waged by General Jackson against the property of the country; and where stood the senator from Georgia in that war? The gallant Webster had contended for the people through this long war, with persevering ability, but the senator from Georgia was on the other hand.

In regard to the compromise act, the gentleman from Massachusetts had been opposed to that healing measure. But how was it with other senators, with whom the gentleman from Georgia was now conversing? The senator from Missouri (Mr. Benton) and the senator from New York (Mr. Wright) both voted against the compromise, but the gentleman finds no difficulty in acting with those gentlemen because they disagreed with him on that measure.

As it regarded abolition, so far as he (Mr. Clay) knew the opinions of Mr. Webster, he was just as much averse to it as the senator from Georgia himself. That there was danger impending, no one would deny. The danger was in ultram. The ultram of a portion of the south on the one hand, and from abolition on the other. It was to be averted by a moderate, but firm course; not being led off into extremes, on the one side, or frightened on the other. Mr. Webster and himself (Mr. Clay) said they differed on some subjects, but they coincided on others; and the senator from Georgia might have referred to an instance in which he himself had voted with Mr. Webster, and in opposition to him, (Mr. Clay.) He alluded to the tariff of 1822. The substance of the charge was, that Mr. Webster and himself (Mr. Clay) had agreed on certain matters, and disagreed on others; and if the senator from Georgia should undertake to compute the several agreements and disagreements, he would have to work out a more difficult problem than a blood of Mr. C.'s the other house, who had tried to ascertain whether Vermont or Kentucky was the banner state.

Mr. Calhoun said there was nothing in the remarks of the senator from Kentucky that was worthy of reply. If the debate on the nomination of Mr. Webster was to be public, there would have been some force in what had been said on that point.

Mr. Rice had not intended to take part in the discussion, but he desired to prevent the possibility of an misconception of the language he had used the other day. He had no real issue with the senator from Georgia in regard to the opinions of Mr. Webster. He had merely said that he knew nothing of those opinions, except what had been stated on the floor of the senate. He would take occasion to say, however, in relation to the proof which the senator from Georgia had produced, that there was nothing to connect Mr. Webster with the doctrines. There was no evidence that he had written, sanctioned, or even seen the report. He (Mr. Rice) had heard Mr. Webster, benevolent as he was, a teacher, and in the presence of an intelligent assemblage of Virginia, avow doctrines of the most patriotic and satisfactory character to the south.

Mr. Rice then adverted to Mr. Van Buren's vote in the New York legislature in 1820 in favor of a resolution asserting the power of congress to prohibit slavery in the new states. Apply the rule which the senator from Georgia has laid down, (said Mr. R.) and how stands Mr. Van Buren? Is he a nullifier, or is he not? Mr. R. hoped we should have no more such presidents. He wanted an American president, with American feelings, such as the man who was to be inaugurated on the 4th of March.

[There was a burst of applause from the gallery, which the president promptly rebuked and suppressed.]

Mr. Rice then referred to the Mississippi case now under consideration by the supreme court, and said Mr. Clay had raised his voice of argument and eloquence against the restrictive regulations which Mr. Van Buren had voted in favor of. Mr. Webster's opinions, expressed in his great speech in reply to Mr. Hayne, concurred with those entertained by Mr. Clay. Subsequent occurrences, however, had satisfied the minds of the south that Mr. Webster's views were sound on this subject.

Mr. Preston said the circumstances connected with the avowal of Mr. Webster's sentiments at Alexandria and Richmond, and said they had given him the liveliest satisfaction. He (Mr. P.) had had some personal agency in bringing out declarations so important to the south and the whole country.

Mr. Walker made a speech of some length in defense of the constitution of Mississippi, which is involved in a case now before the supreme court.

Some conversation took place between Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Preston, when, at the instance of Mr. Wright, the business was changed to the consideration of a civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, when the senate took a recess until 5 o'clock.

Evening session. The senate met at five o'clock, pursuant to adjournment. The bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government was taken up in committee of the whole, the question pending being the amendment proposed by the committee on finance to reduce the salaries and fees of public officers and agents—such as collectors of the customs, marshals, district attorneys, postmasters, &c. &c.

Mr. Wright explained the object of the committee in offering the amendments.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, was opposed to considering the subject of the reduction of salaries in an appropriation bill—a bill that all admitted to be unconstitutional. He was opposed to it, he said, because it was clearly his opinion that the whole subject of the salaries of the officers should undergo revision, and, in many cases, reduction; but he had an hesitation in saying that this was not the proper time and place to go into the subject. It was a whole, and would require the deliberation and much consideration; it was a work for a committee, who could obtain a full knowledge of the whole subject. When the work is done, it should be well done. It should do ample and equal justice to the whole, and not be partial to one side or the other. Mr. Wright said he would suggest to the senator from Indiana to let the amendments first be acted on which were submitted by the committee, and after that a motion could be made to strike out.

Mr. Phelps said that the bill before them was merely an appropriation bill, and every senator must see the necessity that existed for its passage to meet the current expenses of the government. Here, however, within forty-eight hours of the close of the session, was a proposition to connect with it the reduction of salaries. It had been said that some salaries were too large. He was not prepared to say that such was not the fact; nay, he believed in some cases that it was true; but, in his opinion, it was not the time to act on them. The whole subject would require careful review, and much action in framing a bill so as to meet the subject as it ought to be met. The only practical thing was to pass the appropriation bill, and reserve these matters until the next session, when they might all be considered upon with a view to the benefit of the country.

Mr. Benton thought it utterly wrong that high fees and perquisites should be permitted in this country.

Mr. Phelps thought it very extraordinary that gentlemen should just then think of a proposition to reduce salaries. It had been said that some salaries were too large. He was not prepared to say that such was not the fact; nay, he believed in some cases that it was true; but, in his opinion, it was not the time to act on them. The whole subject would require careful review, and much action in framing a bill so as to meet the subject as it ought to be met. The only practical thing was to pass the appropriation bill, and reserve these matters until the next session, when they might all be considered upon with a view to the benefit of the country.

Mr. Walker thought the bill defective. If he understood it the fees of the marshals would be limited to $6,000. If such were the fact no man in Mississippi could be a marshal.

Mr. Smith thought the bill had better stand as it did.

Mr. Southard was for the retention by postmasters of the proceeds of the boxes; he considered it a contract between postmasters and individuals. Mr. Phelps thought it different. He thought that $5,000 was ample for the services performed by any postmaster—$2,000 for the emoluments of office, and the boxes limited to $3,000. These private boxes were as much a matter of convenience to the public as the public boxes. He did not think there was any danger of money going into the treasury from any such source. If the boxes amounted to $6,000, the price would be reduced so as to make only $3,000, what was proposed to be allowed the postmaster. He thought this whole subject

Mr. Tallmadge argued against going blindfold into this subject at the close of the session. He was for reducing officers to some fair and liberal standard, but not to rush unadvisedly into measures that could not benefit the community.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, thought $6,000 enough for any officer; it was as much as the chief justice of the United States received, or any head of a department. With regard to what had been said about postmasters neglecting the community, the intelligent population of the city of New York would soon rectify that matter.

Mr. Preston said this was not the first time that the subject of boxes had been before the senate; he had voted against it before, and would do so again, on the same principle. He thought that the officers in the present case an invidious party business. Large emoluments had been enjoyed for the last twelve years, and why had they not heard of them before? He affirmed that the proposition about reducing the boxes to $3,000 was to make the government sleeping partners, to come in for a share of the profits with its own agents.

Mr. Linn had voted to increase the salaries of the clerks and officers of the army and navy, when all the necessities of life were increased in price through an increased medium of exchange. It was a very different aspect, and a sense of duty would compel him to vote for the reduction of the emoluments of all officers. Mr. L. occupied the floor for some time and went into several collateral matters touching the pledges of the administration, and in favor of the course pursued by general Jackson and his successors.

Mr. Walker rose to move an adjournment, when the vice president laid before the senate a letter from the president elect, informing the body that he was prepared to take the oath of office on the 4th of March.

Mr. Preston immediately submitted a resolution appointing a committee of three, to be appointed by the chair, to receive the president elect.

The vice president announced his intention of vacating his seat to-morrow in order to give an opportunity for the election of a president pro tem.

A motion was then made that when the senate adjourns, it adjourned to meet at 10 o'clock, which motion was carried. And the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, Feb. 23. Mr. Calhoun moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That, from and after four o'clock this day, all debate in committee of the whole on the state of the union on the bill making appropriations for the support of government for the year 1841 shall cease, and the committee shall proceed to vote upon the amendments that may be offered in the afternoon, and that may be offered to and bill, and shall then report the same, with such amendments as may have been agreed to, to the house; and said bill shall then be the special order, and take precedence of all other business, until the same shall be disposed of by the house: Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall prevent the committee from reporting said bill in the house at an earlier hour.

Mr. Fillmore asked Mr. Calhoun to extend the time one hour, so as to take up the bill to regulate the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections.

Mr. Calhoun assented, and modified his resolution accordingly.

The question was then put on suspending the rules, and there appeared in favor of suspending 110; against it 19. And so the miles were suspended.

And the resolution came fully before the house. The previous question was moved and seconded, and was put and carried.

And the main question was then taken, that the house do agree to the resolution, and passed in the affirmative.

And so the debate on the bill making appropriations for the support of government for the year 1841 will cease to-day at 5 o'clock, P. M.

The house then again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of government (the civil list) for the year 1841; (Mr. Bell resumed the chair of the committee.)

The pending question was on the appeal taken by Mr. Calhoun from the decision of the chair last evening. The amendment offered by that gentleman was not in order, on the ground—first, that the subject was entirely different from that under consideration; and, secondly, that the amendment was a matter of difficulty for which an appropriation was made in the bill.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, rose and moved to reconsider the vote taken last evening on the proposition of Mr. Thompson, of Mississippi.

The chairman said that it was not in order to move to reconsider a vote in committee; the question would again come up in the house.

And the question recurring, "shall the decision of the chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question of order was debated at considerable length by Messrs. Alorton, Clifford, Tillinghast, Banks, Underwood, Winkup and Everett. After which the chairman stated briefly the grounds of his decision.

Mr. Tillinghast supported the decision of the chair in a short speech.

And the question being then put, "shall the decision of the chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" it was decided in the affirmative without a division. So the decision of the chair was affirmed.

Mr. Carr Johnson then offered the following amendment:

"Provided, That the district attorneys of the United States in and for the several districts, the clerks and marshals respectively of the same, shall render an account quarterly, each and every year hereafter, to the secretary of the treasury, of all fees, emoluments and receipts of every name and nature whatsoever by them respectively received by virtue of said offices, which account shall be rendered upon oath or affirmation, and shall be sworn before and attested by the clerk or marshals of the district in which they are respectively appointed, and shall be filed with the secretary of the treasury in his judgment may prescribe for the purpose of enforcing the provisions hereinafter named; that is to say, if it shall appear that the salaries, fees and emoluments, and receipts and earnings of any of the said attorneys shall exceed the sum of $4,500, then such attorneys shall pay such excess into the treasury of the United States for the purposes of government; and if the salaries, fees and emoluments or earnings of any of the said clerks or marshals shall exceed $2,500, then the excess shall be paid into the treasury of the United States for the purposes aforesaid. And if the salaries, earnings, fees and emoluments of any of the said marshals shall exceed the sum of $5,000, then such excess shall also be paid into the treasury of the United States for the purposes aforesaid."

Mr. Cushing inquired of the chair whether this proposition was not substantially the same as that which was put last evening?

After a few moments consideration, the chairman said that he had not had time to examine the proposition minutely, but, from looking at it, he thought he saw that it was a proposition to insert as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi. (Mr. Carr Johnson) on the bill last evening, that portion of the original proviso which was a rack out, almost in the very order of the proviso. It that was so, it was not in order.

Mr. Carr Johnson then offered the following amendment to the amendment:

"Provided, That the fees and emoluments retained by the district attorneys, marshals and clerks shall, in no case, exceed, for the district attorney and marshal, or either of them, the sum of $6,000 and those for each of the clerks shall not exceed, in any case, $4,000, the surplus of fees and emoluments to be paid into the public treasury, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the secretary of the treasury, subject to the direction of congress."

Mr. Hunt submitted that this was precisely the same proposition in principle as the proposition struck out last night, which was, fixing a maximum.

The amendment was then offered by Mr. Carr Johnson, Evans, Wise, Clark, Vanderpool, Stanley, Gauger, Green and Cushing.

Mr. Gray then took the floor, and said that he desired to submit some observations, but that, if the committee were prepared to take the question, he was willing to yield his right to the floor.

And the question having been put by the chair, Mr. Gray rose, and was proceeding to make some remarks, but Mr. Gray claimed his right, and the debate was continued by Mr. Carr Johnson, and by Messrs. Green, Clifford, Thompson, of Miss, and Sterrett; (in explanation.)

[The whole debate was directed mainly to questions affecting retrenchment and reform, and the appropriate time and debate of bringing out the policy pursued by the friends of Gen. Harrison.]

After which, Mr. Morgan moved to amend the amendment by inserting a proviso that all the fees over $6,000 received by district attorneys, marshals, &c. for the last twelve years should be refunded; but subsequently withdrew it, with the remark that, as he supposed very little could be obtained from the gentlemen who had held those offices during that time, he would not press it. Mr. Morgan then moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "service" the words "exclusive of clerk hire." Which motion was rejected.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. Carr Johnson, and, by ayes 93, noes 43, it was agreed to.

The house then took a recess until 4 o'clock.

During the recess, at 4 o'clock, Mr. Bell, the chairman of the committee of the whole on the state of the union, resumed the chair, and called the committee to order.

The chairman stated that the question before the committee was now on the motion of Mr. Hunt to strike out the entire proviso.

Mr. Willard asked if the amendments were not in lieu of the motion to strike out the proviso.

The chair answered no; that the amendments had been made by the law of parliament, which permitted a proposition to be amended so as to make it as perfect as possible before the question be put on striking it out altogether.

Mr. Carr Johnson took the floor and spoke upon the subject of reform generally, and as to his own course in particular, in relation to that subject, during the ten years he had served in congress.

Messrs. Graves, Geary and C. H. Williams, made frequent explanations during Mr. Johnson's speech. At 5 o'clock, at 5 o'clock, when under the order of this morning, the debate was arrested, and the committee commenced to vote.

The question was then put on striking out the entire proviso, as amended on the motions of Mr. Thompson, of Miss, and Mr. Carr Johnson, of Miss, house counted by tellers, and there appeared for striking out 57, against it 113. And so the proviso, as amended, stands.

The item for the survey of the coast being under consideration, Mr. Cary moved to amend the same by the addition of the following proviso:

"Provided, That $20,000 of the same shall be expended under the direction of the president in making an hydrographical survey of the lake coast of the United States."

Mr. Curtis raised a question of order, on the ground that the amendment was precisely like a bill from the senate now pending before the house.

The chair entertained the amendment, but upon a question of order, Mr. Wise and other members, that the appropriation for the coast survey had been invariably confined to the Atlantic coast, he decided that it was not in order.

From the decision Mr. Carey appealed, but the house sustained the decision of the chair.

Mr. Thompson, of Mississippi, moved to amend by inserting a proviso appropriating $30,000 for the continuance of the survey of the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, which was agreed to.

Mr. Duncan then moved an amendment providing for the arrears of pay of the judge of the eastern district of Florida, which was ruled out of order.

Various other amendments having been moved and disposed of, Mr. John W. Allen, of Ohio, moved the following item:

"For furniture for the president's house, of American manufacture, so far as may be practicable add expedient, to be expended under the direction of the president, in addition to the avails of the sale of decayed furniture, the sum of $6,000."

Mr. Alfred moved the following substitute: "That, for furniture for the president's house, the president elect be authorized to sell the gold spoons and other such furniture as he may deem extravagant and unnecessary in the president's house, and purchase with the proceeds of the sale thereof such furniture as he may deem proper and useful."

Mr. Duncan inquired if there were any gold spoons in the president's house?

Mr. Lincoln said he did not know that there were gold spoons among the items of the president's furniture. He had understood there were spoons carried after all spoons.

Mr. Morgan desired to know by what authority Thomas L. Durcan, a son of a member, was employed as page to the vice president. The fact appeared by a report of the secretary of the senate of the 17th of December, 1840.

Mr. Duncan denied that he had a son by that name.

Mr. Morgan said he was mistaken in the name. It was Thomas T. Duncan, and the son of the member from Ohio. He cannot deny that.

Mr. Duncan made a reply, but it was not distinctly heard; he was understood to deny that the money had been paid to his son.

The reading of an inventory of the president's furniture was called for, and objected to.

And the question was put, shall the paper be read? and passed in the affirmative.

The paper was then read, by which it appeared that the spoons were silver gilt, that is, silver spoons gilt with gold.

Mr. Alfred then modified his substitute so as to say "silver gilt spoons" instead of gold spoons.

Mr. Graves inquired if the Mr. Noland who had given the certificate or paper which had been read was the whig gentleman spoken of a day or two ago.

Several members answered he was no whig.

The question was then put on Mr. Alfred's amendment, and there were for it 61, against it 66.

The question then recurred on Mr. Allen's amendment.

Mr. H. H. inquired on what authority this appropriation was asked for.

Mr. Allen answered, on the authority of the commissioner of public buildings.

Mr. Krim said that he was a member of the committee on public buildings and grounds, and nothing had passed between the commissioner and that committee on the subject, and that Mr. Allen was not a member of the committee.

Mr. Allen said that doubtless all was very true which had been stated by the gentleman who had not offered the amendment as a member of any committee; it had been usual, he believed, for some friend of an incoming president to make such motion, and he, as the friend of Gen. Harrison, had offered the amendment.

Mr. Graves inquired of Mr. Krim, of the committee on public buildings and grounds, why it was that that committee had not acted in the premises.

Mr. Krim answered that if any thing had been done by that committee, it was to have done so in other, it was the extravagance which had been practiced in the president's house; and it was for this reason that the committee had not recommended any thing for the president's household.

Mr. Allen said that it was not evident that there was political feeling in the question.

Mr. H. H. was prevented from proceeding further under the rule which precludes debate.

And the question was put on Mr. Allen's amendment, and there were for it 90, against it 81.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. Leonard, chairman of the committee on public buildings and grounds, moved the following: "For annual repairs of the capitol, attending furniture, water closets, lamp lighting, oil, laborers on capitol grounds, tools, keeping iron pipes in repair, attending guards, gardeners' salary, and top-dressing plants, $7,632 50."

Mr. L. explained the amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. Leonard then proposed the following:

"For annual repairs of the president's house, gardeners' salary, horse and cart, laborers, tools, and annual repairs of furniture, $2,628."

Mr. H. H. inquired if the salary of the president's gardener was included. Mr. Leonard. It is. Mr. Lincoln explained the amendment.

After some further conversation between Mr. H. H. Mr. Leonard and Mr. Stanley, as to the duties and the authority of the committee on the public buildings over the public grounds, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Leonard moved the following amendment:

"For completing back buildings, grading grounds, and cutting down the west portion of the new treasury building, and for materials, $11,188 44."

This was agreed to.

Mr. Leonard also moved the following:

"For fitting columns of the new patent office, finishing roof and stone work, and for materials, $7,730."

Mr. H. H. inquired if the chairman could tell him how much this building had cost?

Mr. Leonard answered he could not, and then went on to explain the necessity of the amendment. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Leonard moved the following:

"For enclosing new jail yard in the city of Washington, $5,000."

Messrs. Stanley, Everett, Leonard and Thompson, of Miss, made some remarks on the amendment; after which, it was agreed to.

Mr. Leonard moved the following:

"For the new general post office building, 100,000 dollars."

Mr. Williams, of N. C. inquired how much this building was intended to cost?

Mr. Leonard could not answer specifically. The building was existing in contract; but he was not furnished with the particulars.

Mr. Lincoln gave information on the subject.

Mr. Burnard asked Mr. Leonard who made the estimate for $100,000 for the post office building?

Mr. Leonard answered that the estimate was made by the architect, and was for $17,000 dollars. The committee had thought $100,000 would be sufficient for the present year, and had cut it down to that sum. The amendment was then adopted.

Mr. Leonard moved the following:

"For the coat house in the city of Alexandria, $2,000."

Mr. Stansly said, if it remembered correctly, the committee on public buildings had reported last year that this building had been completed within the estimates. Mr. Lincoln explained.

The amendment was agreed to; yeas 70, noes 55. Mr. Leonard moved the following:
"For pay of stone cutters and other workmen on the new treasury building and the new patent office building, of the sums allowed them by the commission appointed by the president of the U. S. under the resolution of congress of the 20th July, 1840, $123,923."

The resolution of the last session was read. Mr. Clifford said that this was not a proposition to pay for work never done.

Mr. Leonard asked that the resolution which had been read explained itself.

Mr. Stansly said to the table to have read one of the certificates given under the resolution.

Mr. Lincoln explained fully the nature of the claims proposed to be provided for.

The amendment was agreed to; yeas 59, noes 42. Several items of the bill were then read and passed over.

The items for salaries of ministers to Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, Austria and Mexico, were read; when Mr. Mallory moved to strike out "Mexico," for the purpose of sending a charge d'affaires to that republic, that being the grade of mission sent to all the other South American governments.

Mr. Ewing opposed the amendment. Mr. Pickens explained the present state of our negotiations or relations with Mexico, and suggested that it was best not to make the amendment.

Mr. Mallory thought we had negotiated with Mexico long enough about chimin, and it was not worth while to keep a minister there any longer.

Mr. Wise thought this the best time to reduce the outlay, as Mexico had no minister in this country. The amendment was adopted; yeas 51, noes 47.

Mr. Stansly moved to amend the bill by striking out Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia and Austria, so as to have all foreign governments placed on the same footing; that is, to send charges d'affaires to all of them. Mr. Vanderpoel asked for a division.

The chair stated that the question could be divided, and the question would be first put on striking out Great Britain, and on each of the nations separately.

Mr. Stansly said, if the question was to be taken in detail, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Vanderpoel then moved to strike out Prussia. After some remarks from Mr. Pickens, Mr. Vanderpoel withdrew his motion.

The item for compensation of charges d'affaires to the various foreign governments being read; Mr. Mallory, of Va. moved to amend it so as to include a charge d'affaires to Mexico. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Pickens suggested to Mr. M. to move an outlay for the charge d'affaires to Mexico.

Mr. Mallory said he would leave that for the extra session of congress.

Mr. Jones moved an amendment:
"For the payment of arrearages incurred to enforcing the neutrality laws on the northern and northwestern frontier, $5,000." The item was agreed to.

The item for transportation of the mail, 9,280,000 dollars, was read; when Mr. Morgan moved to increase the sum to $3,320,000. Messrs. Jones, Morgan and Holmes made remarks in relation to the amendment; after which, it was rejected.

After the item for compensation to postmasters had been read, Mr. Underwood moved the following proviso:

"Provided, however, that, in addition to returns required to be paid by postmasters, it shall be the duty of the postmaster at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore and New Orleans, and the other several cities of the union, each and every year hereafter, to render a quarterly yearly account to the postmaster general, under oath, in such form as he may shall prescribe, for the purpose of giving full effect to this provision, of all emoluments or sums by them respectively received for boxes or pigeon holes, or other receptacles for letters or papers, and by them charged for to individuals; or for the delivery of letters or papers, or from any place in either of said cities other than the actual post office of such city, and of all the emoluments, receipts and profits that have come to their hands by reason of keeping branch post offices in either of said cities, and of all the sums so received; so that the net amount received by either of the postmasters at either of said cities for such boxes and pigeon holes and other receptacles for letters and papers, and for delivering letters and papers at or from any place in either of said cities other than said post office, and by reason of keeping a branch post office in either of said cities, shall, in the aggregate, exceed the sum of $3,000 in any one year, such excess shall be paid to the postmaster general for the use and purposes of the post office department. And no postmaster shall be held to account on any pretext whatever, have, receive, or retain for himself, in the aggregate more than $8,000 per year, including salaries, and commissions now allowed and limited by law."

The amendment moved by Mr. Underwood, after being read, was agreed to.

The remaining items in the bill were then read; and the bill was gone through with, when Mr. Thompson, of Miss. proposed the following:

"Resolved, That the survey of the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, $20,000."

The amendment was agreed to; yeas 73, noes 48.

Mr. Cate Johnson then renewed the amendment which he moved this morning, laying restrictions on the amount of compensation of customs house officers, and which was then ruled out of order. He now moved it as a separate and distinct section.

The chair again ruled the amendment out of order, on the ground that it had no relation to any clause of the constitution within the power of congress to make laws as to length for its officers. Mr. Johnson appealed.

Mr. Wise gave reasons to show that a precedent relied upon in support of the amendment was not a valid one, and that the decision of the chair was affirmed without a division.

Mr. Barker then proposed the following:

"And be it enacted, That the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay out of the treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to the collectors, deputy collectors, naval officers and their respective clerks, together with the weighers, gaugers, measurers and markers of the several ports of the United States, the same compensation for the year 1840 which they would have been entitled to receive if the third section of the act of July, 1838, entitled 'an act to provide for the support of the military academy of the United States for the year 1839, and for other purposes,' had been in force during that year, subject to the provisions and restrictions therein contained: Provided, That this act shall apply to such officers only as shall choose to avail themselves of its provisions."

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized in pay to the clerks in the custom house at Boston, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, the arrears of their salaries from 1832 to 1839, to make the same equal to what they received in the last mentioned year, on the same principle as has been applied in the custom houses at New York and Philadelphia.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay to the clerks in the custom house at Philadelphia, such sum of money as, with the amount appropriated by the act of the 31st March, 1839, will make up the arrears of their salaries from 1832 to 1837, the sum to be so paid being first ascertained by the proper accounting officers of the treasury.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Charles S. Drake, deputy inspector in the custom house at Philadelphia, such sum of money as, with the amount already paid him in the year 1838, will make his salary for that year $1,800.

Mr. Tillinghast inquired if the amendment was in order. The chair ruled it out of order.

Mr. Barnard moved the following:

"For continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river, above and below Albany, to the sum to be applied as before, under the direction of the secretary of war."

The chair ruled this amendment out of order.

Mr. Vanderpoel moved the following:

"And be it further enacted, That the sixth section of the act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government for the year 1823, by which it is made lawful for the franking privilege to be exercised by each member of congress for the period of sixty days before he takes his seat in congress until the meeting of the next congress, and the same is hereby declared to mean the annual meeting of congress on the 1st Monday of December in each year."

The chair ruled the amendment out of order.

The committee, then, (at 8 o'clock, night), rose, and reported to the house, with the amendments agreed to.

Mr. Wise moved the previous question. And, before it was seconded, a motion was made to adjourn.

Mr. Wise inquired if his motion for the previous question would be considered the pending question. The chair answered it would.

And the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 24. Mr. Andrews, a member of the committee on claims, said he was instructed by the committee to ask leave to submit a resolution to allow per diem pay to such members of the house as were prevented from reaching the seat of government by the first day of the present session of congress, by reason of the great storm which raged for several days before and after that day.

Several members objected. Mr. Jones then called for the special order on the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government for the year 1841.

This bill was reported from the committee of the whole on the state of the union last evening, at 9 o'clock, with a number of amendments. Immediately upon which, the previous question was moved by Mr. Wise; which question was pending at the adjournment.

It was announced by the speaker; and on a count for a second, a quorum did not vote; when Mr. Vanderpoel moved a call of the house; and the yeas and nays were counted by the motion.

They were taken, and the result was: for the call 106; against it 42.

A quorum being present, Mr. Morgan moved to dispense with the call; on which the yeas and nays were ordered; Mr. M. then withdrew his motion.

And the roll was called, and 190 answered to their names.

Mr. Clifford moved that all further proceedings be dispensed with; which was agreed to.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put; and it was put, separately, on each amendment; and the nine first amendments were agreed to without opposition.

On the 10th amendment, which proposes to appropriate $30,000 for the repairs of the Potomac bridge, in the city of Washington, the yeas and nays were called for by Mr. Davis, of Indiana, and were taken. The result was as follows: yeas 115, nays 72.

And so the yeas and nays were called for the repair of the Potomac bridge was carried.

Several other amendments were then successively put, and agreed to.

And the amendment to the provision in relation to the compensation of district attorneys, marshals and clerks, was read.

Mr. Ganger called for a division of the question on the amendment, so that the question be first put on that part which establishes the fees of state clerks or the fees of the attorneys, clerks and marshals of the United States, and then on that part which fixes the maximum of compensation for attorneys and marshals at $8,000, and for clerks at $4,500 per annum.

The speaker decided that, as the amendment was to strike out a proviso in the bill, and to insert another in its place, the question, under the rule which prohibits the division of a question to strike out and insert, could not be divided.

Mr. Bell stated the proceedings in committee, and said the latter part of the amendment was made in committee as a separate motion, and was a separate and distinct amendment, and ought to have been so reported by the clerk; and the question to concur upon it should be put as on distinct and separate amendments.

A short debate arose on the question of order, in which Messrs. Bell and Drumgoole advocated the right to divide, and Messrs. Wise and Banks opposed it.

The chair, from the explanations given, now decided that there were two separate and distinct amendments, and that the question must be put separately upon them.

Mr. Wise appeared on the ground that it was a single amendment, and could not be divided.

The clerk read the minutes of the proceedings in committee of the whole.

Explanations were made upon the subject by Messrs. Bell, Briggs and Hild.

And the question was put by yeas and nays on the appeal, and there were yeas 98, nays 59. And so the decision of the chair was sustained, and it was decided that there were two amendments.

The question then recurred, and was put, on so much of the amendment as proposes to strike out the original proviso contained within the bill, and which is as follows:

"Provided, however, That the district attorneys of the United States, and for several districts, the clerks and marshals respectively of the same, shall render an account quarterly, yearly, each and every year hereafter, to the secretary of the treasury, of all fees, emoluments and receipts of every name and nature whatever by them respectively received by virtue of their said offices; which account shall be rendered upon oath or affirmation, and shall be in such form, and supported by such proofs as the secretary of the treasury in his judgment may prescribe for the purpose of enforcing the provisions hereinafter named: that is to say, if it shall appear that the salaries, fees and emoluments, receipts and earnings of any of the said attorneys shall exceed the sum of ——— dollars, then such attorneys shall pay such excess into the treasury of the United States for general purposes of the government. And if the salaries, fees, emoluments or earnings of any of the said clerks shall exceed ——— dollars, then the excess shall in like manner be paid into the treasury for the purposes aforesaid. And if the salaries, earnings, fees and emoluments of any of the said marshals shall exceed the sum of ——— dollars, then such excess shall also be paid into the treasury for the purposes aforesaid.

And inserting that part adopted on the motion of Mr. Thompson, of Mississippi, which is as follows: "That hereafter, in lieu of all fees, emoluments and receipts now allowed, it shall and may be lawful for the United States clerks, attorneys, counsel and marshals, in the district and circuit courts of the United States in the several states to demand and receive the same fees that now are, in hereafter may be, allowed by the laws of the said states respectively where said courts are held, to the clerks, attorneys and counsel and marshals, in the highest courts of said states in which like services are rendered; and to other fees or emoluments, except that the marshals shall receive, in toll for summoning all the jurors for any one court, thirty dollars; and shall receive, for every day's actual attendance at any court, fifty cents per day; and for law services, including the composition for mileage, performed by said officers in the discharge of their official duty, for which no compensation is provided by the laws of said states, respectively, the said officers may receive such fees as are now allowed by law according to the existing usage and practice of said courts of the United States, and every district attorney, except the district attorney of the southern district of New York, shall receive, in addition to the above fees, a salary of two hundred dollars per annum."

The result was as follows: For the amendment 176, against it 16.

The question was then put on that part of the proposition moved by Mr. Cuvier Johnson, which is as follows:

"Provided, that the fees and emoluments retained by the district attorneys, marshals and clerks shall, in no case, exceed, for the district attorney and marshal, or either of them, the sum of $6,000; and for each of the clerks shall not exceed, in any case, $4,500; the surplus of fees and emoluments to be paid into the public treasury, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the secretary of the treasury, subject to the disposition of congress."

And passed in the affirmative, as follows: yeas 138, nays 53.

Save at other amendments were then read, and agreed to.

The following amendment was then read: "For sundries for completing the custom-house in New York, $24,321 21."

The question on this amendment was decided by yeas and nays as follows: For the amendment 91, against it 83. And so the appropriation was granted.

The following item of amendment was then read: "For furniture for the custom house at New York, $8,000."

The question on this amendment was decided by yeas and nays as follows: For the amendment 134, against it 109. And so the appropriation was referred.

The item to appropriate $700 for the expenses incurred by the collector of New York in the execution of the act for the removal of vessels on goods destroyed by the great fire in December, 1833, was read and agreed to: yeas 76 to 54.

Sundry other amendments as read were then agreed to. And the following item then came up:

"For furniture for the president's office, and for sundries, so far as may be practicable and expedient, to be expended under the direction of the president, in addition to the avails of the sale of decayed furniture, the sum of six thousand dollars."

Mr. Stansfield asked leave to move an amendment to the item.

Mr. Chapman objected. The question was then put by yeas and nays on the item reported from the committee of the whole, and there appeared yeas 100, nays 89. And so the appropriation for furniture for the president's house was made.

Just before the speaker announced the vote on this question, and after the roll had been called,

Mr. Stansfield said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to vote. I did not vote when my name was called, because I was waiting for those who were in their seats, but did not vote. I see I shall wait in vain. I vote aye.

The item for repairs for the president's house, attending and keeping the grounds in order, pay of gardener, and repairs of furniture, $2,628, was read, and the yeas and nays were ordered upon it; but before they were taken, the hour for recess (2½ o'clock) arrived, and the speaker left the chair, and a recess was taken until 4 o'clock.

At 4 o'clock, the speaker took the chair, and at 5 minutes past 4 a quorum not being in attendance, Mr. Andrews moved an adjournment, and the question was put on yeas and nays, and there appeared for the adjournment 4, against it 108.

The house refused to adjourn, but a quorum did not vote.

The speaker counted the house, and reported that 136 members were now in attendance.

The question was then put on the amendment under consideration when the house took recess for dinner, which in state and senate was then appeared for the amendment 112, against it 49.

Further amendments were then read and concurred in—and the item of $3,000 for the new court house in Alexandria was read, and the yeas and nays were ordered upon it. The result was for the amendment 105, against it 70. And so the three thousand dollars were granted.

The following item was next in order, viz:

"For pay of stone cutters and other workmen on the treasury building and on new patent office building, of the sum allowed them by the commission appointed by the president of the United States under the resolution of congress of the 20th July, 1840, $12,923."

The yeas and nays were ordered on the amendment, which was taken, it passed in the affirmative.

Next came the amendment reducing the mission to Mexico from a full mission to a charge des affaires.

On the question to agree to this amendment the yeas and nays were, yeas 86, nays 101. So the amendment was rejected, and the mission to Mexico remains a full mission.

[Before the roll was called upon the motion for striking out the appropriation for a minister to Mexico, the previous question pending, Mr. Stansfield asked to be excused from voting, and he was again assigned his reasons. A question of order was raised, but Mr. S. said he would assign his reasons, as he had a right to do. He then said, I ask to be excused from voting because the chairman of the committee on foreign affairs (Mr. Pickens) told us last night that there was no reason that he was aware of why the mission should be reduced. He was opposed to it, and Mr. S. said the opinions of that gentleman on this subject ought to be respected in this house. The chairman also told us, that the executive did not concur in the propriety of reducing the mission at this time—that our relations with Mexico were such as to require a full mission at present. For these reasons I have asked to be excused from voting; and not wishing to trouble the house, I withdraw the motion, and will vote no.]

Other amendments of the committee of the whole were then reported by the clerk and concurred in.

And the amendment adopted on the motion of Mr. Andrews (as above), relating to compensation of postmasters, was then read.

The question to agree to it was decided by yeas and nays as follows: For the amendment 152, against it 12. And the amendment was adopted.

Next came the appropriation $20,000 for conducting the survey of the coast of the Gulf of Mexico westward, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: For the appropriation 97, against it 87. The amendments being now gone through with—the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read a third time forthwith by the title.

And on the question shall it pass? it passed in the affirmative. And so the bill was passed, and sent the senate for concurrence.

An adjournment was then moved, (6½ o'clock) which was agreed to.

The question was put and carried, and the house adjourned accordingly.

Thursday, Feb. 25. As soon as the reading of the journal had been concluded, Mr. Chapman moved that the rules be suspended, and that the house go into committee of the whole on the state of the union and take up the bill from the senate to establish an additional land office in Alabama.

Some conversation here took place between the speaker and Mr. Briggs and several members, about an amendment to that part of the journal which sets forth the proceedings on that part of the appropriation bill which relates to the compensation of district attorneys, marshals and clerks. No question was put on the subject. Whilst this conversation was going on, Mr. Crabb and his colleague went to include in his motion the bill from the senate to annex the Cherokee territory in Alabama to the Coosa land district, and for the removal of the land office of said district. Mr. Chapman assented.

The speaker asked that the bill named by Mr. Crabb had not been read or committed.

Mr. Chapman then varied his motion so as to include the reading the first and second time and commitment of the bill.

And the question was put on the motion of Mr. Chapman to suspend the rules for the purposes aforesaid, and there appeared yeas 64, nays 69.

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, moved a suspension of the rules in relation to the resumption of business, and that the house proceed to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service of the year 1841.

Mr. Lincoln asked Mr. J. to waive his motion for a few minutes that the house might take up and pass the bill reported a few days ago, to declare valid certain patents or deeds heretofore issued for public lands within the limits of the naval service.

Mr. Crabb asked Mr. J. to waive his motion so as to afford the speaker an opportunity to clear his table of the great amount of business which has accumulated upon it.

Mr. Jones pressed his motion, and the question upon it was put, and carried without a count.

The house then resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1841.

Mr. Key, of North Carolina, was called to the chair of the committee.

The bill was read throughout by the clerk, and the committee then proceeded to take it up item by item.

The item for increase, repair, armament and equipment of the navy, and wear and tear of vessels in commission, $1,425,000," was read.

Mr. Silliman moved to increase the sum to $2,000,000, and gave, at some length, the reasons for the increase he proposed.

The debate on this amendment was continued by Messrs. Jones, of Va., Evans, W. Thompson, Tillinghast, and Proffit. When the latter concluded, the house took its accustomed recess until 4 o'clock, P. M.

Evening session. On the resumption of the house the debate was continued by Messrs. Smith, of Ind., Mason, of Ohio, Cooper, of Georgia, Wise, Mallory, Hoffman, Cushing, Vanderpool, and Smith, of Me. until 8 o'clock.

Mr. Wise moved that the journal of the 24th inst. be amended in that part of which sets out the proceedings on the division of questions concerning with the committee of the whole on the state of the union, on the amendments to the general appropriation bill, relating to the fees and compensation of district attorneys, marshals and clerks. Before the question was taken, the house adjourned.

Friday, Feb. 26. On the resumption of the house, the question occurred on the motion of Mr. Wise to amend the journal, made yesterday, just before adjournment.

Upon this motion a debate of an hour's continuance ensued, mainly on the facts of the case, in which Messrs. Wise, Bell and Donaghe participated.

The speaker, during the discussion, several times gave a statement of the facts as they occurred, and his views of the proper mode of showing them on the journal.

Mr. Morse moved that the proposition to amend lie on the table. The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted as follows: To lie on the table 67, against it 97. The previous question was then moved, ordered, put and carried. And the question was put on the motion of Mr. Morse to amend the journal, and passed in the affirmative: yeas 97, nays 57.

Mr. Andrews, from the committee of accounts by direction of the committee, asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of accounts be instructed to allow the pay of all such members of this house as may have been unavoidably detained on their way to the seat of government at the commencement of this session, by the storm which occurred about that time, they having left their respective places of abode a sufficient time to have reached the capital in time to have taken their seats on the first day of the session.

Objecting to the resolution, Mr. Andrews moved that the resolution be suspended.

They were suspended by a vote of two-thirds. The resolution then came fully before the house. It was again read; when Mr. Andrews moved the previous question. Which was ordered put and carried.

Mr. Drumgole asked the yeas and nays. And, at his request, the rule was read which says that "no member shall vote on any question in the event of which his is immediately and particularly interested."

Mr. Crabb asked to be excused from voting: yeas 81, nays 91. The question was then taken on the passage of the resolution, and there appeared, yeas 100, nays 48.

Mr. Banks rose, and with much feeling announced to the house that Philip P. Barbour, a justice of the supreme court of the United States, died suddenly at his lodgings at the seat of government, on the night of the 24th instant. After detailing the public and private history of the deceased, and speaking of his many social and private virtues, and of the loss his country, his family and his friends had sustained, Mr. Banks submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That this house have learned, with deep sensibility the decease of the hon. Philip P. Barbour, for many years a member and able speaker of the house of representatives of the United States, and, at the time of his death, an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, which melancholy event took place suddenly in the city of Washington, on the 24th of the present month, and that as a mark of the respect entertained for the memory of the deceased, this house will adjourn at two o'clock, this day, for the purpose of attending the funeral of the deceased, and that at 4 o'clock of the same day, the members of this hall of the house for the despatch of the public business.

Mr. Wise concurred in every thing that was said by Mr. Banks of the talents, the virtues and the worth, public and private, of judge Barbour, and his feelings were deeply affected at the loss his friends and his country had sustained—but a night later than he had fallen, and no such notice of his death was taken. He alluded to the illustrious John Marshall, chief justice of the same court. He could not vote for honors to the memory of judge Barbour which had not been bestowed on the memory of chief justice Marshall. He asked his colleague to withhold the resolution, and content himself with the annunciation of the decease of the judge.

Mr. Banks spoke a few words in reply, which were not heard at his desk.

Mr. Steady asked Mr. Banks to modify his resolution so that the house adjourn immediately, instead of 2 o'clock. Mr. S. implored that there be no debate on this resolution.

The question was then put, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Lincoln asked the house to devote a few minutes to the bill to make valid defective land patents.

No objection was made, and the bill was taken up. Mr. Lincoln called the previous question. The bill was then read.

Mr. Crabb desired to propose an amendment, and asked Mr. Lincoln to withdraw the previous question to enable him to do so, promising to renew it after the question on his amendment should be decided.

Mr. Lincoln could not accommodate his friend.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading: was read the third time, passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

Mr. Joist, of Virginia, moved that the house again go into committee of the whole on the bill making appropriations for the navy for the year 1841.

Mr. Fillmore begged that the hour which remained before the recess be devoted to the bill proposed for taking testimony in cases of contested elections.

Mr. Russell begged that the hour be devoted to private bills. The question was put on Mr. Joist's motion, and it prevailed.

The house then resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and resumed the consideration of the bill. Mr. McKay, of North Carolina, was again called to preside over the deliberations of the committee.

The debate was continued on the subject of the navy generally by Mr. Merriss and Mr. Sallottall until two o'clock, when the committee rose, and the house adjourned to attend the funeral of the honorable judge Barbour, deceased, late of the supreme court.

Evening session. At four o'clock the house reassembled its session in committee of the whole on the state of the union on the navy appropriation bill. Speeches were made by Messrs. Weller, Ellis, Leadbetter, Dawson, Hawes and Wick—the latter gentleman spoke at large upon various subjects connected with the navy, and when he concluded the committee rose, and then the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 27. Mr. Joist said this was the last day, according to the rules, that the house could send to the senate any bill of its own which had not previously passed and been to the senate and returned with amendments. He therefore, moved to suspend the rules proscribing the routine and priority of business, so far as relates to the several appropriation bills now pending before the house.

The speaker suggested that the better way would be to confine the motion to the bill for the navy.

Mr. Joist assented, and modified his motion accordingly, which was concurred in.

Mr. Joist then moved the amendment moved in committee of the whole by Mr. Sallottall, to amend the item appropriating $1,425,000 for increase, repair, armament and equipment of the navy, and wear and tear of vessels, by striking out $1,425,000, and inserting $2,000,000.

And the question was taken on this amendment by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows: for the amendment 94; against it 80.

So the amendment was adopted, and the appropriation was fixed at $2,000,000.

This bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time and passed, and sent to the senate.

The bill contains appropriations amounting to $2,000,000.

Mr. Joist moved a further suspension of the rules as to the order of business, and that the house proceed to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the army.

The motion was concurred in; and the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and proceeded to the consideration of that bill. Mr. Cushing was called to preside over the committee.

It was taken up item by item.

When the clerk came to the item—

"For continuing the military road on the western frontier, $5,000," Mr. Davis, of Indiana, moved to insert the following item:

"For the continuance of the Cumberland road through the states of Indiana, Ohio and Illinois, to be equally disbursed among said states, and to be subjected to all the restrictions and limitations of former appropriations, $300,000."

Mr. Joist objected to the amendment as out of order.

Mr. Davis said, if Mr. Joist would waive the question of order, and let the question be taken on it, he would not say any thing upon the subject; but if the objection on the score of order was pressed, he should be compelled to enter upon its support.

Mr. Proffitt took the same ground, and urged earnestly the necessity of the appropriation.

Mr. Joist insisted on the question of order, and said that separate bills had heretofore been passed for this road.

Mr. Cass thought the chairman of the committee of ways and means was mistaken as to a fact; that the Cumberland road had often been provided for in this way—that is, by way of amendment to other bills.

The chair decided that as the Cumberland road had been constructed under the superintendence of the war department, in the various discussions upon it, its advantages as a military road had been always urged as a reason for its construction, extension and repair; and as appropriations for it had been incorporated in several bills, he decided the amendment was in order.

Mr. Montgomery appealed from this decision of the chair.

And the question on the appeal was put, the house was counted by tellers, and the decision of the chair was sustained, yeas 95, nays 81.

The question was then put on the amendment of Mr. Davis by tellers, and there appeared for the appropriation 78, against it 85. And so the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Hunt moved to insert the following item: "For improving the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river, above and below Albany, the sum of $100,000, to be expended as heretofore, under the direction of the secretary of war."

Mr. Clifford objected to it as not in order.

Mr. Hunt advocated the amendment on the ground that the Hudson river was a great military thoroughfare, and stated that if this river had been improved before the last war more money would have been saved than would remove all the obstructions which exist in its navigation.

The chair, under the 50th rule, which provides that "no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment," decided that the amendment was not in order, as there was nothing in the bill of an analogous character.

Mr. Hunt appealed, and supported the propriety of his proposition as an amendment to this bill, principally on the ground that the Hudson river was a great national thoroughfare, and, as such, indispensably necessary in the transportation of troops and every thing else connected with the defence of the country. He adverted to appropriations already made for the improvement of the navigation of this river, amounting to $100,000. He also stated that his amendment came within the principle set by the chair in the case of the amendment moved by Mr. Davis, of Indiana, for the Cumberland road.

The question was then put, and the decision of the chair was sustained without a count.

Mr. Moore, of Louisiana, moved to amend the bill by inserting after the appropriation for "arsenals," these words:

"And for removing the obstructions in Red river, under the instructions of the secretary of war, in order to open the communication with and furnish supplies to Fort Tuxson."

And to increase the appropriation by adding $40,000 thereto for this purpose.

Mr. Gulbath objected to the amendment as out of order.

At the request of Mr. Moore, the report of the secretary of war, showing the necessity of the improvement of Red river as a means of supplying the military posts on the western frontier with provisions and other supplies, was read.

After the report was read, Mr. Gulbath withdrew his question of order.

Mr. Hopkins renewed it.

Mr. Pope, in a few words, clearly and forcibly illustrated the necessity of the appropriation, both in a military and commercial point of view.

He was well acquainted with the river and the country, (having been governor of Arkansas many years while it was under a territorial government).

Mr. Hunt also objected to the amendment as out of order, on the ground on which the amendment proposed by him for the Hudson river was ruled out of order.

The chair ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. Moore appealed, and addressed the house on the appeal, which he forcibly exhibited the necessity of the appropriation; but of its appropriateness in this place, he took the ground, particularly, that it was one of the contingencies necessary to carry on the purposes and business of the government.

Mr. Cass considered the amendment intimately connected with the defence of the country, and entirely within the rule, and, consequently, in order.

He also showed the indispensable necessity of the improvement of this river, in consequence of the great number of Indians placed on its upper waters by the government, and the consequent constant danger arising therefrom to the western frontier.

Mr. Underwood begged gentlemen to abstain, at this late hour, the session, from unnecessary or protracted debate.

The chair here recapitulated his reasons why the amendment was not in order, and put the question on the appeal; and the decision of the chair was sustained, and the amendment was consequently voted out of order.

Mr. Grinnell moved to insert the following item, to come in after the item for armament for fortifications:

"For the purchase or manufacture of repeating fire arms, under the direction of the secretary of war, $70,000."

Mr. Waddy Thompson suggested the propriety of changing the wording of the item by using the words "Colt's repeating fire arms."

Mr. Grinnell accepted the suggestion, and modified his amendment accordingly.

Mr. Thompson further suggested that the appropriation be increased to $20,000.

Mr. Grinnell did not accept this suggestion.

Mr. Thompson then moved it as an amendment, and supported his motion by referring to a senate document, which showed that the arms of Colt had been fully tried and compared with Hall's; he was in five minutes had fired 380 times, with more accuracy than could Hall's, and without the slightest accident. Mr. T. added the testimony of col. Harney warmly in its favor, after personal experiment.

He explained the general construction of these arms, and dwelt on the expediency of introducing them into the service of the army. He moved $10,000 of the proposed appropriation for the construction of the bomb cannon invented by Cochrane, and stated the report of a naval officer in its favor, after full trial. He pointed the improvement introduced into the British army by Cochrane, they had seized upon it, and Mr. Cochrane was now under contract to a large amount for the supply of this species of cannon.

Mr. Drowsode objected to the amendment on the ground that, as the bill had been gone through with, it was not in order to go back to make amendments; that the bill must be amended as the committee proposed. The chair decided that the amendment was in order.

Mr. Smith, of Maine, referred to the competition between different inventors of repeating fire-arms; he wished the door to be open to them all. The gentleman from S. C. was once strongly opposed to all repeating arms; he has suddenly changed his opinion, but Mr. S. now agreed with him, save in being willing to give the patronage of government exclusively to one individual. Another invention by Nutting had been urged in another part of the capital; Mr. Colt's rifle and a report to its favor had been made by the same board of officers who had testified in favor of Colt's. The revolving apparatus of Colt's arms easily got out of order, and the army in Florida had lost an opportunity of shooting at the most distinguished chiefs of the Seminole Indians owing to this very circumstance. Mr. S. remonstrated warmly against any action of congress in favor of one inventor to the exclusion of all others. Let all be tried and the proper authority decide. He was willing to be tried, but was not an exclusive patronage. He yielded the floor to Mr. Thompson who modified his amendment so as to omit the word "Colt's." He then read several documents in favor of Colt's repeating pistols and muskets, and further urged the importance of the amendment.

Mr. Smith resumed.

Mr. Aford called for action on the ground that Mr. Smith had spoken once already. He hoped the gentleman would not fire at the house on the principle of Colt's repeating arms. [Laughter.]

Mr. Smith said he still retained the floor. The gentleman from Georgia had not kept his eye steady on his musket, or he would have taken better aim.

Mr. Aford said he could shoot both eyes and hit the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. Smith said he could not say the same, for he might as well fire at nothing as at the gentleman from Georgia. [A laughter.]

Mr. S. then proceeded to read a report in favor of Nutting's rifle; disclaiming, however, all exclusive distinction; and he asked was that the door be kept open alike to all.

Mr. Wise remonstrated on the consumption of time, and said he would not give a farthing for the whole of both inventions.

Mr. Drowsode called to order.

Mr. Monroe congratulated Mr. Wise on his zeal against the waste of time, and hoped his example would enforce his doctrine.

Mr. Kemble made some remarks, scarce heard, but understood to be in favor of Mr. Wise's rifle.

Mr. Banks replied to Mr. Drowsode.

Mr. Coles opposed the amendment, and referred to a report of the secretary of war against repeating arms, or other new inventions, until thoroughly tried.

The question being now taken, Mr. Thompson's amendment was rejected, as was also the original amendment moved by Mr. Grinnell.

Mr. Jones moved to amend the bill by adding a further section, as follows:

"For preventing and suppressing hostilities in Florida, to be expended and the directive of the secretary of war, conformably to the acts of congress of the 19th March and 24th July, 1836, and the acts therein referred to, viz:

"For forage, for hire, or transportation of military supplies of every description from the places of purchase to Florida; for the purchase of wagons and harness, of boats and lighters, and other vessels, of horses, mules and oxen, to keep up the trains of troops, mules and other material for repairs; for transportation within Florida, including the hire of steamboats and other vessels for service in the rivers and on the coasts, and the expense of maintaining the several steamboats and transport schooners connected with the operations of the army; for hire of mechanics, laborers, mule drivers, teamsters and other assistants, including their subsistence; for miscellaneous and contingent charges, and for arrears in 1840, $1,061,216."

Mr. J supported the amendment as being authorized by the committee of ways and means. The reasons on which it rested were that, at the commencement of this year, there were arrears, to the amount of $661,216 due on the expenditures of the Florida war. The remaining $400,000 were to meet charges which might have accrued since the 1st of January last. The committee had before it estimates to a much larger amount. Mr. J here read an estimate from the war department for the raising of a corps in Florida of 750 mounted men and 250 foot; but the committee doubted the authority of the existing law for the raising of these troops. There-could not come under the act of 1795 for calling out the militia, but would be an addition to the standing army of the United States. The committee had therefore rejected the estimates for these troops. The $400,000 of the amendment would pay and maintain 1,000 men as long as they would probably be needed in the Florida service. Mr. J said he had the highest respect for estimates from the executive departments, but the committee were constrained to decline repeating them. A few days since the committee had approved of $100,000 for the use of the Seminoles as were willing to emigrate. We had already 4,500 of the regular troops of the United States now in Florida.

Mr. Ezra moved to strike out the sum mentioned in the amendment, and insert the sum asked by the department. The $100,000 could not be applied in the war in Florida, but was for the removal of warships who came in. Early in this session the secretary had asked for $2,300,000, but, as the prospects of peace were worse than before, the secretary had reduced his estimates to $1,600,000. Over $600,000 of this was due for arrears; this the chairman was willing to allow, but instead of $1,000,000 for which the secretary asked, the committee gave only $400,000, an extraordinary example.

Mr. E found himself in a strange position, viz: that of defending the administration and the president of the United States against the charge of his friends. Mr. E here insisted that the calling out of a corps of mounted men, as proposed by the secretary, was not in order. The secretary did not propose to call out such a force; he had then already. They were in part the "sedentary militia," called out for 3 months, and then for 3 months more, and then for 3 months again. The pay of this whole force was to be paid out of the treasury, and he lost. The force was now in service and must be paid. Mr. E would not say there had been any violation of law; the president and secretary thought there had not; the troops had been raised, and it did not pass now they must be hereafter. If the chairman thought it a violation of law, how would he report an appropriation to pay for it? These arrears, if not paid now, would fall on the coming administration. Citizens of Alabama, Georgia and Florida having invited to enter this corps and had done so, and had served. We are not to be paid. Mr. E held Mr. J to his own doctrine, urged yesterday; these estimates were from those charged with these duties, and if we could not trust their estimates, what could we trust?

The secretary then screened down the estimates to the very lowest point; the question of their application was a different matter; it belonged to congress to appropriate; if the money was wrongfully employed, let those who did it, be answerable for it. Mr. E held the war department responsible for the department in Florida, and the subservience of the army for want of adequate appropriations, and hoped congress would not risk the prolongation of the war for want of the supplies asked by the department.

Mr. Jones replied, repelling the intimation that he had charged the president and secretary with a violation of the constitution and laws. The committee were not military men; they entertained great doubt of their authority in an appropriation bill to authorize a provision for the raising of a body of mounted men. Congress had deemed it necessary to provide a law before this could be done. Mr. J insisted that the force now in the field was amply sufficient, and denied the necessity of more troops, and the committee proposed to appropriate.

Mr. Masson dwelt on the authority of the estimates from the war department, and necessity of enabling the department to carry out its plans. The chairman had opposed this on the ground of a doubt as to the authority of congress to call out a particular description of troops, and asked the house of representatives to act on this doubt, disclaiming, at the same time, all military knowledge, and urging nothing but his doubt and the committee's doubt. The supplies had been furnished, the service performed, yet the chairman refused to appropriate for what was actually due, on no better reason than a doubt of one gentleman in this house. Was his doubt of more weight with the house than the deliberate judgment and plans of the highest military authorities of the government? The chairman denied having made any charge against the president or the secretary of war; but with great humility suggested his doubt. Yet he was willing to appropriate for a portion of the debt thus unconsciously created by the government. The chairman denied having made any charge against the president or the secretary of war; but with great humility suggested his doubt. Yet he was willing to appropriate for a portion of the debt thus unconsciously created by the government. The chairman denied having made any charge against the president or the secretary of war; but with great humility suggested his doubt. Yet he was willing to appropriate for a portion of the debt thus unconsciously created by the government.

Mr. M had voted five millions at a time for this Florida war; and yet now, when the war seemed drawing to a close, gentlemen were for throwing over the expenditures due on a future administration. Mr. M was opposed to this; it was neither just nor wise; it was bad principle and bad policy. The subject had never been submitted to the military committee; yet, on the doubt of a man who disclaimed all pretensions to military knowledge, the house were to refuse what was asked by a department as necessary. The chairman thought we could get along with $100,000; no doubt of it; so we could if but one dollar should be appropriated; but the government was dissolved, and the Seminoles made their way to Washington, and took control of the departments. When it suited the chairman he could rely implicitly on estimates; but when it did not, then he was for settling them as the committee should see fit. The chairman was suspicious; there were opposite extremes of folly. This money must be paid, and would be; and every gentleman here knew it would, in spite of the doubts of the chairman. The soldier must get his pay, and the farmer must be paid for his forage, and the contractor for his pork; the nation would not be blinded as to the design of casting burdens on the coming administration, and they would see this matter in its true light.

Mr. D urged that the hour for the hour of recess arriving; the house took recess accordingly.

Evening session. Mr. Downing said he was bound in duty to his constituents to explain certain facts in which they were deeply interested. He had raised the subject of the Indian atrocities that address the committee at this late hour. Recommendations had been made to appropriate $100,000 to close the Seminole war by treaty, but this was not the first effort to bring the war to an end by treaty. As far back as 1837 general Jessup had concluded a treaty with the Seminoles, but the government refused to ratify it, and the Seminoles rose it up again but the interference of the people of Florida to recover their slaves. They did not interfere, and yet the war continued. So in 1839, the military force was withdrawn on the same persuasion. Mr. D urged that the same delusion would occur again. The Indians were treacherous and could never be relied on. Tigertail, after signing the treaty, had made his escape, and carried off one of the pacificators with him.

Mr. D urged strongly the necessity of a state of preparation. The chairman of the committee on his mere motion had reversed the estimates of the war department, and that gentleman's fiat was the order on which the action of this house turned. It was not an object of party to make a show of economy, the more necessary the appropriation was, and now be came in with a clause for arrears to cover more than half of what should have been appropriated last year. There was every year a large bill of arrears. Either congress must not calculate or they shall delude the people. The Florida war was not ended. Every account from that country about surrenders, fugitives was accompanied by accounts of cruel murders. When a camp of over one hundred men had been surprised, and escaped by an older than general Armstrong, the very same men afterwards murdered Mrs. Montgomery. It was vain to hope to close the war without further fighting. Mr. D had risen to raise the rancor of the game now playing—to give his solemn opinion that an effort was making to induce the committee to believe that war was ended, with a full knowledge that the fact was otherwise, that all the column of its breaking out anew might be cast on the new administration. It behooved this congress to furnish the new administration the means to bring it fully and efficiently to a close.

The session a bill had been rejected for a force of 1,500 men. Notwithstanding, the secretary, by his own volition, called that corps into service, against law, for the purpose of fighting, but to remain sedentary in camp. The chairman said that he had no authority to raise this corps without an express act of congress; yet he had called them out on his own authority; and put them under the command of governor Read, under the militia laws of Florida, a whole family of them under the militia laws of the United States. These militia had not even been raised by the chairman, but an appropriation was called for to pay them. Why were not the militia of Florida included? citizens were called out, but not to visit the Indians, nor to raise parties in march, and not to remain at home. Mr. D inveighed against the distinction as odious. These men had been called out merely to assist the last election. Show him their services to the Indians, had they slain the women and children, they had done nothing. While inclined to remain at home they were furnished with horses at government expense; to ride, he supposed, from their homes to their potato patches? When the militia who had been six months in hard service had never been able to obtain a day's pay, these sedentary militia had hundreds of thousands of dollars reported for their pay. Mr. D. alluded to the Florida bounty to the amount of $500,000, and said that on them the territory had almost held its existence; had raised armies and fed them, and defended themselves from the hostile force, and contended that the government was in justice bound to reward the money; but he could not hope for its success. He asked the chairman if it was fair for the mere sake of a political object to trammel the coming administration in conducting this war. It had been the advice of Churchill and Adams to go to the aid of the Florida troops, to illuminate every tree with the fire of musketry, and search every hamlet and evergreen. This he believed the only way to bring this war to a close, and was it fair to curtail the government in attempting it? Mr. Jones explained.

Mr. Downing protested against charging Florida with the accoutrements and pay of the troops employed; for this they must pay even in peace. So $100,000 was all the money appropriated. If General Butler should be charged with the service, he would find the sum very insufficient. As to these sedentary militia, they were called out quarterly—every three months. The secretary's duty, if he called out the militia, would be to call up the troops ordered by the state or territory to which they belonged; if on horseback, they must be used on horseback; if on foot, on foot.

Mr. D. insisted that the war could never be ended. The physical force of the country rendered it impossible for a white man to follow Indians on foot over the deserts of Florida. The Indians would destroy Bonaparte's army, if only thus organized. The Indians had better rifles, and more skillful marksmen than the white men. Their soldiers never could obtain, as an attacking force. He entreated gentlemen to remember that their responsibility lasted only five days longer: was any provision made for that force, (the best in Florida), which carried the war up the rivers and streams into the interior? The naval force on the coast had done essential service in protecting the coast from the population of the small islands around and the neighboring foreign nations. He paid a tribute to the committee on the bill, and to the secretary of the navy, and admitted that the secretary of the navy had fully done his duty, and entitled himself to the lasting gratitude of the people of Florida.

Mr. D. had now fulfilled his duty by warning the government that these would be no peace, but, on the contrary, murders. He asked if, with signs like such as had recently occurred in that territory, any man of common sense could hope for peace? He asked, if the war was not closed, it was because a race in comparison to which hell might be preferred. He inveighed against the parsimonious spirit which had pervaded the whole system of management of this war, and laid the consequences at the door of the administration. If the proper means should be placed in the hands of the coming administration, he should begin to hope that at length the dawn of peace had broken.

The question was now called on the motion of Mr. Evans to increase the appropriation to 1,665,000 dollars.

Mr. Dawson suggested to Mr. Evans to increase the sum by including $250,000 due to Georgia.

Mr. Crabb made a similar plea for Alabama. Mr. Jones admitted the validity of the claim of Georgia; as the war had not been closed, it was not well informed. He believed the sum mentioned justly due to Georgia, but it would be excluded from this bill, as no law had yet passed allowing the claim. He reiterated the validity of the claim of the amendment, for men were now suffering in the everglades of Florida.

Mr. Wise had rather seen a campaign in Florida than have this debate further protracted.

Mr. Dawson pleaded for the claim of Georgia on the ground of equity and honor. Her sons had endured every hardship in the field, the government had not paid them, and Georgia had herself advanced the money to save her citizens from distress.

Mr. Graves protested against voting money to pay these sedentary militia and their horses, for cultivating their crops, at near $2 a day, for doing not one particle of public service. It was a new case under the government; such a thing had never been heard of. Gen. Taylor had told Mr. G. that the money paid to these 1,200 men would have paid 9,000 men.

Mr. Downing explained: stated the valuable and arduous services of the militia of Florida.—Mr. Graves insisted. Mr. Downing replied.

Mr. Graves objected to the policy of employing Florida mounted militia, and preferred the regular forces of the United States.

Mr. Morgan asked if any part of this appropriation went to pay the "sedentary militia"? If so, he would vote against it. But if it was to put an end to the war, he would vote it cheerfully. He believed the war would end with the administration which it had disgraced. He pronounced an eulogy on the enterprise and bravery of Col. Harvey. Mr. M. would vote cheerfully in favor of a review of the course of the administration towards the people of Florida, in conducting the war, and earnestly appealed for an appropriation that should put an end to it. He did not complain of the amount expended, but of the manner in which it had been wasted.

Mr. Evans replied to the inquiry of Mr. Morgan, stating that the amount in the amendment was general, to be expended by the government according to law. As to the sedentary militia, their claim was not the main question before them, they had been ordered by the government, and they must be paid.

Mr. Wise put the amendments together, and called for the question.

It was taken by tellers, and resulted as follows: Ayes 71, Nays 76. So the amendment of Mr. Evans was negatived.

The question then recurring on the section proposed by the committee of ways and means, it was agreed on.

Mr. Crabb then referred to the services of the Alabama militia. The state had paid them 130,000 dollars, and presented her claim here; but as it still remained before the committee of claims, he desired to submit an amendment to this bill.

The chair inquired whether there was a standing law for these expenditures?

Mr. Crabb said there had been, but there was some irregularity in the vouchers, and therefore he wished the claim settled on principles of equity and justice.

Mr. Jones inquired for the law.

Mr. Crabb said there was a general law for the payment of militia, when called into the service of the United States, at a month.

Mr. Lincoln said there was no other law than that under which the militia of Massachusetts and other states had been paid.

Mr. Tillinghast objected to the amendment as being for past services, while the appropriations in the bill were for the future.

The chair pronounced the amendment out of order.

Mr. Crabb thereupon withdrew it.

The committee then rose, and the bill was reported to the house. And the question being on concurring in the amendments reported to the bill; Mr. Chapman moved the previous question. The call was sustained—ayes 93, nays 83.

The previous question was then put and carried, and the main question being on the amendment, (viz: the new section for the Florida war), it was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to its third reading. It was read a third time; when Mr. Hubbard moved the previous question; which was seconded, put and carried, and the bill was passed.

The whole amount appropriated in the bill is $5,275,919.

Mr. Jones moved to suspend the rules to go into committee of the whole on the state of the union, with a view to take up the general Indian appropriation bill, but at the suggestion of Mr. Bril, he suspended the motion till Mr. B. had reported the Indian bills from the committee on Indian affairs, viz:

A bill to defray the expense of delegations of Seminole Indians west of the Mississippi to Florida, and for other purposes.

A bill making appropriations for the temporary support of an agent to reside at Kikapoo Indians, and to defray the expense of removing and subsisting for a limited time, the Swao creek and Black river Indians, of Michigan.

The bills were read and referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Jones then renewed his motion, which was agreed to, and the house went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, Mr. Drom going in the chair, and took up the Indian appropriation bill, which was read throughout by the clerk for information.

The bill was taken up by items.

Mr. Saltonstall moved the following amendment: For presents for Indians under the same act $3,000.

He supported his motion by some remarks.

Mr. Jones opposed the amendment, on the ground that the whole amount of presents to the Indians was $10,000. Through this bill had been introduced into previous bills, from year to year, it had been inadvertently done. The law, when fully examined, would be found not to warrant the annual appropriation.

Mr. Rurden explained; the withholding of the money would not injure the Indians, as the money ultimately fell into the hands of agents and sub-agents; and the Indians were more injured than benefited by the practice.

Mr. Everett considered the act as distributing $5,000 annually. It was so intended at the time, and had been understood ever since. The bill made permanent provision for the Indian department.

Mr. Prentiss inquired whether any law allowed part of the annuities to be paid to the Indians in goods?

Mr. Jones said this was according to each treaty; the payments were variously made.

Mr. Prentiss said the law was daily violated; he had conducted Indians under one of the treaties, and knew that more than half the annuity to the Potawatamies was paid in such goods, though the treaty required gold and silver. Mr. Prentiss made other statements, showing that the Indians refused, but that the department replied they must take goods or nothing. Mr. P. then addressed himself to Mr. Bril, saying that he had found $275,000 worth purchased from a certain mercantile house in New York, invoiced at prices over the retail price in the interior. Goods were boxed up and marked with large sums outside, but when opened were found to contain only small sums of cash. Goods were thrown into a blanket, and what fell out were considered as belonging to the agent. He agreed with Mr. Rurden respecting the agents getting most of the presents.

Mr. Jones asked Mr. Prentiss to specify a particular treaty.

Mr. Prentiss said that, in 1837, the treaty with the Potawatamies promised gold and silver, and was paid, by force, in goods, charged at enormous prices.

Mr. Jones said at the proper time he would convince Mr. P. that he was mistaken; he denied that the law for presents was intended to operate annually.

Mr. Everett insisted on an opposite construction.

Mr. Saltonstall confirmed the view of Mr. Everett, intimating that the provisions of that law were permanent.

Mr. Jones would not yield, and the amendment was negatived.

Mr. Dodge, delegate from Iowa, moved to insert an item of $500 for the hire of a clerk for the superintendent of Indian affairs north of the Missouri river.

Mr. Jones objected on the ground that there was no law for it.

Mr. Dodge mentioned the need of the appropriation, but it was rejected.

Mr. Jones moved to reduce the item for the Cherokee from $30,950 to $14,950; which the committee agreed to: to reduce the item for the Omahas from $2,140 to $1,140; to increase the item for the Ottos and Missourians from $3,440 to $5,640; all of which were agreed to.

The bill having been gone through with, was laid aside to be reported to the house, and the committee took up the bill to defray the expenses of the delegation of the Seminole Indians west of the Mississippi.

No amendment being offered to the bill, the committee next took up the bill for the relief of certain Kickapoo Indians and Black river Indians of Missouri; which was in like manner laid aside.

Mr. Cuddeback moved in effort to get the senate bill for relief from an raft in Red river taken up, but without success.

Mr. Jones moved that the committee rise; which prevailing—the committee rose accordingly, and the bills read a third time in committee were reported to the house, where amendments concurred in, the bills read a third time, passed, and sent to the senate.

The amounts appropriated by these bills are—

For the Indian department and for treaty stipulations $532,280

For support of Seminole Indians 15,000

For support of Kickapoo and removal of Swan and Black river Indians 22,000

Mr. Russell made an effort to get the hour of meeting changed to 10 o'clock, and to set apart two hours on Monday and Tuesday for private bills. The motion requiring two-thirds of the house, voters were called, and the vote stood: ayes 91, nays 34. The rules were suspended to receive the motion. It was received and read.

Mr. Drummond moved to amend it by striking out the clause respecting private bills; on which motion tellers were called, and the vote stood: ayes 36, nays 93. So the amendment was negatived.

The question being then put on the resolution, no quorum voted; when Mr. Wise moved to adjourn; which prevailing, the house adjourned.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The steamer President, which sailed from Liverpool on the 10th Feb. arrived at New York on Wednesday morning, 3d inst., bringing files of foreign papers up to the day of her departure.

By this arrival we have received most important intelligence from China, by the overland mail, and exceedingly interesting and important news from England, to which we refer our readers.

GREAT BRITAIN.

At a council held on the 6th inst. the queen decreed that the name of prince Albert be inserted in all the royal books and seals, and in all churches!

The duke of Wellington was seized with sudden indisposition in the house of lords on the 6th inst. but had so far recovered from his attack as to leave no doubt of his being able shortly to resume his usual habits. His illness was attributed to his exposure to the severity of the weather.

The receipt of New York papers in London by the packet ship Cambridge, with the correspondence between Mr. Fox and Mr. Forsyth, with regard to the arrest of Mr. McLeod, caused much talk and considerable excitement.

The Times predicts the most serious national consequences from this affair, which was brought before parliament on the 5th inst by lord Stanley and the earl of Mountrath.

The former asked lord Palmerston, whether the government had taken any, and if so, what steps, for the protection and liberation of Mr. McLeod!

Lord Palmerston replied that the government had secured certain instructions, but that the conclusion of the correspondence was recent, and that it was impossible to send final instructions, and that he was not prepared at that time to state formally what those instructions were.

The earl of Mountrath asked similar questions of lord Melbourne in the house of lords, to which similar answers were given, stating also that her majesty's ministers would take those measures which in their estimation would be best calculated to secure the safety of her majesty's subjects, and to vindicate the honor of the British empire.

In the course of the debate upon the correspondence between Mr. Fox and Mr. Forsyth, viscount Palmerston said that he rather thought his honorable friend would find in that correspondence that instructions had been given by the American government to Mr. Stevenson to abstain from pressing the subject farther—(hear.) With regard to the letter of Mr. Forsyth, he (viscount Palmerston) begged leave to say that the case stood thus: In the case of the American citizens engaged in invading Canada, the American government disavowed that acts of those citizens, and stated that the British authorities might deal with them as they pleased—(hear.) And that there, and there, were persons concerned in this undertaking who were not in any degree entitled to the protection of the U. States—(hear.) But in the other case they treated the affair of the Caroline as one to be considered as that of the government, and in fact assumed it to be altogether a government transaction, and not to be left upon the responsibility of individuals. Until, therefore, the British government discovered these persons concerned in the destruction of the Caroline, in the same manner as the American government had disavowed their citizens in the other case, he conceived that the American government had adopted an international responsibility the late detraction of Mr. McLeod, and could not, therefore, change their ground upon this question. (Hear, hear.)

Sir R. Peel wished to ask the noble lord a question relating to a matter of fact. He believed that, in the expedition which had been formed for the destruction of the Caroline, certain officers who held commissions in her majesty's army and navy were concerned in that affair, and that some of these officers had, in the execution of the orders which they received, received wounds.

The question he wished to ask was, whether or not her majesty's government had thought proper to award pensions to those officers corresponding in amount with those which were usually granted for wounds received in the regular service of her majesty?

Lord J. Russell said that he was not aware of any pensions having been granted to those officers who were wounded in the expedition against the Caroline.

Mr. O'Connell was sorry that his honorable friend (Mr. Hume), had taken such a course, because he, (Mr. O'C.) thought that on this subject, at all events, there ought to be unanimity of feeling—(hear, hear.) He thought that every citizen should be made to have Mr. McLeod saved, as he had acted under the command of the officers of her majesty's government, and it was in the strict performance of his duty that he had incurred the dangers which he was threatened—(hear, hear.) Whether those orders had been right or wrong, this government was bound to give him every protection possible—(cheers from all parts of the house.)

Mr. Hume said that the noble lord, (Palmerston), had made a speech in substance to the effect, that the noble lord had been put to him by the noble lord, the member for North Lancashire; but he, (Mr. Hume), wished to ask the house to suspend their opinion upon the subject until they had the whole of the papers laid before the house. He had himself a paper in his possession that would explain many things connected with this question, and which, by-the-by, were not exactly consistent with the statement which had just been made. It appeared by the papers which he had in his possession, that in January, 1825, a motion was made in the house of representatives calling upon the president to place upon the table of the house all the papers respecting the Caroline, and also the correspondence which had passed between the government of the United States and the British government on the subject of the destruction of the Caroline.

In consequence of that motion, certain papers were laid upon the table, including the papers of Stevenson, the present minister here from the U. States. These were accompanied by a long letter, dated the 15th of May, 1838, from that gentleman, in which he set forth the burning of the Caroline was characterized by very strong language. He also stated that agreeably to the orders of the president, he had laid before the British government the whole of the evidence relating to the subject, which had been taken upon the spot, and Mr. Stevenson declared he had never been informed that the expedition against the Caroline was authorized or sanctioned by the British government. Now, from May, 1838, the time when the letter had been written, up to this hour, no answer had been given to that letter, nor had any satisfaction been given by the British government upon this subject.

In a letter dated from London, the 2d of July, Mr. Stevenson stated that he had not received any answer upon the subject, and that he did not wish to press the subject further, but if the government of the United States wished him to do so, he prayed to be informed of it. By the statement which had taken place in the house of congress, it appeared that the government of the United States had been ignorant of any information that could be given to suppose that the enterprise against the Caroline had been undertaken by the orders of the British government or by British authority. That he believed was the ground upon which Mr. Forsyth acted as he had done.

He takes his objections, and denies the allegation of Mr. Fox, that neither he, nor her majesty's government made any communication to him, of the authorities of the United States, that the British government had authorized the destruction of the Caroline. He, (Mr. Hume), therefore hoped that no discussion would take place until all the papers connected with the matter were laid before the house. He wished to know what the nature of those communications was with Mr. Stevenson and her majesty's government which had induced him to act as he had done.

On Tuesday, the 8th inst., the debate was resumed, and in the course of it lord Palmerston admitted that the government approved of the burning of the Caroline. The conversation was getting rather warm, when sir Robert Peel interposed by a motion on the affairs of Persia.

The English papers are very bitter on this topic, and the Tories are more insolent than usual.

The general impression in England, even amongst moderate and liberal men, is decidedly against us, and so strong does this national feeling appear, that I believe the government would be warmly supported in a war, however contrary it may be to the real state of Great Britain. However, these speculations are idle; it is to be hoped the affair is already adjusted.

Liverpool cotton market, February 9. In the early part of the week there continued a good demand both from the trade and speculators, and rather better prices were obtained; but since Tuesday the inquiry has been limited, and the market closed heavily, our last quotations being barely supported. The sales of the week amount to 28,300 bales, of which 6,000 American are on speculation, and 200 American for export; and comprise 80 Sea Island at 15d. to 22d. with 20 stained at 9d. to 13d. 6, 100 bales 6d. to 7d.; 1,870 Mobile, Alabama and Tennessee 6d. to 7d.; 16,240 Orleans 6d. to 7d.; 318 Pernambuco, Paraíba, &c. 8d. to 9d.; 110 Bahia and Macao 8d. to 9d.; 250 Maranhão 8d. to 7d.; 100 Pernambuco 7d. to 7d.; 130 Laguayra 7d. to 7d.; 100 Cartagena 5 1/2 d. to 5d.; 66 Egyptian 9d. to 13d. and 1,850 Surat 13d. to 6d. per lb.

The market has been rather quiet to-day, the sales only amounting to 3,000 bales, including 200 Bahia at 8d. to 9d.; 50 Maranhão 8d. to 9d.; 100 Egyptian 10d. to 12d.; 20 Cartagena 8d. to 9d.; 200 Surat 5d. to 5 1/2 d.; the remainder American 6d. to 7d. There is no change in notice in prices. On Saturday 2,000 bales were sold.

Feb. 9. The sales to-day are, 1,000 bales.

FRANCE.

The news from France is not of much interest. The works on the fortifications were carried on with great activity.

Political circles are much agitated by diplomatic notes addressed to the French cabinet by lord Palmerston, in which, it is said, a disavowment is insisted on in strong and unequivocal terms. Mr. Guizot had not replied to these notes, but the compliance of the French government, from the feeling of the chambers, and of the public, was considered to be entirely out of the question.

The fortification bill having passed the chamber of deputies by a large majority, it was surmised there would be a split in the cabinet.

We do not find any important intelligence from either Spain, Portugal, or any other of the states of Europe.

CHINA.

Overland mail from India. By an extraordinary express from Marsabit, news was received at London on the 6th inst. from China, India and Egypt, with dates from Alexandria to January 23, Bombay to January 1st, Calcutta to December 16th, Madras to Nov. 3d, and Canton to October 27th.

The state of affairs in China remain unchanged since the last advices; and gloomy apprehensions as to the final result of the proposed negotiations were entertained. Both in China and India the conduct of admiral Elliot is commended upon in the most entire terms.

The negotiation with the emperor of China does not appear to have made any progress, nor the approach of admiral Elliot to the Chinese capital here, as yet, produced any result, and the dismissal of commissioner Lin from the governorship of Canton, and the appointment, as his successor, of Ke-shan who is commissioned to settle matters, and is supposed to be as much opposed to intercourse with foreigners as the late governor.

Admiral Elliot was still at Chusan, which place had been found extremely unhealthy. Out of 3,650 British troops landed there, only 2,536 were fit for duty, chiefly owing to bad diet and want of fresh meat. The number of deaths is stated at ten per day!

The admiral was expected to leave for Canton about the middle of November. The British naval force consisted of twenty sail of pennants, exclusive of steamers.

Memorial of Lin to the emperor. Lin, in a memorial to the emperor, among other things, confesses his crimes and begs for mercy; at the same time he asks the emperor to be firm in the present emergency, after suffering that the Chinese ought to build ships after European models, and cast cannon, he goes on to say that the English forces at Chusan have been so much bewildered and reduced by death and sickness, they will soon be obliged to evacuate it, and submit. In conclusion, he hints at the probability of difficulties between the English and other nations on account of their interference with the trade of foreign nations, and he considers this favorable for the Chinese.

INDIA. The intelligence from India is generally pacific, and no event had occurred since the last dates of much political importance.

Afghanistan remained tranquil. The news from China and Central Asia was of a satisfactory character.

EGYPT.

From Alexandria we have received the confirmation of the news of the arrival of commodore Napier, empowered by his government to offer the original treaty for the pasha's acceptance, which was immediately agreed to. Two days afterwards a steamer arrived at Alexandria with Meytum bey and admiral Mether on board, who came to claim the fleet, which was to be sent to the 11th ult. and finally sailed for Maroucia on the 21st ult.

AFRICA.

The packet barque Hobart, capt. Parsons, arrived this morning from Monrovia, whence she sailed on the 1st of January, to which date inclusive we have letters and papers.

Capt. Parsons, who is now at our elbow, gives us the most flattering account of the health of the inhabitants and the general prosperity of the colony. The Hobart brings sugar and coffee. Capt. P. says that one coffee tree produced 18lbs. while a fair crop in the West Indies, we are informed is about a pound and a quarter. It is believed that the trees in Africa will average 100 lbs. [N. Y. Com. Adv.]

We learn from the coast of Africa, that all the slave factories had been broken up by the British cruisers.

SOUTH AMERICA.

New Grenada. By the St. Michaela, at New York, the editors of the Courier have received the following intelligence. The whole country of New Grenada is involved in a civil war. Fifteen provinces out of twenty have decreed for a federal government, and have collected and sent troops towards Bogota to compel the central government there to come to terms. The government has concentrated all its forces near Bogota, and is determined not to yield to the wishes of the revolted provinces. Gen. Herran is carrying on the operations for the government, aided by gen. Thomas Gonzalez and gen. Carnamos, two generals. Sineva, col. Gonzalez and others for the provinces. Panama will separate from the rest of New Grenada. [Balt. American.]

Buenos Ayres. Buenos Ayres papers for the 15th December have been received by the editors of the New York Journal of Commerce.

Lavalle had been again defeated on the 26th of November, by the forces of the president of gen. Rosas, having some 1,500 men killed. All his forty, artillery, and 80 wagons were lost, and Lavalle himself escaped with only four companies, abandoning the rest of his army, which scarcely amounts now to 500 men.

Another unsuccessful attempt has been made by the Brazilian government to compromise matters with the insurgents of Rio Grande, who are confident in their own strength, and will make no concessions which does not secure them what they call their rights.

WEST INDIES.

From Mayaguez. A letter dated the 3d of February from this place contains the following additional information.

The entire loss by the fire is estimated to be about two and a half millions, and from 20 to 25,000 tons of coffee had been consumed. The fear that a rebellion among the negroes might break out, is at present entirely suppressed, the strict vigilance observed on the part of all the whites, and the confusion is not by any means as great at present as during the preceding days. The governor general is expected every moment to arrive from the capital, and we have strong hopes that he will forthwith take steps to relieve in some degree the suffering inhabitants of Mayaguez, by abolishing for a length of time to come the duties for our port, also the duties on coffee, &c. which will facilitate to the merchants to rebuild their houses and to recommence business, in which for the present perfect stagnation is created. Lumber above all will undoubtedly enjoy a brisk demand during the year, and we can recommend our friends to shipments of the same, and particularly of p. p. lumber. In the expectation of soon being able to give you a more favorable report of affairs in general here, and to inform you likewise of the revival of business with us, we remain, &c.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

APPOINTMENTS BY PRESIDENT VAN BUREN, by and with the advice and consent of the senate. Philmon Dickinson, to be judge of the United States for the district of New Jersey, in the place of Mahlon Dickinson, resigned.

Peter V. Daniel, of Virginia, to be one of the associate justices of the supreme court of the United States, in the place of Philip P. Barbour, deceased. John V. Mason, of Virginia, to be judge of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, in the place of Peter V. Daniel.

John P. Ketchum, to be collector of the customs for the district of St. Marks, in the territory of Florida, vice Francis S. Beattie, removed.

THE NEW CABINET. We learn from Washington that the nomination of members of the new cabinet, made by president HARRISON, to the U. S. senate, have all been confirmed by that body. The cabinet therefore is thus composed: Secretary of state—DANIEL WEBSTER, of the state of Massachusetts.

Secretary of the treasury—THOMAS EWING, of the state of Ohio.

Secretary of war—JOHN BELL, of the state of Tennessee.

Secretary of the navy—GEORGE E. BADGER, of the state of North Carolina.

Postmaster general—FRANCIS GRANGER, of the state of New York.

Astronomy general—J. J. CRITTENDEN, of the state of Kentucky.

THE INAUGURATION. From the National Intelligencer. The consummation of the great political object of yesterday's interesting proceedings, the election of general Harrison as president of the United States took place yesterday, the glorious fourth of March, by the inauguration of the president at the capitol, preceded by the installation of the vice president, in the presence of an immense multitude of citizens, who had travelled from all parts of the union to witness the imposing and interesting solemnities of the occasion.

For several days previously, the metropolises of the nation had been gradually filling with visitors from the more distant states of the Union. Yesterday and the day previously, the contiguous counties of Maryland and Virginia and the city of Baltimore poured in vast multitudes and parties of citizens, who, either travelling on the various ways by land and water, on foot, in carriages, or in boats, to witness the inauguration of their beloved chief.

It cannot reasonably be expected that we shall lay before the public a very detailed or accurate account of yesterday's interesting proceedings and ceremonies. To satisfy, however, the demand for an early notice, we present the following sketches of the scenes and incidents of the day:

The morning. Early in the morning, long before sunrise, the thrill of the music of the bands, the tramp of feet along Pennsylvania avenue towards the hotels and boarding houses, gave notice that our number of visitors was greatly increasing, and that the auspicious day of the inauguration had arrived. The morning broke somewhat cloudily, and the horizon seemed rather to be between snow or rain. At sun-rise a salute of twenty-six guns was fired from the mall, south of the gun room, by a party of the Columbia artillery, acting under the command of captain Buckingham. Soon after the firing of these guns, the entire body, apparently, of our citizens and numerous visitors, roused from their slumbers, thronged the Pennsylvania avenue and other streets, and were to them a very animated and lively appearance; the throng continuing to increase until eight o'clock, when the various delegations, military companies, Tippecanoe clubs, associations and citizens assembled at their respective positions.

The procession. Soon after ten o'clock the procession moved from the head of Four-and-a-half street; when a salute of three guns announced their march towards the quarters of the president elect. Having there received general HARRISON, attended by his personal friends, the procession moved on from the quarters of the president elect, up K street to 11th street, up 11th street to F street, up F street to the Pennsylvania avenue, to Pennsylvania avenue, down Pennsylvania avenue to the south gate of the eastern yard of the capitol, exactly as laid down in the programme.

Occupying a favorable position in front of Brown's building, we witnessed the procession as it passed along the most public part of Pennsylvania avenue to the capitol. The scene was highly interesting and imposing. The ladies every where, from the windows on each side of the avenue, waved their hands and hats, and testified of their kind feelings, and general HARRISON returned their smiles and greetings with repeated bows.

The enthusiastic cheers of the citizens who moved in the procession were, with equal enthusiasm, responded to by thousands of citizens spectators who lined Pennsylvania avenue, or appeared at the side windows, in the numerous balconies, on the tops of houses, or on other elevated stands. At the head of the procession was the chief marshal, who was mounted on a fine horse, suitably caparisoned; as also were his two aids.

The military portion of the procession was remarkably fine and soldier-like. Much of this, no doubt, was owing to major FITZ, of the Philadelphia National Guards, who, with his volunteer band of music were objects of particular notice and admiration. The military marched along in the following order:

1. The Potomac Dragoons, commanded by captain MERRILL, fine body of cavalry, consisting of thirty citizen soldiers from Georgetown. We never saw the Potomac Dragoons turn out so well, or appear to so great advantage.

2. The Muscular Armistis, commanded by captain KETCHUM. Their revolutionary costume, venerable appearance, and precise movements, as they marched along, with their two field pieces, gained them great credit.

3. The National Guards, of Philadelphia, commanded by major FITZ, fine body of men, well disciplined and soldier-like in all their movements.

4. The Washington Light Infantry, commanded by captain France, a full company, numbering about eighty musketeers, all well uniformed, and showing to more advantage than on any former occasion.

5. The National Blues, commanded by captain Middleton, marching well, and also making a soldier-like appearance.

After the officers and soldiers who fought under general HARRISON came.

The president elect, mounted on a white charger, and accompanied by his suite of personal friends. On his right were seven citizens, ineligible to office, left were the marshal of the District of Columbia and his four aids.

Then followed, in the order of the programme, the delegates of the young men's convention, held at Baltimore, May 1840. The delegates marched along with them in the procession some very handsome banners; as did also the citizens of each state and territory, as they appeared with the respective Tippecanoe clubs and associations. Among the banners which seemed to attract the most particular notice was a very large one from Cayuga county, New York, representing gen. HARRISON in military costume on horseback. Several other very handsome banners, having patriotic and suitable mottoes, were also visible. Some with Virginia and Alabama delegations, and with the delegation from Prince George's county, Maryland. From the latter county the delegation was very numerous and spirited. Besides their handsome and appropriate banners, they exhibited a relief drawn by a splendid white horse, all suitably caparisoned, and bearing bells, containing wearing apparatus, &c. with the operatives working there-with as they moved in the procession. This curious and interesting machinery, which was furnished and directed by Mr. Capron, of the Lunel Factory, Maryland, attracted unusual notice. Along with the Prince George's delegation was also seen a large log cabin, (the emblem of a sturdy yeomanry), drawn by horses; the sides of the cabin had suitable mottoes and inscriptions. On its roof were numerous white flags, bearing the names of the several states that voted in favor of gen. HARRISON.

The Virginia delegations were also remarkable for their numbers, fine appearance, and handsome banners. The delegation from London county had a band of music with them. The delegation from Winchester was very numerous, and had also a band of music.

The corporations of Washington and Georgetown, the Tippecanoe clubs, and the citizens of both places, turned out in great numbers and with suitable distinctions, banners and mottoes. Not the least interesting part of the procession from Georgetown was the long line of Georgetown college students, who appeared in the college uniform, with their faculty, bearing a handsome white silk banner, representing, with various mottoes, a golden eagle with extended wings.

Approaching the capital. The approaches to the capital presented a scene to gratify the eye of a painter, while it swelled the patriot's heart. The thronging crowds, the groups, the soldiers, the banners, and then the stately coach, with its freight of fashion and beauty—all eager, all animated, all in conversation, and some in song—all pressing onward toward one central point, told of the deep, the universal, the heart-stirring interest of the people in THIS PEOPLE'S FRIEND. Here might be seen a little fellow of seven or eight, his chubby cheeks rosy with joy, his bright eye sparkling with the bustle and gladness of an novel scene, waving proudly over his head a little banner, purchased probably by the savings of his pocket money for many days, on which, as the wind sported with it, was turned out to view a "log cabin," or the "hero of Tippecanoe." There was a group of black laborers, tricked out in all their Sunday finery, with sashes, hats, and the like, starting at the people, or gazing at the horse of some young apprentice, caroling along the avenue, at once to the glory and manifest danger of his rider. There hurried along a marshal of the day, with his rose of the law in his hand, and the ladies, too, of the dignity of his station. Here strode on some military officer, glittering in blue and gold, and feeling all the prouder to think that a soldier, as well as a patriot, was to-day to assume the supreme seat of dignity in the republic. The ladies, too, (God bless them!) the ladies shared, fully, in the excitement of the hour: their eyes glancing, their cheeks glowing, and their tongues (for ladies have such things) were in rapid and harmonious motion. Every thing was in its best and loveliest. Every thing you met, every thing you saw, seemed to cry out, "this is the long waited, the long wished-for day of THE INAUGURATION!"

At the capital. In the senate chamber, though reserved for the privileged persons, there was a crowd at an early hour, long before any thing official was to be seen or heard, the ladies' circular gallery on the one hand, and the gentlemen's gallery on the other, were filled to overflowing. What eager looks, what rich and lustrous shawls, what waiting hands, what glittering jewels were to be seen! Nods of recognition, smiles of pleasure, peering looks of eager curiosity every where met the eye. When some full uniformed officer of the army or navy entered the hall, with his straw colored plumes, and his distinguished bearing, he was greeted with a low salute, and a low salute was returned out of many necks, what an exchange of inquiries, what looks of awakened interest pervaded the circle! SCOTT and GAINE, MACOMB and JONES and WOL, presented a brilliant group, calling up associations connected with our past days of glory; while on the opposite side, there could be seen a civil group of no less interest, embracing the nominated members of the new cabinet, inspiring auguries not less cheering of future prosperity and glory.

The senate (convened by the president in extra session) having been called to order by the secretary, the oath of office was, by order of the senate administered by Mr. CLAY to Mr. KING, of Alabama, (on his re-election for a new term), who was then unanimously re-elected president pro Tempore of that body.

Mr. KING thereupon took the chair of the senate.

The DIPLOMATIC corps now entered the hall, and were seated in the rear of the men for them, and on the left of the chair. A most brilliant as-pearance they made, decorated, as they were, not only with the insignia of their various orders, but half covered with the richest embroidery in silver and in gold. Had this group of distinguished personages, however, been stripped of all external decorations, the eye of the most casual observer could not have failed instantly to recognise the marked difference which distinguished them from us, as foreigners. CEVIER might, very possibly, have told, from their heads alone, the different nations from which about this body of highly dignified men to which outward adornments would have added nothing but an alloy.

On the opposite side of the chair appeared, soon after, in the strongest contrast, the array of the judges of the supreme court, in their black robes, with their grave, intellectual, reflecting countenances. There was a stately, quiet, unpretending air about this body of highly dignified men to which outward adornments would have added nothing but an alloy.

The late VICE PRESIDENT and the VICE PRESIDENT-ELECT became the next objects of notice. They advanced together to the steps of the president's chair, when Mr. TYLER, having been presented to the presiding officer, took the oath of office, and then ascending to the chair, which had been vacated for his reception by Mr. KING, delivered, with much grace, dignity and self-possession, an address to the senate of moderate length, marked by modesty, propriety and sound sense; a copy of which will be found in another part of this paper.

The new senators were then successively sworn in, and took their seats.

At twenty minutes past 12 o'clock, the warning note was heard from the table of the VICE PRESIDENT, when gen. HARRISON entered and took the seat prepared for him in front of the senate chamber. His appearance cheerful but composed; his bodily health was manifestly perfect: there was an alertness in his movement which is quite astonishing, considering his advanced age, the multiplied hardships through which his frame has passed, and the fatigues he has lately undergone.

After he had retained his seat for a few minutes, preparations were made for forming the line of procession to the platform prepared for the ceremony of the inauguration, erected over the front of the capitol, at the right of the east front of the capitol. The procession was in the prescribed order, as yesterday announced by authority of the committee of the senate.

It was not without great difficulty and very severe labor that the body of citizens who followed and accompanied this train passed out of the east door of the rotunda; and the inadequate and disproportionate size of that entrance (always a defect at least, if not a deformity) was never more sensibly manifested. Some ladies suffered severely in the pressure of the crowd, but no serious accident is known to have occurred.

On the platform, seats had been provided for the PRESIDENT and the CHIEF JUSTICE, who were placed immediately in front. On their right, were assigned to the diplomatic corps. Behind sat members of both houses of congress, officers of the army and navy, and many distinguished characters now assembled in the city, intermingled with a great company of ladies, who occupied not only the steps in the rear of the platform, but both the broad abutments of stone which support the steps on either side. Temporary balustrades had been placed around those exposed spaces, without which they would have been a very unsafe station, more especially for the ladies.

But the sight which attracted and arrested and filled the eye of all those who were fortunate enough to get a favorable post of observation from which to witness the scene was THE PEOPLE. Sixty rows, they stood, and had stood for hours, in a space before the capitol still extending back some distance into the open square) from thirty to fifty, and even sixty thousand. Happy was the man who could climb upon railing, or post, or pillar, to get a better sight of the great multitude. All such places were filled, up with, with clinging occupants; some ascended the trees in the square, whose branches, in their present denuded condition, afforded an unobstructed prospect. On the verge of the crowd were drawn up carriages, filled with the gentler sex: while here and there peered up a standard bearing a pacific banner, or the stand of colors of some volunteer company.

While patiently waiting for the arrival of the president, the multitude of heads resembled some placid lake, not in a perfect calm, but gently rippled by a passing breeze, its waters in perpetual but gentle motion; but the instant he was seen advancing from the capitol, it suddenly remembered that same lake when a stormy wind, the mountain's breath, or a sunken ship, thrown it into tumultuous agitation, and "flung up its hands on high." A deafening shout went up from the glad hearts and axling voices of an emancipated people. It sung welcome to the man whom the people delight to honor, and must have met, with overwhelming power, the throbbings of his own bosom.

When the uproar had subsided, it was succeeded by the deep stillness of expectation, and the new president forthwith proceeded to read, in accents loud and clear, his address to the nation. Of the character of the paper we forbear now to speak, reserving what we have to say to a more leisure moment. In its delivery, the voice of general HARRISON never flagged, but to the end retained its full and commanding tone. As he touched on successive topics lying near the heart of the people, their sympathy with his sentiments was manifested by shouts which broke forth involuntarily from time to time; and, when the reading of the address was concluded, they were renewed and prolonged without restraint.

Previous to delivering the closing sentences of the address, the oath of office, tendered by the CHIEF JUSTICE, was taken by the PRESIDENT, in tones loud, distinct and solemn, manifesting a due and deep impression of the importance of the act; after which, the president announced the remaining passage of his address.

The pealing cannon then announced to the country that it had a new CHIEF MAGISTRATE. The procession was again formed; and, setting out from the capitol, passed through the city, and proceeded to the mansion of the president, cheered throughout the whole route as gen. HARRISON passed, by the immense crowds on foot which lined the avenue, and the hardly less numerous assembly of females who filled the doors and windows along the whole route.

At the president's house. Nearly the whole throng of visitors accompanied the PRESIDENT to his new abode, and as many as possible entered and paid their personal respects to him. The spacious building, however, could hardly contain a fortiori part of them; so that very many were unable to obtain admission at all. A popular president will on such an occasion always be surrounded by more friends than it is possible for him to receive and recognise individually.

The close of the day was marked by the repetition of salutes from the artillery, the whole city being yet alive with a population of strangers and residents, whom the mildness of the season invited into the open air.

In the evening the several ball rooms and places of amusement were filled with crowds of gentlemen and ladies attracted to this city by the novelty and interest of the great occasion. In the course of the evening, the president of the U. States paid a short visit to each of the assemblies held in honor of the inauguration, and was received with the warmest demonstrations of attachment and respect.

The end of the day was marked, as its progress from the early morning hour had been, by quiet and order, only very remarkable but gratifying, considering the vast crowd of persons, the excitement of the occasion, and the temptations which it offered to undue exultation. No accident or incident whatever occurred, so far as we have heard, to leave a painful pang behind it, or to mar the gratification of the multitude of those who rejoiced in their hearts that they had lived long enough to see this day.

VICE PRESIDENT TYLER. In the U. S. senate, on the 4th instant, the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States having taken the oath of office, and assumed his place as president of the senate, delivered the following address:

SERVICES. Called by the people of the United States to preside over your deliberations, I am proud to withhold the expression of the high estimate I place on the honor which they have conferred upon me. To occupy the seat which has been filled and adorned—to say nothing of my more immediate predecessors by—men of such high character as Gen. CLAY, CLINTON, and a Tompkins—names that, although belonging to the dead, still live in the recollection of a grateful country—is an honor of which any may well have just cause to be proud. But this honor is greatly augmented by the perfect equality among the true character of this body—the high order of moral and intellectual power which has distinguished it in all past time, and which still distinguishes it—by the dignity which has, for the most part marked its proceedings, and, above all, by the important duties which have devolved upon it under the constitution. Here are to be found the immediate representatives of the states, by whose sovereign will the government has been spoken into existence. Here are the members of the confederacy among the members of this confederacy which attests to the smallest state in the union a voice as potential as that of the largest.

To this body is committed, in an eminent degree, the trust of guiding and protecting the institutions handed down to us from our fathers, as well against the waves of popular ad rash impulses on the one hand, as against attempts at executive encroachment on the other. It may properly be regarded as holding the balance between the powers and the people concerned to this government, and the rights reserved to the states and to the people. It is its province to concede what has been granted—to withhold what has been denied—thus, in all its features, exhibiting a true type of the glorious cohesiveness under which it is our happiness to live. Should the spirit of faction—that destructive spirit which recklessly walks over prostrate rights, and tramples laws and constitutions in the dust—ever find an abiding place within this hall, indeed, we should see a sentence of condemnation be issued against the peace and happiness of this people, and their political institutions be made to topple to their foundations. But while this body shall continue to exist, by its frames, it was designed to be, deliberative in its character, unbiased in its course, and independent in its action, then may liberty be regarded as entrenched in safety behind the sacred ramparts of the constitution.

While I occupy this chair, senators, I shall have frequent occasion to invoke your indulgence for my defects, and your charity for my errors. I am but little skilled in parliamentary law, and have been unable to preside over deliberative assemblies. All I can urge in excuse of my efforts is, that I bring with me to this chair an earnest wish to discharge properly its duties, and a fixed determination to preside over your deliberations with entire impartiality.

DIPLOMATIC CORTESY. On the 27th ult. at 3 o'clock, p. m. in accordance with previous arrangement, the members of the diplomatic corps accredited to the government of the United States, were called upon the president to present their united and official respects, on his approaching retirement from office.

Mr. Fox, as the senior of the diplomatic body, delivered an address in their name to the president, which, with the reply, we publish below.

Mr. Fox's address.

Sir: I have the honor to address you in the name of the diplomatic body accredited to the United States of America. We are anxious, sir, to express to you the high respect and esteem which we entertain for your character, as well as the gratitude that we feel personally for the kindness and courtesy we have always received from you. We shall all remember with satisfaction the period during which our respective public duties have placed us in communication with your government; and in now taking leave of you officially, we beg to be allowed to assure you of the sincere interest we shall ever feel for the continued welfare and happiness of yourself and of your family.

The president's reply.

I reciprocate, sir, cordially, the expressions of the respect and esteem which you have made to me in behalf of the members of the diplomatic body accredited to this government.

I would have regretted besides the occurrence of a single circumstance in our official intercourse to interrupt those feelings of mutual respect and personal kindness, the maintenance of which between public functionaries is always agreeable, and which seldom fails to exercise a salutary influence upon the transaction of public business. Your obliging expression has satisfied me that my utmost wishes in this regard have been fully realized, and I derive great pleasure from the conviction.

The members of the diplomatic body will please accept my grateful acknowledgments for the interest they take in the future happiness of myself and family; and I beg them to be assured that I will always cherish a lively solicitude for their individual welfare, and for the welfare of those whose happiness is dependent upon theirs.

PRESENTATION OF FOREIGN MINISTERS. The members of the diplomatic body, now in Washington, and accredited to the government of the United States, were received by the president on the 9th inst. at 2 o'clock. Mr. Fox, the British minister, on being presented by the secretary of state, made to the president the following address:

Sir: I have the honor to address you in the name of the diplomatic body accredited to the United States of America. We hasten, sir, to congratulate you upon your accession to the high office of president of this republic, which the confidence of your fellow citizens has conferred upon you. We speak the true sentiments of our respective governments and countries, in offering this testimony of regard and respect for your person and for your station. We rejoice, sir, to have heard from your own lips, in your inaugural address, the declaration of a virtuous desire to promote the relations of national friendship and peace between the United States and foreign powers; and we are happy to recognize, in your personal character and qualities, the strongest assurance that the efforts of your government will be faithfully directed to accomplish so good and useful a purpose.

To this address the president of the United States made the following reply:

Sir: I receive with great pleasure the congratulations you have been pleased to offer me in the name of the distinguished diplomatic body now present, the representatives of the most powerful and polished nations with whom the republic which has honored me with the office of its chief magistrate has to maintain relations, for ages, interrupted.

The sentiments contained in my late address to my fellow citizens, and to which you have been pleased to advert, are those which will continue to govern my conduct throughout the whole course of my administration. Last night, when I assumed the undivided sovereignty of the country, and stepped immediately from amongst them, I am enabled, with confidence, to say that in thus acting I shall be sustained by their undivided approbation.

The object to which I am now bound by duty and inclination I shall omit nothing in my power to contribute to their own personal happiness and that of the friends whom, on this occasion, you represent, as long as you may continue amongst us.

The signers of the address, with their wives, and the persons attached to their respective missions, were then successively presented to the president. The minister of Russia, we learn, was prevented from being present, by indisposition, which, we are happy to be able to say, is not serious.

COLLECTOR OF N. YORK. The National Intelligencer states that in the senate on the 27th ult. in executive session, a new collector was nominated and appointed to the office of collector of the city of New York. It appears that Jesse Hoyt, esq. resigned, and that John J. Morgan, esq. was, on Saturday, nominated and confirmed in his stead. [Mr. Morgan is a gentleman of highly respectable character, and has been for many years a member of the legislature at long intervals, as a member of congress from the city of New York.] The following article in the N. York Times, of Friday last, may, perhaps, explain some of the causes of this extraordinary occurrence.

"The collector. There have been whispers in Wall street for some days past of a defalcation in the custom house. Whether the circumstances warrant the use of the word defalcation, we cannot say; but certain it is that Mr. Hoyt, the collector, retains in his hands a large amount of money, the produce of seizures and of fees, which he refuses to place to the credit of the government. A correspondence is said to have taken place between the collector and the president, the result of which is understood to be a determination on the part of Mr. Hoyt to resign.

"The grounds upon which Mr. Hoyt reserves the money in question are variously stated. We believe that he claims for himself a large sum for extra services, and as fees properly accruing to the collector, under unparalleled portions of the revenue law of 1796, and another portion as a fund to provide for and against loss in case certain seizures should be held by the government, should be decided to be illegal. The sum total retained by Mr. Hoyt amounts, if we are correctly informed, to about two hundred thousand dollars."

We have reason to know, says the N. Y. American, that there is a misunderstanding between the collector of this port and the accounting officers of the treasury—as to certain charges made by the former in his accounts.

The sum in question is about forty me thousand dollars—a portion of which has actually been distributed to other officers entitled to their shares of forfeitures.

The collector contends that the usage of the treasury and the law are in his favor; the accounting officers, stimulated to unwearied zeal by the exhibition of former remissness in the Swartwout case—insist upon a different construction. Hence the difficulty. There is no pretence of defalcation, but the collector wisely conceals the money, subject to judicial decision.

The New York Standard contains a correspondence between Jesse Hoyt, esq. collector of the port, and the Hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury, from which it appears that the gross amount in dispute between the government and the collector is $48,369 04.

From this sum certain deductions have been made, leaving a net amount of $30,519 83, for which a suit has been commenced against Mr. Hoyt by order of the government.

We publish three of the letters which will explain the details of the case, so far as it is explained by this correspondence.

U. S. district attorney's office, N. York, Feb. 25, 1841.

Sir: In connection with the suit commenced against you and your sureties, by the United States, on your official bond, certain of which you have doubtless received notice by the service of the process issued therein. I have been instructed by the solicitor of the treasury, pursuant to the special direction of the president to the secretary of the treasury, to require you either to pay into court, or to place in some safe deposit in trust, to abide the event of the suit, the amount of the disputed charges in your accounts, as lately audited by the accounting officers; this requisition, however, not extending to certain disputed duties on forfeited goods, nor to the item of $1,350 90, for official expenses of markers.

The gross amount of the disputed items in your accounts, as shown in the documents received by me from the department is $48,369 04

From this sum deduct

1. Amount of disputed duties on forfeited goods, as also appears from those documents $11,498 31

2. Official expenses of markers, 1,350 90

$36,519 83

And the balance, thirty thousand, five hundred and nineteen dollars and eighty three cents, is the sum which I am instructed to require you to pay into court, or to place in some safe deposit mentioned. The requisition I now make; and beg leave to ask to it your immediate attention.

Be pleased to acknowledge the receipt of this letter—and to inform me whether the requisition is complied with, or whether you desire to discuss the forms suggested, you propose to adopt. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Signed, B. F. BUTLER, U. S. district attorney.

To Jesse Hoyt, collector of the port of N. York.

N. York, Feb. 25, 1841.

Sir: Your letter of the 25th instant came to me at so late an hour of the day, that I had not the opportunity to reply to it then; nor have I had the leisure to do so till this moment. You state subjoined to be the suit commenced against me and my sureties by the United States on my official bond, and of which I had doubtless received notice, by the service of the process issued, that you had been instructed, by the special direction of the president to the secretary of the treasury, to require me either to pay into court, or to place in some safe deposit in trust, to abide the event of the suit, the amount of disputed charges in my accounts, as lately audited by the accounting officers. The amount of the deposit required, you also state to be $30,519 83.

In reply to this requisition, I have to say:

1. The suit you refer to was commenced on Saturday, the 26th instant, of which I had notice from the secretary of the treasury, on the 27th inst. I have no bond. I need not say with what surprise that notice came to me, for you will probably appreciate it, when I inform you that my correspondence with the treasury department had not closed, when the process was served upon me. I have not, however, for that proceeding, consider it now closed. It is then quite apparent that, by the legal proceeding referred to, all the mischief has been done me, that the nature of the case was susceptible of producing.

2. It was five days after the commencement of the suit against my sureties, that you called upon me to deposit the sum referred to, without explaining to me the motive for such a request.

If the proposition had been submitted, before the commencement of the suit against the sureties, to make the deposit for the eventual acquittal of the United States and such suit had it been confined, in case of the deposit, to me alone, with the view of leaving the legality of my claim, considerations would then have entered into the question which cannot now arise.

3. The case of calling for a deposit, could in any view I can take of the case, be only beneficial to the sureties of the United States, and as they had, before making such a call, very unexpediently to me, broken off the correspondence, and elected to resort to the legal rights against me and the sure-tion, the perfect responsibility of whom to meet the consequences cannot be doubted, I think I ought to leave the matter in the position the United States have chosen to take of it. By which I mean that, under the views I take of the subject, I decline making the deposit. Very respectfully, (Signed) J. H. Hovey, collector.

To B. F. Butler, esq. U. S. district attorney, N. Y. Treasury department, 27th Feb. 1841.

Sir: I am instructed by the president to inform you that he has accepted your resignation of the office of collector—to take effect agreeable to its tenor, on your being duly notified of the appointment of your successor.

The notice will be given to you by that successor, soon as he is appointed and ready to enter on the duties of the office. Respectfully, (Signed) LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the treasury.

ARMY.

One hundred and eighteen recruits sailed from N. York for Savannah a few days since, under the command of Lieut. William Mock, intended as a reinforcement of the 7th regiment of infantry in Florida.

Florida. The Savannah Republican of the 7th instant supplies the following intelligence, in a letter dated:

Fort Russell, E. F. March 24, 1841.

Gentlemen: I listen to inform you are the express starts for Pliska, of the re-appearance of the Indians this evening at Orange Creek, within three miles of this fort. Lieutenant Alberts, of the 2d regiment of infantry, who was detached from fort Russell some few days since to garrison fort Brooke, about five miles distant, was started about eleven o'clock this morning by hearing the wild cry of the Indian war-who in the direction of fort Russell. Taking with him twenty-four men of his small command, Lieut. A. immediately left fort Brooke, and following the direction of the cries, encountered the Indians in force at Orange Creek hammock, only three miles from fort Russell. On perceiving the Indians, Lieutenant Alberts ordered a heavy fire upon them, which continued for an hour; but as the Indian force continued to increase, numbering about one hundred, and Lieutenant Alberts having fired away his ammunition, he was compelled to retreat back to fort Brooke, bearing with him five of his men severely wounded. Having deposited the wounded in a block house, together with the females of the post, and established a guard with others to fight or slay should the post be attacked during his absence, Lieutenant Alberts again issued to the accompaniment of only seventeen men, with the determination to cut his way through the Indians in order to communicate with Capt. Bannin, the commander of fort Russell.

On arriving once more at Orange creek, the Indians emerged from the hammock and offered Lieut. Alberts battle, in the broad pine barren. That officer, with bravery almost unparalleled, with only seventeen men, again fought the enemy twice an hour, and at times, although lacerated in him, made his way through the whole force of Alex. Tuskegee to the post of fort Russell, losing the greater of five only one man. The commanding officer of fort Russell immediately left in pursuit of the enemy. Our sagacious army doctor brought into the post, 2 killed—1 corporal and 1 private—6 wounded—1 sergeant, 1 corporal and 4 privates—and 1 is missing.

Killed—Corporal Long, Company G, 2d infantry; private Hook, Company H, 2d infantry; sergeant, Company K, 2d infantry; corporal Harford, Company K, privates Holman, Company K; Newton, do. Company K; McQuilling, do.

Missing—Private Alrick. The loss of the enemy cannot be ascertained, as the Indian warriors were seen to drag off their dead and wounded as fast as they fell. Yet my word for it, Alex. Tuskegee, at the head of his hundred warriors, while contemplating the dead and wounded at this moment feels much bitter against Lieut. Alberts and his "scavenger" men.

P. S. No Indian news from Tampa. The Indians came in have not yet gone west.

THE NAVY.

Promotions, by and with the consent of the senate. The following named passed immediate orders to be Lieutenants: Robert E. Hoar, from 17th Dec. 1830. James M. Lockert, from 21st December, 1830. William F. New, from 28th December, 1839.

Wm. H. Brown, Charles Steadfast, William L. Herndon, John P. Parker, John F. Borden, James Allen, Jr., Augustus L. Case, Roger Perry, James

W. Raver, Alexander M. Pennock, B. S. B. Darlington, George F. Emmons, Edward Middleton, Montgomery Lewis, George M. White, William S. Swann, Thomas T. Hunter, A. A. Holcomb, Gust H. Scott, Richard Forrest, Levin Handy, David McDougal, Charles F. McIntosh, James W. Cooke, C. F. M. Spotswood, Henry C. Flagg, Daniel F. Dulany, George L. Selden, William T. Ball, John F. Cretzer, James E. Brown, Charles C. Bartol, John J. B. Walback, Oliver H. Perry, Charles W. Morris, Joshua Humphreys, Richard Backe, Jr., Francis E. Barry, John B. Dale, Stephen De-caur, from February, 1841.

The Worcester, Captain Wilson, of the British brig Worcester, at Halifax 21th ult. fifty days from Annapolis bay, via Matanzas, reports that he spoke, 10th ult. off the Isle of Pines, American frigate Macedonian, Captain Wilkinson, from Norfolk, for Pensacola, which, seeing the Worcester, was in such sickness, took three men on board, and kept in company five days—during which time the surgeon of the frigate was frequently sent on board.

Materials. It is stated that we have at the various navy yards throughout the country, materials for building 20 ships of the line, 40 frigates, and a number of steamers.

The United States ship Marion was adrift and perfectly free from water at Rio Janeiro on the 22d Dec. 1840.

Seizure of the Delaware. The ship John Hale from Boston, arrived here on Saturday, with a draft of 240 seamen, under the command of Lieut. Bruce and Deas, for the United States ship Delaware; and about 30 more arrived on the same day, in charge of John J. Mackay, from Philadelphia, via Baltimore, in the steamer Pocahontas. [Norfolk Herald.]

The steamer Missouri. The United States steam frigate Missouri, building at the Brooklyn navy yard, will be ready for service about the first of July. We understand that her armament will consist of eight ten inch Paixhan guns, two of which are to be placed on swivel carriages on the fore-castle. These destructive guns are considered as effective as a full battery of the largest calibre. Her rigging, which will soon be ready to be placed on board, and in early summer we may see her making her experimental trip. The engines, which are building at Cold Spring, are nearly completed, and will be brought down as soon as the state of the navigation will permit. [N. Y. Standard.]

U. S. frigate Potomac on shore. According to the New York Journal of Commerce, letters from Rio de Janeiro of 8th January, state that the U. S. frigate Potomac was on shore at that place, and that she had been ordered to be placed on the coast, and be got off. Rumors were abroad that she had 12 feet water in her hold.

Letters of the 8th say the accounts relative to the Potomac had been somewhat exaggerated—she was not on shore, and had a pilot on board when the accident happened.

Later. A letter from the U. S. consul at Montevideo, of December 30, states that vessels were sent to her relief from Barraco Ayres and Montevideo, on board of which all the heavy articles were placed, and that on the 24th she was got off "without having sustained the slightest injury."

The U. S. ship Cyclops, arrived at Cadiz December 25th from Malon, and sailed again on the 30th. Capt. Morgan took command of the navy yard at Charleston, on Friday last, and was received with the customary salute.

STATES OF THE UNION.

MAINE.

The legislature has instructed the hon. L. Williams to vote for the repeal of the sub-treasury, for a national bank, for such a revision of the tariff as shall furnish a revenue equal to the expenditures of the government, and afford protection to American industry, and for an equal distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the states.

Special election. Gov. Kent, of Maine, has appointed the third Monday in March to be placed for special election of a member of congress from the Kennebec district, in place of the hon. Geo. Evans, elected United States senator.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Education. The course of speech in the house of representatives on the 28th ult. upon the subject of a reform in the post office department, Mr. Pierce took occasion to refer to the literary character of the state he in part represents, in the following terms:

Mr. P. said he had no intention whatever to reflect on the course of any gentleman. It was not for him to dictate; but when he was importuned from day to day respecting measures in which the people who he had the honor in part to represent were deeply interested—when they were continually asking him why the post office reform was not effected—why their private claims were not considered, he chose to state the true and only reason—on which no gentleman here could gaily or convert.

His people were not a complaining people; but they knew what was just and reasonable, and they usually insisted upon it. He would say a word with regard to New Hampshire, not in a spirit of boasting, but to state the facts, and to state the facts of the weak men and wicked men of buffoon and politicians, whose jaws and standers had found their way into the partisan press under the caption of the "dark corners." That which had drawn upon her reproach was nothing but the distinguished character of which every son of the soil was proud to have him birth should be most proud—the sternness and inflexibility with which she had adhered to her political principles. In war, she had sent forth from her thousand hills more warriors than her proportion of men, with strong hands and stout hearts, to do battle for the common country; and, as their blood upon many a well-fought field, both in the revolution and the late war, would testify, they had not disgraced the land of their nativity. In peace, she called her sons to the ballot-box to stamp the seal of her reprobation upon the miserable dummery of electorshiping shows, and to smite back defiance upon any appeals made to them not supported by truth and justice.

"The dark corners!" She obnoxious to the charge of darkness and ignorance! He would not ask gentlemen to look at the number and condition of her literary institutions of the highest class—at her sixty-three academies, and her colleges, and her higher branches of education were taught by nearly six thousand scholars—at her two thousand common schools, all supported at the public expense, with more than eighty-one thousand pupils at the circumference, that the means of education was brought, as it were, to every man's door—there being a place of public education to every one hundred and thirty inhabitants; but he would state a single fact, ascertained by the late census—it was this: that, with a population of 284,481 souls, there were only 927 persons over 20 years of age, foreigners included, within the limits of the state, who could not both read and write; and on that fact alone he would hold her up in the sunlight of her intelligence. He would not say that persons, but he might safely challenge them from others.

MARSHUSETTS.

Paupers. The secretary of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, has laid before the legislature an abstract of the statistics of the poor in the year 1840. The whole number of persons relieved or supported, during the year, was 14,912. Of these, 4,271 were state paupers. Foreign paupers, 8,175. Of the whole number, 6,587 were made paupers by intemperance in habits or others, more than one half the whole number.

A whig state convention was held at Boston on Tuesday evening last, and John Davis nominated for governor and George Hull for lieutenant governor. Among the resolutions, was the following, complimentary to the hon. Daniel Webster:

Resolved, That as citizens of Massachusetts, we feel bound to express our sincere gratification, that the course of events will place at the head of the new cabinet an eminent citizen of our own commonwealth, whose long public life is illustrated by every act which can mark a patriot, and "in whose hands the prosperity of Massachusetts has not been impaired, nor her honor tarnished," and to whom we now tender this record of the solemn judgment of his constituents.

RHODE ISLAND.

A convention is to be held in Rhode Island on the first Monday in November next, for the purpose of forming a state constitution. This little state has existed since 1662 under the colonial charter granted by Charles II. to the Providence Journal says that the commonwealth has "never enjoyed so favorably thus far, and remarks it was strange that such a charter proclaiming perfect freedom in all "religious concerns," and declaring the colony to be "democratical in its laws," and "in whose hands, should have been granted "by one of our best-gifted and prerogative exacting race of the Stuarts."

Whatever may have been the character of the other Stuarts, Charles the second was neither bigoted nor tyrannical; for he was too careless and fond of pleasure to be either. It is questionable whether or not the "merry monarch" knew the contents of the charter which he signed for the little colony over the water.

The alterations proposed to be made by the convention relate chiefly to a change in the representation, which will increase the number of representatives, and to some new modification of the judiciary. [Bolt. Amer.]

union the lands must be ceded, the other continues the distribution. Without, therefore, going into the great variety of important questions which have been discussed by others relative to the power and expediency of the amendment of the senator from South Carolina, I am compelled to arrive at the conclusion that it is my duty to vote against it; and if it should pass and become a law, and the question should be put to whether the proposition should be accepted by my state, I should have to answer in the negative.

I have now, Mr. President, arrived at that point of the argument when it becomes necessary to discuss the main subject of the proposition, to wit, the proposed amendment of the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN). [Here Mr. MERRICK asked Mr. SMITH to give way for a motion to adjourn. Mr. S. having spoken over an hour and a half, and it being late in the evening, the senate adjourned.]

At the moment of the adjournment, Mr. President, on yesterday, I had arrived at what seemed to me to be the main question before the senate. I had said something about the gradation and pre-emption bills and their kindred subjects. I had attempted to examine some of the provisions of the bill of the senator from South Carolina. I had admitted the importance of the question before us, and I had urged the great utility of the proposition, and the expediency of placing this whole matter on the basis of a judicious compromise. Commencing, therefore, at this point where my remarks were arrested, (for I shall avoid repetition as much as possible), I proceeded to give my views on the question of distribution, in which it will be my purpose to show why it is, in my opinion, entitled to my support, and to answer some of the objections that had been urged against it. The senator from Arkansas, (Mr. SEVEN), alluded to this subject the other day, and I confess I was rather disappointed in his course of remarks: I did expect and I did hope to hear that senator discuss the merits of the proposition. I was anxious to hear his views, for they are usually marked with a strong vein of common sense and practical illustration. The senator, however, declined the argument, and contented himself with saying that the measure was dead, and by telling us that the senator from Missouri (Mr. BAXTER) had said so. Yes, says the senator from Arkansas, the senator from Missouri murdered it as soon as it was introduced. I hope the senator did not mean to charge the malice aforethought, which is constitutive of the crime of technical murder. [Mr. SEVEN said yes, sir.]

Well, Mr. President, I have only to say that malice is essential to constitute a killing murder in the eye of the law, it is not so essential in the composition of a legislator. We should meet the question that is presented to us with calmness and deliberation. I do not say that the senator from Missouri did not so discuss this question: I am merely replying to the remark of the senator from Arkansas.

It so happens that I differ entirely with the senator from Arkansas in the assumption that he has indulged in, that the proposition of distribution is either killed or murdered. Sir, that proposition is not dead, but living; and let me tell senators who think that it is dead, that they will find it not only living, but that it is destined to become the law of the land, and that, too, before many more sessions of congress shall have passed by. It should, in my opinion, long since have been the law. If the bill that was introduced by the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY), and which passed congress during the administration of general Jackson, had become the law, it would have been most valuable measure for the whole union, and especially for my state; and I assure you, sir, that by the benevolence of general Jackson still sustaining him, it was for other reasons than his opposition to the distribution bill. The same measure is now before us, and I shall give it my hearty support; and not like my friend from Arkansas.

I conclude with a more expressive opinion. I desire my state to see the distinct grounds of my support, for I have no sentiment to conceal on this or any other measure.

First. I support the bill because it is the only compromise measure upon which all can unite, and which, with proper provisions, will do ample justice to both the old and the new states. The interest of the new states will be amply protected, and the rights of the old states will be maintained in the distribution of the land. The difficulties spoken of by the senator from South Carolina, as arising from the present system, will be partially obviated, and the voice of discontent between the new states and the old, growing out of the subject, will be silenced in the future. Instead of making the bill expire by its own limitation in a few years, I would make it a part of the permanent land system.

Secondly, I support it as a western measure. Yes, sir, as a western measure; not especially as a measure called for by the hostilities of my state. The west must have been blind to the administration of public affairs for the last few years, who has not seen the tendency of the government to draw the money from the west, through the land offices and import duties, as an expenditure for the support of the government. (Mr. ANDERSON), who addressed the senate the other day upon this point, with great ascension. The noblest stand he took, and the independence with which he announced his views, commended his remarks to the attention of the west. Three years the table of expenditures will show that the expenses of the administration have been $99,895,720.

Thus, in 1838,	$10,427,218

Now, how much of this fund has been expended in the west? how much in the northwest? Let the friends of the northern harbors answer; let the friends of the Cumberland road and the friends to the improvement of the navigation of western rivers answer. Not a dollar of this vast sum was appropriated to the protection of lake commerce; not a dollar to the improvement of the navigation of the state on the road, and the best horses have been lost through the obstruction of the navigation, and the consequent high tariff of tolls at the falls, still remains. The Cumberland road, that great western measure, the construction of which was the subject of the dispute under the administration continued through the subsequent administrations to the present, has been suffered to sink into a state of dilapidation, decay and ruin. I talked the other day with a contractor for carrying the mail in my state on the road, and he told me he would like to abandon his contract at all hazards. He said it would ruin him to try to go on, for the mail was so very heavy that he could carry no passengers; and so soon as the frost was out in the spring, it would be impossible for four of the best horses to be able to travel more than two miles an hour upon it, and even then they would swamp or mire down at the worst places, and have to be raised by rails or levers.

Next, sir, out of four expenditures of nearly one hundred millions of dollars in the last three years, not one dollar could all the entreaties and arguments we could use obtain. I saw the tendency of the doctrines that have held us in our present condition of poverty and distress, and I saw the necessity of a proposition that had been introduced favorable to the western objects which I have named had been voted down, and it was declared by a distinguished senator (Mr. CALHOUN) that our appropriations and our proposition was a waste of money, and appropriate $90,000 to the commencement of a new work at Pensacola, on the Gulf of Mexico; the same senators that voted against the Cumberland road voted for the Pensacola work, it brings on the seaboard. And even at this season, the senator from Illinois (Mr. YOUNG) introduced a bill making a small appropriation to the Cumberland road, and proposed to let it remain on the order without reference, the senator from Alabama (Mr. CLAY) objected, and wished the committee to inquire into the propriety of borrowing money for this road; and yet I am greatly mistaken if the same senator did not vote for the Pensacola appropriation when the government was borrowing money, without ever putting that question to mind.

Thirdly, I support the bill because it is a measure to show the tendency of modern doctrines, and the propriety, on our part, of providing for contingencies. Not that I have any disposition to give up the Cumberland road or the improvement of the navigation of the west, but I am in favor of the consideration of congress so long as I am honored with a seat in this body. I hope, however, to see the Cumberland road provided for in the final adjustment of the land and navigation of these states.

It was originally connected with it, and I shall contend for the continuance of the connexion. By the distribution, at least a portion of the money that is drawn from us will be returned to our people annually. The virtuous industry of these states will be felt in every part of the union, but more especially in the west, which is, by the modern doctrines, in effect, cut off from the participation in the benefits of a national treasury, so far as direct appropriations are concerned. I am speaking for my own state. I know that here also the distribution will be most acceptable to her, circumstances as she is. And as it is in her right, I feel it to be my duty, as her representative, to urge the measure by my vote as well as by my tongue. I have seen the senator from Kentucky introduce his amendment, the senator from Missouri, (Mr. LANS), intimated an intention of moving an amendment to the proposition of distribution, to appropriate the land funds to the navy and national defences exclusively. I suppose he meant the defences of the western frontier, as that subject is near his heart. (Mr. LANS from his seat, said, no, sir; the entire national defences.) The senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) catching at the proposition, but understanding it to be confined to the navy alone, took to his seat, and I think the senator from Ohio took to his seat unanimously, and spoke in strains of eulogy and high commendation of the project. Thus in but carrying out the policy which I have stated has given the government appropriation to sail their revenue; but, sir, as a western senator, I cannot sustain either of these propositions; and let me not be misunderstood: there is no one here who would go further to sustain the nation in all necessary appropriations for these objects; but let the funds from this source not be taken exclusively from the west; let not the door be closed forever to a return to us of some part of the money that is abstracted from us by the continual drain of the public lands upon the pockets of our citizens. I confess that the two propositions coming from the quarter they do, are somewhat alarming to those who hope to see a return to the west of a portion of the proceeds of the public lands. The objects named belong to the general charge; they are not the private property of the west; and then, for, should the time come when our patriotism and devotion to our country shall call upon us in the west to act with our brethren in the defence of our common country, by land or by sea, they have in the past a sufficient guarantee for the future.

Thirdly, I sustain the proposition because a compromise founded upon it will not unsettle the land system, but preserve it in an improved form, while all the different interests represented can harmonize. The distribution bill, which is to be introduced by the senator from S. Carolina will be to unsettle the land system, create the relation of debtor and creditor between the general government and the states, and produce conflicts arising out of our Indian relations.

The distribution bill which is to be introduced by the states will have received public lands for various purposes. The senator from Michigan, (Mr. NONVELL), has repeatedly introduced this subject, claiming, upon equitable principles, that the other new states should have a share of the proceeds of the Ohio, that has received more of the public land than any other new state. This bill will accomplish that object, it it does not exceed it. The 12 1/2 per cent. on the unsold land in Michigan, being over 21,000,000 acres, will give them a share of 2,625,000 acres of the Ohio. Michigan has received 968,759 acres, Ohio has received 1,812,911 acres—difference 873,152 acres; 12 1/2 per cent. or 1-8th of the unsold lands in Michigan would be 2,500,000 acres, while the 12 1/2 per cent. of the 2,000,000 acres unsold in Ohio would be only 250,000 acres. So that the effect of the bill will be entirely favorable to those of the new states that have not received as much of the public lands as Ohio.

These are, briefly, my reasons for supporting the distribution bill. Let us look at the grounds on which senators place their objections to its passage. So far as I have been able to understand them, they are these:

First. The measure is unconstitutional. Secondly, It will retard the settlement of the states by holding up the lands for prices at which they will not readily sell.

Thirdly, It will prevent the states to drain the western soil, and the revenue of the nation, and leave the general government helpless.

Fourthly, It will corrupt the states, and produce prodigality among their citizens.

Fifthly, It will make the states, by abstracting the proceeds of the public lands from the general revenue, to lay additional imposts to meet the deficit.

These, I believe, comprise the principal objections; I have stated them fairly, and I intend, in the progress of the debate, to show the ground on which I deny the constitutionality of the proposed measure; they contend that it is unconstitutional to raise money for the purpose of distributing it among the states, and therefore, inasmuch as the abstraction of the land fund from the revenue of the general government creates a deficit that must be made up by an increase of imposts, it raises the constitutional objection. The view that I entertain of the constitutional question renders it unnecessary for me to examine the grounds on which they contend, to lay a question of grave import, but which, upon a full discussion in congress, was decided in favor of the power upon the question of distributing the surplus revenue, and that decision was approved of by the late president, I feel no disposition to open the argument of the question until the case shall arise making it necessary for me to do so.

I contend that the pre-emption disposition of the proceeds of the public lands, by distributing them among the states according to population, evidenced by their representation in congress, is the most constitutional disposition that can be made of them. It is the faithful discharge of the constitutional duties of congress demands the measure proposed. The land question arose prior to the adoption of the federal constitution; it was a revolutionary measure in its origin; it bears date at a period anterior to that at which the general government had the power of levying imposts on foreign merchandise; and hence it never was connected with that mode of raising revenue. The different states, during the revolutionary war, had contracted debts which the confederation desired to see liquidated, and the states owned large tracts of wild land, Virginia being the largest proprietor, her claim covering the most of the northwestern territory, now Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin. Cessions of these lands were made by the proprietary states to the confederation. That of Virginia, which may be selected to test the question, after ceding her lands, provided for the use to which they should be applied as follows:

"The said lands shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation or federal alliance of the said states, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general revenue of the confederation, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

"The confederation being a mere league of states acting for the benefit of states, accepted of the terms upon the terms, and took upon itself the execution of the trust confided to it. In 1778, after the trust had been accepted by the confederation upon the terms of the deeds of cession, and while the confederation subsisted upon it, the constitution was adopted, in which provision was made for this very property, the eye of the convention evidently being directed to it. The 34 section of the 4th article provides that—

"New states may be admitted by the congress into this union; but no new state shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other state, nor any state be formed by the junction of two or more states, or parts of states, without the consent of the legislative body of the states in which the same shall be formed. The congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular state."

These are people powers conferred and expressly delegated to congress over the entire subject of the public domain, the object of which was clearly to enable the general government to act directly upon the subject matter of the public lands, uncontrolled except by the terms of the constitution, and the previous contracts and engagements of the confederation. These contracts and engagements were expressly recognised by the first clause of the 6th article of the constitution, which declares that "all debts, contracts and engagements entered into before the adoption of this constitution, shall be valid against the U. States under this constitution, as under the confederation." Thus you are the contracts and engagements of the confederation of states under the articles were expressly recognised and protected by the federal constitution. The question then arises, did the cession of the public lands by the states, and the acceptance of them by the confederation under the deed of cession, upon the terms specified, and for the purposes declared, amount in the eye of the confederation, to "engagement," on the part of the confederation, which was obligatory upon it? Can there be any doubt upon this point? If not, then the article of the constitution which I have just read provides for the very purpose, and the object of the confederation, and now are precisely those of the confederation before the change of government and the adoption of the federal constitution. The question then recurs, what were the obligations of the confederation? This question must be decided by the deed of cession, and can be as well answered in the very language used by the parties, to dispose of these lands

"for the use and benefit of such of the U. States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation or federal alliance of the said states, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general exchange and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other purpose whatsoever." I leave the constitutional argument here, having in my own mind still sustained the constitutionality of the disposition proposed of the proceeds of the public lands, by which it would seem to follow that any other disposition, except to make the trust fund more valuable, since the discharge of the revolutionary debts, for which purpose they were ceded, had been a violation of the deed of cession, and consequently an infraction of that section of the constitution which I have read, securing the inviolability of the "contracts" and "engagements" of the confederation.

Now, I would inquire, how do you maintain, under this state of the argument, the grants of lands to the new states, and the distribution of the land fund not covered by the deeds of cession? My answer to the first is, that the clause of the constitution which I have read, giving the power of disposition over the property, and as a trustee confers the power to grant or appropriate one part of the fund to enhance the value of the residue. Such has been the character of all the grants made to the new states. I have introduced these remarks as the other lands have been paid for by the people of all the states, the same people have an undoubted right to a return of their proceeds upon a fair distribution; should they deny this, the bill retard the settlement of the states in which the lands lie, by holding up the price beyond that at which they will readily sell? So it is contended; but it may be answered, that the incorporation of the other principles in the bill, which I have just read, would entirely remove all doubt on the subject. Standing alone, however, it seems to me that the new states have a sufficient guaranty in the fact that the fund is to be distributed, and the disposition of the old states to get possession of their share of the fund will certainly prompt them to accelerate rather than retard the sales. The tendency of the measure, I think, therefore, is the other way, and the new states have no cause for alarm on that score.

Thirdly, it is contended that it will stimulate the states to drain the treasury of all the revenue of the nation, and destroy the general government. This position presents for our consideration matters of great importance, and I trust, of great public interest, and I would speak of it as its importance demands. The political relations of the general government with the state governments, as well as the relation of congress to each, are involved in the argument. The people of the states are interested in the general government, and that we, the congress of the United States, are called upon to protect the federal government against this disposition of the states. Let us begin at the source of power, and see what we are to do.

It is contended that the people of the states are hostile to the people of the federal government, being the identical same people, or that the people of the states are hostile to the federal government, and would destroy it to build up the state governments. Neither of these positions, I humbly conceive, can be maintained. If it were not so, would not that hostility long since have been carried into effect? Is it a controversial point that the federal government only exists at the will of the people of the states? If they not abolish it without even the necessity of resorting to revolution? Should they think proper to do so, let them refuse or omit to appoint senators, or to provide for the election of members of congress, or to elect their representatives in congress. If they do not do so, the point of time of electing either, or to act upon the subject, nor has the executive any greater powers over it, or let them omit to provide for the election of a president by appointing electors, which they may do. If they do not do so, the government, either of these courses, and what becomes of the federal government? The pactament, called the constitution, would still remain, but for all practical purposes it would be as a blank piece of paper. If the people of the states would not do so, violence, without bloodshed, by the mere operation of non-user, until the same people shall think proper to put the machinery in motion. So you see, sir, the people of the states are as to the complicated machinery of our system of government, as the heart is to the human system—its vitality and its power. Let us, sir, pursue the argument, and see what our position is as members of the senate. Are we not the creatures of the different states, created by their power, and the representatives of their will within the provisions of the federal constitution? Does it become us to charge those who delegated us to take seats on this floor, who clothed us with all the powers we possess as senators, to turn upon their creators and charge them with a disposition to destroy the federal government, and claim for ourselves the high prerogative of acting as the exclusive protectors of the federal government against the assault of the states? Can we maintain the position that we hold powers legitimately at war with the rights and interests of our common constituents, the states? Let senators who choose to leave their high grounds maintain them. Our duties are of a two-fold character—while we sustain the federal government and support the federal constitution, we do so as the representatives of the states. Sir, I return to this question, and I would charge them with instructions from the legislatures of their states on this subject of distribution? Let me suppose that the honorable senators from Missouri were instructed, would they turn upon the legislature and charge it with a disposition to destroy the federal government, or would they obey? Suppose the legislature of Alabama should instruct her senators, would they obey? [Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said, no, sir.]—Then the senator would resign, I suppose. [Mr. CLAY, Yes, sir, I would.] I would say, we would get another senator in your place, who would carry out the will of the state, and the operation would merely exchange one senator for another—the principle would be carried out, and the state would triumph. I have introduced these remarks for the purpose of showing that, if the states were so disposed, they have it in their power to arrest the further progress of the operation of the general government without resorting to the supposed course to effect that object. I have introduced these remarks, I repeat, to show that the position of the states are hostile to the general government; when, in fact, nothing is less true: the people of the states are devotedly and patriotically attached to the federal government, and would rather see it destroyed or embarrassed, it they would come to its rescue in the hour of peril and lay down their lives in its defence.

Fourthly, it is argued that it will corrupt the states, and lead to prodigality. This is the position that the people of the states are not competent to manage their own concerns, and that we should act as their guardians—a doctrine that has of late years found its way into congress, and has found numerous adherents. Those who profess a reverence, next to that of holy writ, for democratic doctrines! This is strange democracy. Afraid to trust the people with their own money! And pray, sir, what would you do with it? Leave it in the hands of the people? No, sir, it would be lost, that is the safe deposit. They cannot be corrupted, as a matter of course. Is that the doctrine senators contend for? This is guarding the rights of the people of the states with a vengeance! We have their money, and we are to guard it for them. In answer, you cannot have it; you are not capable of taking care of it; you will become prodigal; let us keep it, we can be trusted; your money will be safely kept or laid out, as we think proper; recollect it is not your money, it is the people's money, and they will take care of it themselves to the trouble of taking care that they are not tempted. Would a course like this comport with our duty to the states? Let senators who approve of it adopt the course, it does not suit me. On the score of prodigality, I know of no state that could not compare itself with the general government for the last four years.

The senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) refers to the deposit of the surplus revenue with the states, and attributes the great rage for speculation and internal improvements to that deposit. Suppose I admit his premises, can he show me that a similar effect would not have been produced by the expenditure of the same sum of money by the general government? I would not say that it would, but I would say that it would be scattered in the air, and not the band that scattered it. But, sir, I cannot let the remarks of the senator pass without further notice. I do not concur with him in the course to which he refers. The removal of the public deposits from the states, and the deposit of them in the hands of the federal government, was a bargain that was made between the government and the local or state banks, that the banks should pay a per cent. on the public deposits, authorising the banks to issue upon them; the circuit of the secretary of the treasury, and the consequent inflation of the currency, produced the effect to which the senator from Missouri alluded, and not the deposit of the surplus with the states.

Fifthly, it is objected that, by abstracting the land fund for distribution, it will become necessary to provide for the deficit by laying imposts. I presume this position is well founded, provided the present imposts shall not be sufficient for an economical administration of public affairs. That it would fall greatly short of the late expenditures I readily admit; but that is no criterion to judge by. If I trust the expenditures hereafter will be brought within economical limits. I hope, in no emergency hereafter, we shall be required to resort to the present policy of treasury, and to the sale of the surplus of the sale of argument, that we shall have to lay imposts duties to make up the deficit of the land fund. Those duties can be laid upon luxuries, such as wines, brandies and milks, articles consumed by the rich, and then only by such persons as choose to pay for them. The great laboring class of society would pay very little of the duty, while they would receive their proportion to the distribution. As a general principle, I see no objection to it; as connected with the obligation of distribution, it would be the true policy in the contingency of which I have spoken. My remarks, Mr. President, will be closed, so far as the laboring class is concerned, with this declaration: I do not anticipate the possibility of arranging this great subject at the present session; but I hope to see the whole matter finally settled at the next session, upon terms of compromise and mutual concession to the people, and the government, and the officers of the general government, and the best interest of the states. The constitution of the United States was based upon a compromise of conflicting opinions. The tariff question, that almost threatened the union, was not settled; and why should not this great land question receive the same blessing?

I would here close my remarks and resume my seat, but the senate must pardon me for noticing the political topic that has been introduced into the discussion. I did hope, Mr. President, when we were assembled here at the present session, that we would, by common consent, exclude from these halls all the political heat that was created in the late political contest. We have all heard enough of it; we need none now of it ever. But in this I have been disappointed. The very title of the bill introduces the log cabin as a political reminiscence calculated to lead to political discussion; indeed, it has no led some of the senators who have addressed you. I did suppose that the charges that have been made in the heated partisan press, that the late presidential election was influenced by stock-jobbing considerations in England, would not have found their way into this august body. But here, again, I have been mistaken. And since the charges have been made, I desire to know what state has been so operated upon. Let the charge be located. For my state and her citizens I repel it. I had seen in the columns of the party press, immediately after the election, that the president, the charge that the election had been carried by fraud. This we had a right to expect, for it is a principle in our nature to attribute our defeat to anything else than a defect in ourselves or our conduct; and, as we have seen in the case of the late election, I thought it but the privilege of the defeated party to excuse themselves, even at the expense of facts and of the feelings of their opponents; but, to my utter astonishment, I saw in the official organ of the administration, that the same state had been there at the time of the election, had heard and seen much, and I now declare to you that I honestly believe there never was a more fair and honest expression of public opinion in the senate than there has at the election the late presidential election. There may have been illegal votes given, and no doubt were, but, if so, I have good reason to believe they were unknown to the judges and inspectors, and were not confined to one side alone.

I am aware that an argument has been based on the fact that there were more votes given in August and November than there were polls assessed in the spring. Admit this to be true, and does it prove that the excess were illegal votes, or that they were all cast on one side? Or may it not rather be attributed to the fact that all the polls were not taken by the assessors in the spring, or that some may have come of age between the time of the assessment and the election? Thus we have the same view of the matter. Add to this the fact that these same assessors accidentally returned "2,235,906 acres of land less than the true amount," and then make the calculation, and you will find that the vote of Indiana does not bear a higher proportion to the population, than an average of other states, and it seems to me that even the official would consent to raise the floor from Indiana, and seek some other point of location. It does not become me to say what was the cause of the defeat of the administration party at the late election. The senator from Arkansas and myself said a few words on that subject at the commencement of my remarks. Still I may be permitted to make I have laid down for the people, that I attribute the result to the fact that those in power lived too far from the people, knew too little of their interest, cared too little for their wishes, treated upon the country obnoxious measures, attempted to oppress the people in power by the application of doctrines with which the great body of the people had no sympathy, and treated with disdain, contempt, slander and abuse, the candidate of their choice.—While the winning republicans have been so destructive. It has proclaimed to the world the power of the ballot-box, and the perpetuity of our glorious form of government.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—34 SESSION.

SENATE.

March 2. Mr. Wall presented the credentials of the hon. Jacob W. Miller, senator elect from New Jersey, from and after the 1st of March next.

The vice president laid before the senate a report of the secretary of the treasury, transmitting information concerning the annual appropriations and expenditures.

Mr. Young moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the same number of the memorials presented by the people called Mormons or "latter day saints," to the senate of the United States of the last session, together with the memorial of the same, and presented in support of the same, be printed for the use of the senate, as have been printed of a document purporting to be the testimony given before the judge of the state of Missouri, in the trial of Joseph Smith and others on the alleged charges of high treason and other crimes against the state.

Mr. Young said that statements had been made in documents presented from the legislature of Missouri, which, if all contained in them was correct, would go to show that these "latter day saints" were very dangerous people. He thought, however, they ought at least to have an opportunity of defending themselves; and they had assured him they would defend their memorial in all its essential points. The government, he believed, had been called on to pay a militia of Missouri for putting down the Mormons.

Mr. Linn must beg leave to interrupt the senator; Missouri never called on the government for any such thing; the senator was entirely mistaken. The proper place for this memorial was the legislature of Missouri, not the senate of the United States. Was the senate to undertake to bring Missouri to bar to answer to the complaint of the Mormons? When their memorial had been presented at a prior session, he had told the senate it was a error, and reflected improperly on the state. It was, however, published to the world; and the statements he had received from the legislature, setting forth all the facts, was also published; and the senate was called on to act upon it.

Mr. Young moved to print the same number of the present document as had been printed of that from the legislature of Missouri.

Mr. Hubbard moved to lay the motion to print on the table. Mr. Young said that the vote stood as follows: yeas 22, nays 12.

Mr. Benton, from the committee on military affairs, in answer to the memorial of the corporate authorities of Baltimore, asking for a suitable fortification for the city of Baltimore, reported the following resolution, closing with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the senate, at the next session of congress, reports of the military and naval condition of the country; showing the fortifications, or other permanent defenses commenced, completed, young, or deemed necessary.

1st. For the northern frontier, from Lake Superior to Passanquoddy bay.

2d. For the maritime frontier from Passanquoddy bay to Cape Florida.

3d. For the gulf frontier, from Cape Florida to the Sabine bay.

4th. For the western frontier, from the Sabine bay to Lake Superior.

Together with a conjectured estimate of the expenses of constructing or completing such works as may not yet have been completed or commenced.

Mr. Benton explained the object of the report; it was to obtain a correct and complete view of the state of the armament of the fortifications, the armories, magazines and foundries, the floating or other military vessels, the military and naval arsenals, docks, naval establishments, &c. that may have been commenced or deemed necessary.

Mr. Benton explained the object of the report; it was to obtain a correct and complete view of the state of the armament of the fortifications, the armories, magazines and foundries, the floating or other military vessels, the military and naval arsenals, docks, naval establishments, &c. that may have been commenced or deemed necessary.

Mr. Benton explained the object of the report; it was to obtain a correct and complete view of the state of the armament of the fortifications, the armories, magazines and foundries, the floating or other military vessels, the military and naval arsenals, docks, naval establishments, &c. that may have been commenced or deemed necessary.

Every thing connected with the defense had gone into a state of dilapidation and decay. He expressed his deep regret that so much precious time should have been lost, and which, he feared, could never be recalled.

Mr. Benton said he would not take up the time of the senate now to answer the arguments of the senator from South Carolina, but he would pledge himself to controvert them all when the matter came up at the next session. He would make no speeches for the galleries.

Mr. Preston apprehended that speeches to the galleries were made from the other side of the house rather than on his.

Mr. Benton said he would lay the subject on the table; which was agreed to.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the house bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for the year 1841.

This bill having been amended in several particulars, which amendments were discussed by Messrs. Henderson, Wright, Anderson, Southard, Prentiss, Preston, Calhoun and others, the amendments were ordered to be printed, and the bill read a third time.

The bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States for 1841 was taken up in committee of the whole, and, after having been amended in several particulars, was ordered to be printed.

The house bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1841, after being amended, and the amendment debated at great length by Messrs. Benton, Pierce, Hubbard, Sevier, Henderson, Wright, Foster, Norrell, Calhoun, White and others, was ordered to be read a third time.

A bill to authorize the issues of patents for certain entries of the public lands, and a bill explanatory of an act supplemental to an act entitled "an act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," approved June 22, 1838, were considered in committee of the whole and ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. Merrick, the bill for chartering the banks for the District of Columbia was taken up and discussed by Messrs. Clay, Adams, and Wright, when Mr. Tappan moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert as an amendment a bill embracing the following features:

Every stockholder shall record his stock in the clerk's office of the district, and the same shall be published every three months in the newspapers of the District; every sale and transfer to be placed on record and published within ten days.

To issue no notes of less than $20, under a penalty of $100.

If specie be refused, enabling any justice to enter judgment with 20 per cent. damage, and cost of suit.

Making the passing of any note by any individual of less than $20, liable to a forfeiture of double the amount of the note.

That if any person shall establish a bank and issue notes as money, without means of redeeming the same, in current coin, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be imprisoned not less than three nor more than ten years.

Mr. Tappan spoke in favor of the principles of his amendment, and against banking generally, until a late hour, when he gave way for motion to go into executive business; after which the senate took a recess.

Evening session. The vice president having called the senate to order, he arose and addressed the senators.

Yesterday I intimated to the senate that I should, some time during the session of this day, feel it my duty to retire from my seat, for the purpose of giving the senate an opportunity of selecting a president-elect. It was a subject of great importance to the 4th of March; and I have selected this moment for that purpose, and to separate the official ties which have existed between myself and the members of this body for the last four years. I have no doubt the property of many of our countrymen on this occasion. What I say, therefore, shall be very brief, because the time would not permit, nor would it be proper for me to give utterance to all that my feelings suggest.

In taking leave of the members of this body, language is inadequate to express the feelings which agitate my bosom. I have been associated with a very great majority of the members of the senate, not only here during the last four years, but during many years in the course of our common country; and it has been my great happiness during that period, whatever diversity of opinion or sentiment has existed between me and my political friends on minor points, or between me and those from whom I differed on points of great magnitude, to know that my personal relations with them have ever been kind and tender. I was elected to the place I occupy by an equal vote of the electoral was like a young man courting a young lady and promising every thing, but after marriage the tone was greatly changed. There was a vast difference between him and our countrymen, even by whigs when they were out, were one thing; when they were in, they would feel matters greatly altered.

As to defending the western frontier, if the committee would sit, Mr. Cross in getting the obstructions removed in Red river, it would do more toward that object than all other things put together. Mr. P. had little doubt we must, eventually, at some time have a war with Great Britain; she would not abandon her occupation of Oregon till compelled by force. We had men and brave ones in abundance; but we needed money, the views of war; when this could be provided, we should soon be ready for a contest with any nation in the world.

Evening session. The committee reassembled at four o'clock, when Mr. Pope resumed and concluded his remarks; and was followed by Messrs. Hand, Jameson, Searles, and others. After various attempts to amend the bill by inserting additional items of appropriation, the committee rose and reported it to the house, with three small amendments, which were agreed to, and the bill was forthwith passed under the operation of the previous question. An effort was made to take up the bill from the senate to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia, pending which the house adjourned.

Tuesday, March 2. Mr. Daly, of Wisconsin, asked leave to introduce the following resolution, which was objected to:

"Resolved, That the hours from twelve to half past two o'clock to-morrow be set apart for the consideration of territorial business."

The motion of Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson, pending last evening, to take up the bill of the senate to extend for two years, with severe restrictions, the charters of the banks of the district of Columbia, was announced from the chair.

A call of the house was ordered; and the roll was called and 146 members answered to their names.

A large quorum being present, further proceedings in the call were dispensed with, and the question was put on the motion that the bill be suspended for the consideration of said bill. The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted as follows: For the suspension 74, against it 71. Two-thirds not voting in the affirmative the question was lost. After the consideration of various private bills, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the military academy for the year 1841. Mr. Hale called the chair of the committee.

Mr. Andrews moved, as a test vote, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; which was promptly rejected without a count. The bill was then properly laid aside.

The house, in committee of the whole, took into consideration the bill reported by the committee of ways and means at the last session, making appropriations for surveys and other purposes.

Various amendments, making appropriations for different objects, were proposed and discussed, and at half past 2 o'clock, the house took the usual recess until 4 o'clock.

Evening session. At 4 o'clock, Mr. Hale resumed the chair, and called the committee to order—several amendments having been offered and discussed, on motion, the committee rose and reported the bill making appropriations for the military academy; and further reported that, on the bill making appropriations for surveys, the committee had come to no conclusion.

The question then came up on the engrossment and third reading of the military academy bill.—And the question being put, it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. Smith, being engrossed, was read a third time, passed and sent to the senate for concurrence.

Mr. Thompson, of Mississippi, asked the house to take up the bill from the senate, to revive and amend an act to appropiate commissions to settle claims to land, under the 14th article of the Cherokee Indian treaty; which being objected to, Mr. Thompson moved to suspend the rules, which was refused.

The house then proceeded, in committee of the whole, to the consideration of the amendments of the senate to the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government; which amendments were severally read, amended and adopted, when at 10 o'clock the house adjourned. Wednesday, March 3. Mr. Daly, of Wisconsin, offered a resolution setting apart this day, from 12 to half past 2 o'clock, for the consideration of territorial business.

The bill from the senate abolishing the office of collector of the customs at Curruck Inlet, North Carolina, was taken up and passed.

Mr. Crawb moved to suspend the rules to take up the bill from the senate to reorganize the judicial circuits of the United States, and there not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended.

The committee then took up the amendments of the senate to the bill making appropriations for the navy, which were read and adopted.

The amendments to the bill making appropriations for the Indian department, &c. were next taken up, which were then taken up and passed.

The amendments to the bill making appropriations for the army was then taken up, and all but one concurred in.

The committee then took up the amendments of Congress to the bill making appropriations for the West Point military academy, which were read and concurred in.

The amendments of the senate to the bill making appropriations for destitute Kickapoo Indians, and for relief of the Swam Creek and Black River Indians, of Michigan, were read and adopted, except that in favor of Clements, Bryan & Co.; which latter amendment was debated until half past two o'clock, when the house took a recess.

At 4 o'clock the chair of the committee of the whole was resumed by Mr. White, of Kentucky.

On motion of Mr. Jones the committee rose and reported on the amendments of the senate to the bills making appropriations for the navy, army and the Indian department and treaty bill, leaving to be hereafter considered, in committee, the amendments of the senate to the bill for the relief of destitute Kickapoo Indians, which was pending when the house adjourned last evening.

And then the amendments of the senate to the bill making appropriations for the Indian department and Indian treaty stipulations were again read and agreed to by the house. And so the bill finally passed the house.

The amendments to the army appropriation bill, were then taken up and concurred in.

The amendments to the West Point military academy were taken up and adopted—and so this bill fell passed the house.

On motion of Mr. Jones the rule which prohibits the presentation to the president on the last day of the session any bill or resolution, so far as respects the several appropriation bills was suspended. Mr. Johnson, from the committee on the judiciary to whom the memorial against the official conduct of Judge Cooke of the western district of the state of New York, reported that there was not just cause for the interposition of the powers of the house against the said Judge, and asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. Curis made an adverse report upon the petition of certain steam navigation companies, praying an alteration of the law of debentures, so that drawbacks of duties may be allowed upon foreign coils consumed on board of steam ships on the high seas, which was ordered to be printed.

The house then again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Lincoln was called to the chair of the committee.

Mr. Evans moved the consideration of the bill to provide for the payment of the militia claims of the state of Maine.

Mr. Furney called for the consideration of the unfinished business of the committee, to wit: the amendments to the senate to the bill making an appropriation for the relief of destitute Kickapoo Indians, &c.

Mr. Wise insisted that these amendments was the business actually before the committee without a question. The chair assented.

Mr. Graves then claimed that the bill making appropriations for surveys and light-house, which was before the committee yesterday, and remained unfinished, took precedence of any thing else.

Much confusion here arose as to precedence of business.

The house at length resumed the consideration of the amendments of the bill making appropriations for the relief of destitute Kickapoo Indians, and for the removal of Swan Creek and Black River Indians.

The question pending was on a proposition to make the amendment of the senate providing for the claim of Bryson, Clements & Co. conform to a proposition submitted by the committee of claims of this house for the settlement of the same case.

Mr. Steady opposed the amendment of the senate unless the amendment of this house was adopted, in which case he would vote for it.

An animating and exciting debate took place on this claim, in which it was advocated by Messrs.

Clark, Brown, of Miss. Leet and Galbraith; and opposed by Messrs. Tillinghast, Wise, Graham, Giddings and Russell.

The question was then put on the amendment of this house to the amendment of the senate—yeas 73, noes 51. So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Wise inquired if any one could tell him who were the actual claimants in this case.

Mr. Steady said it was useless to contend any longer; there were too many claimants within the bar, (laying much emphasis on the last words).

Mr. Wise made the following remarks as to who are the owners of the claim.

Mr. Waterson said there were no persons whatsoever concerned in the claim but those whose names appeared on the face of it—Clements, Bryan & Co.; the Co. was intended to designate Gen. Clements, the brother of the claimant now here.

Mr. Wise asked Mr. W. if he asserted this on his own knowledge, or from information from others? Mr. Waterson. On my own knowledge.

Mr. Wise then read a portion of the report of the committee of claims, stating a suspicion of secret partners.

Mr. Brown, of Tennessee, gave a full statement of the ownership of the claim.

Mr. Clark then asked the question the house had nothing to do with; this question to be decided was to the justice and equity of the claim.

The question was then put to concur in the amendment of the senate: yeas 95, noes, 52. So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Evans then called for the consideration of the bill to provide for the militia claims of the state of Maine.

The question being put on taking up the bill, there appeared: yeas 92, noes 33. So the bill was taken into consideration by the committee.

Having been read, Mr. Darwin proposed to amend, by a provision appropriating $208,618 to pay the militia of Georgia for services rendered in the Indian war. The amendment was adopted.

Mr. Proffit inquired what amount of money was required to pay the militia of Maine; and he wished to know by what authority the militia were called out. He wished the sum to be paid to the limited militia.

Mr. Evans answered that the accounts were not audited, and, consequently, the amount was not ascertained. That Maine had paid about $600,000, but did not expect to get through this bill over $200,000 of the militia of Maine to pay out of her own treasury about $400,000. The troops were called out by the governor of Maine, and not by the United States, as the militia of Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee and other states had been called out. Mr. Evans, then, with great earnestness, advocated the bill.

The bill was then, on motion of Mr. W. Thompson, amended by restricting the sum to $205,000.

Mr. Arlinton then moved an amendment to cover the claims of New Hampshire for militia called out at Indian Stream.

Mr. Smith, of Maine, objected to the amendment as out of order, for the reason that a bill was pending before the house for the same purpose.

The chair said it was substantially the same.

Mr. Arlinton referred to a note accompanying the rule.

Mr. Smith asked if Mr. Arlinton appealed?

Mr. Arlinton appealed, and argued in support of the appeal.

The question was taken, and stood: yeas 50, noes 40. No quorum voting.

Mr. Arlinton insisted that the question should be taken again.

Mr. Thompson argued in favor of the appeal. Mr. Foster took the same ground.

When, the question being put, the decision of the chair was sustained: yeas 72, noes 63.

Mr. Levis then moved an amendment to cover the claim of Alabama for services of militia in the late Creek war.

Mr. Triplett inquired if the claim of Alabama had been presented and reported on by any committee.

Mr. Levis answered, the claim had not been presented or reported on; he had not had an opportunity to present the claim, but the memorial had been in his possession many weeks. The claim he believed to stand upon the same footing as that of Georgia, which had just been decided in.

Mr. Crawb stated that the claim had been presented and referred to the committee on military affairs many weeks ago, but not reported on. The amendment was adopted: yeas 68, noes 53.

Mr. Dodge moved an amendment to cover the claims of the State of Iowa. The amendment of Mr. Dodge was lost.

Mr. Dorning then proposed an amendment to cover claims for the services of militia of Florida.

Mr. Jameson moved an amendment for the benefit of volunteers of Missouri who went to Florida some years ago. The amendments were voted down.

Mr. Evans moved that the committee rise and report the bills acted on.

Mr. White, of Louisiana, insisted on moving an amendment to refund to Louisiana moneys paid by her for her militia serving in the Florida war several years ago. The amendment was rejected.

The bill to refund the duties on the French ship Alexandre was then taken up, read, and ordered to be reported to the house.

The bill of this house concerning tonnage duties on Spanish vessels was then taken up, read, and ordered to be reported to the house.

The committee then rose, and reported their proceedings.

The amendments of the senate to the bill making appropriations for the support of the militia, Ketchikan, Ind., &c. to which the committee of the house reported their agreement, were then again read, and all concurred in, except that for the relief of Clements Bryan, & Co. on this the yeas and nays were taken, and carried: yeas 99, nays 98. So that the bill was finally passed, with Clements Bryan & Co. included in it.

The bill to provide for the payment of the militia claims of the state of Maine then came up. The previous question was then moved and carried.

And the question was put on the amendment making provision for the Georgia militia claims: It was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows: for the amendment 60, against it 69.

The question then was also put on the amendment making provision for the militia claims of Alabama: It was taken by yeas and nays and resulted as follows: for the amendment 41, against it 110.

A motion was made to lay the bill on the table; and the question being put, it was decided to the negative: yeas 72, nays 80.

The question on the third reading of the bill was then put and carried: yeas 92, nays 81. The bill was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. Briggs said he respectfully asked the attention of the house for one moment. His rise to offer the annual tribute of respect to the presiding officer of this house. For that purpose he would send a resolution to the chair, and he hoped it would receive the cordial and unanimous approbation of every gentleman present.

Resolved, That the thanks of this house be presented to the honorable Robert M. T. Hunter for his able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has discharged the duties of the chair during the 26th congress.

This resolution was read, and on the question being put thereon, by Mr. Dringdale, who temporarily occupied the chair, it was agreed to, unanimously.

The rules being suspended for the purpose, the usual resolutions of compensation for messengers, pages and watchmen were moved.

And the previous question being moved—Mr. Barnard sent the following to the table, where it was read, as it might influence the vote on the previous question:

Resolved, That the clerk of this house be directed to furnish to such members of the present house of representatives as have not already received them, such books as were furnished to the members of the last house: provided that this resolution shall not be construed to authorize the reprinting of any of said books.

The resolution having been read, the previous question was seconded, and the motion was put, and the resolutions for compensation to attendants were adopted.

Mr. Chapman moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on a bill to establish an additional land office in Alabama for the sale of Cherokee lands. The motion was rejected.

Mr. Reed called on, and the consideration of the amendments of the senate to the bill concerning navy pensions and half pay.

Mr. Cushing objected to the consideration of the said amendments, on the ground that the amendments and bills recently reported from the committee of the whole of the state of the union had not been definitely acted on, and until they were acted on and disposed of, nothing could be taken up by the house, unless on a suspension of the rules.

The speaker decided in favor of Mr. Reed's motion.

Mr. Cushing appealed, and the speaker's decision was affirmed.

And the question was put on Mr. Reed's motion, and it was lost.

[Note. These amendments were not afterwards considered or acted upon. The bill did not go forward, finally pass—the amendments having remained unacted upon.]

Mr. Wise moved a suspension of the rule to offer a joint resolution to declare that the franking privilege of members of congress who may not be re-elected shall not be cut off by an extra session of congress, but shall extend to the 1st Monday of December after they shall cease to be members.

On the question to suspend there were: yeas 89, nays 34. These not being two-thirds, the question was rejected.

Mr. Graham said that he was desirous of doing an act of justice to the District of Columbia by taking up the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia; this view he moved to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and being taken, resulted as follows: yeas 100, nays 99.

These not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended, nor was the bank bill acted upon at all.

The speaker laid before the house sundry communications from the president of the United States:

1. The opinion of the several attorneys general on the subject of the claims of citizens of the United States on the government of Hayti. 2. All the opinions of the attorneys general and other officers connected with the government, which give instructions to the public laws, not of a temporary character. 3. Papers relative to the recent seizure or swards of our vessels on the African coast or elsewhere by British cruisers, &c. together with communications from consul Trist, at Havago, respecting the slave trade. 4. Papers relating to the sub-treasury. 5. Papers relating to return of state banks. 6. On the canal lands in Ohio. 7. On the subject of emigrants. 8. On horses and other property lost in Indian wars. 9. On the subject of mail routes. 10. On Indian schools in Kentucky. 11. On Indian disbursements. 12. On commerce and navigation. 13. On post office incidental expenses.

Resolutions were here introduced fixing the pay of the keeper of the state of the house, the superintendent of the folding room, and granting pay to the postmaster of the house for extra services; which, after some modifications and explanations, were agreed to.

Mr. Evans asked leave to move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the clerk of this house be directed to furnish to such members of the present house of representatives as have not already received them, such books as were furnished to the members of the last house: provided, That this resolution shall not be construed to authorize the reprinting of any of said books.

The leave was objected to; and the motion was moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to offer the same; and on suspending the rules there were—yeas 114, nays 23. There being two-thirds in favor of the motion, the rules were suspended.

The resolution then came fully before the house, and the previous question was seconded. And the main question, that is, that the resolution do pass? was put by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows: yeas 99, nays 50. And so the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Lincoln, all committees were discharged from the business referred to them.

The bill reported from the committee of the whole to refund the duties improperly collected on the French ship Alexandre, was taken up, read the third time, and passed, and returned to the senate.

On motion of Mr. Krim, the bill from the senate "to amend the act entitled an act to amend the act approved May 13, 1800, entitled an act to amend an act entitled an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," was taken up, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, and returned to the senate.

The resolution from the senate to appoint a joint committee to wait on the president of the United States, and notify him of the approaching close of the session of congress, was taken up, read and agreed to; and Messrs. Vanderpoel and Briggs were appointed the committee on the part of the house.

Mr. Griswold asked leave to move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sergeant-at-arms be directed to settle with the members of congress for the present session of the 26th congress at the rate of per diem; and in case any member has already received more than at that rate, he be directed to refund the same to the sergeant-at-arms, for the use and benefit of the treasury of the United States.

Mr. Dringdale objected.

Mr. Griswold moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to offer the resolution. The motion was rejected.

Mr. Mallory, of New York, from the committee of claims, obtained leave to make report (adverse) on the cases of Hopperell Hebb and Wm. Palma.

Mr. Kemble, from the committee on military affairs, obtained leave to make a report (adverse) on the petition of William Hawkins.

Mr. Leonard asked leave to move a resolution to authorize the members having petitions to present to hand them to the clerk, with the names marked on the back; and directing the clerk to enter such on the journal as were not excluded by any rule of the house; and if any were handed in which were excluded by the rules, to return them at the next session. It was objected.

Mr. Underwood asked that the resolution from the senate in relation to water-rotted hemp be taken up. Mr. Stanley said he had no objection, if the gentleman from Kentucky did not seem to intimate that he intended to have more occasion to complain than heretofore. Mr. Underwood did not mean to make any such insinuation. Mr. Stanley. Then I do not object. The question was put to suspend the rules, in order to take up that subject, and negatived.

Mr. Cushing asked leave to present petitions, which was objected to.

Mr. Leet moved to suspend the rules in order to move a resolution similar, to all respects, to that which Mr. Leonard a few minutes before asked leave to introduce, to authorize members to hand petitions to the clerk. The question was put, but the rules were not suspended.

Mr. Underwood obtained leave to move a resolution fixing the pay of Charles W. Steward for cleaning the hall, attending upon the speaker, &c. The resolution was agreed to.

The speaker laid before the house the following letter:

March 3, 1841.

Sir: Last evening I received notice of my appointment as Justice of the Peace for the district of New Jersey. Therefore I resign my seat as one of the representatives from the state of New Jersey in the 26th congress. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

PH. DICKERSON.

Mr. Proffit objected to receive the letter. Some conversation took place between the speaker and Mr. Proffit and other members, when the speaker withdrew the letter from before the house.

Mr. Olney moved that the rules be suspended to take up the bill from the senate to establish a system of general permanent pre-emption rights in favor of occupants of the public lands.

Mr. Everett moved a call of the house. The yeas and nays were taken on the call; and there appeared for the call, yeas 114, nays 111.

Mr. Vanderpoel, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the president, and inform him that, unless he may have further communications to make to congress, the two houses are about to close the present session by an adjournment, reported that the committee had discharged the duties imposed upon them; that the president answered that he wished the members a safe return to their homes and families.

And then, at 12 o'clock at night, a motion was made that the house do adjourn. And the question being put, it passed in the affirmative.

And thereupon the speaker rose from his chair, and addressed the house as follows:

GENTLEMEN: It is with the deepest sensibility that I rise to return you my grateful acknowledgments for all of your kindness, ere I perform the last official act which is to separate so many of us, perhaps forever. If it is no light thing, under any circumstances, to break up long-standing associations, how much more so must be the resolution with which we part from those who met us in confidence, and take leave of us in kindness!

A consciousness of my own deficiencies forces me to attribute much of the high compliment which you have offered me to that courtesy which relieves and softens our intercourse in the various relations of social and official life. But, may I not, at the same time, ascribe it, in part, to your sense of the duties which I have been governed in the discharge of the duties of my office? If I have not done all that an abler man would have effected, in my station, still it is to be remembered that no other has ever been called to this place so unexpectedly, and under so many circumstances of difficulty and embarrassment. In a nicely-balanced state of parties, and amid scenes of great political excitement, I was selected to execute your highest and most delicate trust, without previous preparation or experience, and with no party to sustain me, other than those friends whom I might make by endeavoring to discharge my duties justly and impartially. I foresee many of the difficulties to which I should be exposed, and if I had consulted my own ease, I perhaps should not have excepted the office, with my view of its duties, and under the circumstances to which I have alluded. Reform. The following is an extract from lord J. Russell's speech on the first night of the session of parliament:

"I will not mislead institutions for abuse, and attack them as if they were vices in our political system. I wish to maintain the institutions of this country, and I wish not to undertake any reform—improvement though it be called—which is incompatible with their institutions. I wish to maintain an established church. I wish to see no hereditary horde of peers—I wish to maintain no hereditary monarchy. If there be any plan proposed which I think hostile to those institutions, they shall have my decided opposition. I do not wish in the least to diminish my views. If there be any plan proposed which, as I think, would tend to a republic—to overturn the church, or to the destruction of the hereditary peerage—I shall, as I have always done, state my sentiments to the house, and explain the ground of my opposition. But if it is not just to countenance the resistance to innovations of this kind—resistance to changes of this nature—with resistance to improvement. I think that, in the present state of this country, the safest improvements will be those which can be gradually carried, without offering disturbance to our political system."

SOUTH AMERICA.

Montevideo and Buenos Ayres. By the brig Susan, ex-A. Lauderman, from Montevideo, the Exchange received the Constitutional, published at Montevideo, and the British Packet, published at Buenos Ayres, on the 25th Dec. The most important news is the account of a hard fought battle between the troops of gov. Rosas and general Lavalle, and the defeat of the latter. We copy the following from the British Packet:

The following letter from an officer in the army has been handed to us by a friend. It contains some interesting particulars:

"Villa de los Ranchos, Dec. 12, 1840.

"My esteemed friend: You will, long before this, have learned the mortal blow we dealt to the miscreant Unitarians, the enemies of the peace of two republics, and the apostates from the cause of America in general, on the field of Quebracho Herrado, the 25th ultimo. The conduct of our gallant chief is beyond all praise, and our commander-in-chief, general Oribe, his second in command, gen. Pacheco, and, indeed, all our officers and brave soldiers covered themselves with immortal glory. We commenced our march from Corondo on the 25th ult. at half past four in the afternoon, traversing a desert which did not afford us even a single drop of water to allay our parching thirst.

On the 26th we came up with the enemy, about 4,000 in number, at Los Quebrachos, 26 leagues from Coronda, and here the battle took place, our army being formed in three divisions with their corresponding reserves, the left commanded by general Pacheco, the centre by col. Costa, and the right by col. Lagos. The action began at half past 11, and at 2 became general—at 5 the enemy's cavalry was in complete dispersion, and the infantry surrendered. The action, Lavalle left the field with about 800 men, but being closely pursued this body likewise dispersed. The pursuit was continued for a great distance and immense slaughter made. The result of the victory is 1,500 men of the enemy killed, among the rest col. Baltar, Toribio Talera, captain Urrutia, Rufino Varela, &c. &c. &c.; 700 prisoners, including the officers and civilians, 2 colors, 6 pieces of artillery, and a great quantity of arms, 75 carts, 3 carriages, a multitude of families a considerable number of horses, all the baggage, correspondence, &c. captured. Our loss including 40 men who died from thirst, does not exceed 130 men.

La Madrid was at a short distance from this place when the action was fought, and here he was joined by Lavalle; but on our approach they precipitately retreated to Cordova. The head quarters of the army is at present here (3 leagues from Cordova), as likewise the Argentine and French commissioners general Mancilla and M. Halay. The latter had an interview with Lavalle, who requested some time to reply to the propositions offered him.

We are waiting for the answer, which is not expected to be satisfactory, in order to give the finishing stroke to the war we have commenced. All this quarter of Cordova has been restored to the federal authority under Manuel Lopez, who is also with us. We have likewise been joined by colonel Mazza and his battalion, who could not come up in time to have a share in the action. Governor Juan Pablo Lopez was also prevented by ill health from attending in person.

La Madrid's force, insignificant as it was, has been completely demoralized by the defeat of Lavalle, his troops having nearly all deserted him.—The only assistance he reckons upon, is Acha with 300 infantry and 150 cavalry, who was on his way to join him from Tucuman.

The army has placed itself in communication with general Aldao and governor Calleson of Sao Luis, so that were the remnants of the enemy ten times as strong as they are they could not stand before us.

Tampico. Passengers arrived last evening who left Tampico on the 14th ult. They were landed at the Balize from the brig Charles Carroll, bound for New York from Tampico.

Business was remarkably dull when they left. A large number arrived from the interior with half a million of dollars, about fifty thousand of which was said to be destined for New Orleans; there was then no vessels there to convey it either.

A rumor was bruited about in Tampico that general Acha was about joining with Canada for the purpose of embracing the federal cause. Every thing was quiet in the interior.

TEXAS.

The Galveston paper of Feb. 4, says: "Congress adjourned on the 4th inst. The private treaty with England guaranteeing peace between Texas and Mexico in 30 days after its ratification, now made, reaches the capital of Mexico; Texas agreeing to pay England, as her part of the debt due Mexico, $1,000,000 in 50 years."

There was an arrival at New Orleans on the 3d, but it brought little or no news. A list of consuls appears in the papers, among which we find the name of Henry H. Williams, consul at Baltimore. Gen. T. J. Green had been appointed minister to England. There was no news from Mexico to be depended upon.

Galveston dates to the 23d ult. were received at New Orleans on the 21th. The news is of but little interest or importance. Every thing was quiet on the western frontier, so far as the Mexicans were concerned. The Indians were making considerable trading and depredating. If the business and future prospects of Texas, the Houston Telegraph says:

"The annual revenue of the country may be safely estimated at one hundred thousand dollars—the amount of the appropriations for the current year is only six hundred thousand dollars. This fact alone is sufficient to dispel all doubt relative to the future credit of the republic, and to inspire complete confidence in the holders of government liabilities. And when we take in view, also, the certainty of an armistice with Mexico; the removal of all apprehension relative to the now enfeebled savage enemy; the late rapid augmentation of the industrial classes of the country, and the extension of its foreign relations, we cannot hesitate to admit that the prospects of this nation are far more encouraging than they have been at any previous period. The flood-tide of prosperity seems to be setting in with an irresistible current."

The dates from Galveston, received at New Orleans, are to the 28th ult. According to the Bulletin, entire tranquility seems to prevail on the Texas frontier. The whole country is represented as improving rapidly. Agriculture is the order of the day. Great preparations are being for the cultivation of cotton. The recent establishment at Galveston and Houston of English mercantile houses, and the prices which are offered, have given a new impulse to the culture of that great staple.

The Galveston papers state that col. Dangerfield has been appointed charge d'affaires to France, judge Webb, minister to Mexico; and gen. Green, charge to England. A gentleman from Austin assures us that gen. Green has not been appointed to England, and that gen. Hamilton will continue to act as minister at the court of St. James.

The new tariff is to take effect on the 1st of April. The highest rate of duty is 45 per cent. in promissory notes, equal to about 8 per cent. for money on the invoice price of merchandise.

Methodical church. We have the minutes of the first conference of the Methodist Episcopal church of Texas, recently held by the rev. bishop Waugh, from which we learn the state of that church in the new republic. The following is the number in society:

EXTRA SESSION. We copy from the National Intelligencer of the 18th inst. the following proclamation of the president of the United States calling an extra session of congress:

By the President of the United States of America, A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, among important and weighty matters, principally arising out of the condition of the revenue and finances of the country, appear to me to call for the consideration of congress at an earlier day than its next annual session, and thus form an extraordinary occasion, such as renders necessary, in my judgment, the convening of the two houses as soon as may be practicable, I do, therefore, by this my proclamation, convene the two houses of congress, to meet in the capitol at the city of Washington, on the last Monday, being the thirty-first day, of May next. And I require the respective senators and representatives of the two houses to assemble, in order to receive such information respecting the state of the union as may be given to them, and to devise and adopt such measures as the good of the country may seem to them, in the exercise of their wisdom and discretion, to require.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed, and signed the name with my hand.

Done at the city of Washington, this seventeenth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, and of the Independence of the United States the sixty-fifth.

W. H. HARRISON.

By the president:

PRESENTATION. Yesterday, at half after two o'clock, his excellency M. A. de Bodisco, the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the emperor of Russia to the United States, accompanied by the secretary of legation, M. DE STOKKES, was presented to the president by the secretary of state.

Mr. Bodisco delivered the following address, to which the president made the following reply:

Address of M. A. de Bodisco.
I have the honor to present myself before you, Mr. President, as the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to his majesty the emperor of all the Russias, to congratulate you upon your elevation of the chief magistracy of the confederation of the United States.

Called by the most flattering suffrages to preside over the destinies of seventeen millions of Americans, you enter, Mr. President, upon the exercise of your high functions at an epoch when all the foreign relations of the United States present themselves under a gratifying aspect, and the assurances that you have, of your own accord, given on the day of your inauguration, afford an additional guaranty for their duration.

I esteem myself happy, Mr. President, to be able to assure you that my august master the emperor desire most sincerely the continuation of the friendly relations so happily established between the Russian and the United States; and all my wishes, Mr. President, will be gratified if, by your amiable concurrence, it shall be reserved for me to draw still closer the bonds of the relation already existing.

I pray you, Mr. President, to be assured that it is my sincere wish to render myself constantly worthy of the esteem of the chief magistracy of the union.

Reply of the president.
I receive, sir, the congratulation which you offer me, in your capacity of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the emperor of all the Russias, upon my election to the presidency of the United States, with great pleasure.

From the epoch which introduced the United States to the world as an independent nation, the most amicable relations have existed between them and the powerful and distinguished monarchs who have successively awayed the sceptre of Russia.

The presidents, my predecessors, acting in behalf and under the authority of the people, their constituents, have been faithful to every proper occasion to confirm and strengthen the friendship so auspiciously commenced, and which a mutuality of interests rendered so desirable to be continued. I assure you, sir, that none of them felt the obligations of the duty more powerfully than I do, and you cannot in language too strong communicate to your august monarch my sentiments on this subject. And permit me to add, that no more acceptable medium of communicating them could have been afforded than that of a personage who has rendered himself so acceptable, as well to the people as to the government of the United States.

[Lat. Int. of 13th.]

INAUGURATION INCIDENTS.

Among the gratifying incidents of inauguration day, was the assemblage of some of the surviving officers and soldiers of the late war, who were placed conspicuously in front of the president in procession, and conducted by gen. Leslie Combs of Kentucky, in the costume of a Kentucky volunteer, and such a one as general Harrison generally wore while commanding on the northwestern frontier.

Tippecanoe, Minnie-wawa, and the Thunders, river Rains and Dudley's defeat, Fort Meigs and Fort Erie, Chippewa, Lundy's lane, Brigravater, Queenstown, &c. were all represented by the few veterans present; a majority of whom bore honorable marks upon their persons of their dangerous proximity to the enemy in war time ago.

After partaking of refreshments at the presidential mansion, they returned to Gadsby's, and took leave of each other in a most feeling manner, after a brief address from gen. Combs. It was to be regretted that the number of all present were not able to remain in time for this noble event. We have been enabled to obtain only the following list:

Gen. James Miller, of Massachusetts; major Jas. G. Camp, of Virginia; col. Cus. S. Clarkson, of Kentucky; col. John McElvain, of Ohio; major J. Thompson, of New York; Col. John M. Pendergast, of Kentucky; Dr. J. Penn, of Va. gen. John Payne, of Kentucky; major John Willock, of Pennsylvania; Richard S. Chinn, esq. of Kentucky; James V. Redden, esq. of Kentucky; capt. John A. Rogers, of Tennessee. [Lat. Int.]

The final adjournment of the great Baltimore convention of whig young men. On Thursday morning the assembled and large numbers from various parts of the union, and took the station assigned them in the procession by the marshal of the day, marched up to the capitol, heard the inaugural address, saw William Henry Harrison invested by the president with the Great Seal of the United States, official powers to officiate as president of the union, accompanied the president to the people's mansion, saw him safely quartered in the white house, and dined. At 8 o'clock, they reassembled at the City Hall, Mr. Horner in the chair; when, after several spirited speeches from Mr. Harvey, of S. Carolina, Mr. Adams, of Massachusetts, Mr. R. S. Elliott, of Pennsylvania, Z. Collins Lee, and Wm. Pitts, of Maryland, Charles Carter Lee, of Virginia, and several others, the convention adjourned rite die, in that spirit of harmony and good feeling which is the best harbinger and surest guaranty of what the young men of the union can and will do, when duty again calls them from their retirement to serve in a similar manner. [Lat. Int.]

Festival of whig editors. From the National Intelligencer. The inauguration of president Harrison, as is well known to our readers, brought together the American citizens to the capitol of the United States. With the whigs of the union, Washington was the pilgrim city, and the multitude thronged there as did the pilgrims of olden time to the holy city. The fourth of March, 1841, was a new day for the people of the United States. The citadel had been besieged for a series of twelve years and they were enclosed within its walls, clinging to their altars and their principles to the last gasp forth in the end the conquerors of the corrupt dynasty, who had held time in view of power, instead of a surrender, discretionary or by force of arms, there was a triumph, and one so complete and astonishing that besieged as well as besiegers were alike amazed at the issue of the contest.

Of the many who came here, and who had done good service to the country, was a number of the editors and proprietors of the whig press of the country. A body of men, who, through their newspapers, were in daily communion with one another, and representing, as it were, the eye and tongue of the nation, were now, for the first time, in the same city, and here for the same purpose, to participate in an event which had been consummated in part through their agency. The gathering of so many of the "press gang" at head quarters was made the occasion of a fraternal meeting. Arrangements were made for the accommodation of the good things prepared by one of the best caterers in the city. The time fixed for the convivial meeting was the evening succeeding the inauguration of president Harrison.

Some forty of the members of the press were present from almost the extremes of the Union. There were editors in attendance from Maine to Missouri, from New Hampshire to Alabama, and from the tops of the Green Mountains to the embryo state of Florida. Old Massachusetts was there, and beside her old Virginia; the Empire state was represented from the great commercial city of the union to the interior of the state. New Jersey was there, represented by one who had been instrumental in rallying the great host at Baltimore in May; the broad and fertile region of the south was there, and beside her a son of the Old North state which had shown herself a bright beacon light in the midst of surrounding darkness. Maryland was there, and Alabama was there. "The Keystone state" was represented from the great capital of the state to its capital from the former, by an adopted son born under the shadow of the old Plymouth rock, and from the latter, but one who had been the first to rescue the tenants of the log cabins from the degradation which the vassals of power would have cast upon them and upon one of the great pioneers to the wilderness of the west.

The representation of the American press would have done credit to any body of men in the land. The oldest editor in the country was there, a man who, forty-two years since, had put the business of the press back, and was now the manager and proprietor of the successor of Washington, to the inauguration of one whom the father of his country had, in the buoyancy of youth, called from the retirement of social life to the hard service of a campaign to the untried and almost unexplored northwest. The seniors and juniors of the press of the country were in attendance, and the combined experience of the few present would, if told and concentrated, have been that of almost five hundred years. Some had been more than two hundred years in the service, and several had labored with pen or type for more than a quarter of a century. Others there were who had grown old and grown poor in the rank; and others who, having done good service, and lost their little all in a profession of their blood, had retired to some seclusion where the laborer was better rewarded for his toil. Others had linked their destiny for good or evil with the public press; and others yet, and younger yet, were fresh and ardent in pursuit of a career in the vast and almost unexplored field, and is one of its greatest attractions. But we must leave the pretense for the play, and our own speech for the speeches of better soldiers in the service.

We found ourselves between seven and eight o'clock seated at a long table covered with a white cloth, the very best of the season, and decorated with all the good taste and beauty of one skilled in the culinary art. At the head of the table, as the presiding officer of the evening, was the mayor of the city, one of the editors of the National Intelligencer, and at the foot of the table was seated a worthy and intelligent colleague in the service, in the person of colonel Stone, of the New York Commercial Advertiser. "The feast of reason and the flow of soul" followed: amid speech, sentiment, and song, mid-night came, and morning too, before a separation could be made, and, in the end, the final parting was as painful as the first meeting had been pleasant.

It would fill a newspaper from the title to the imprint to recount half the good things said upon the occasion. Though a social gathering, and confined to the craft, with no set speeches, and no studied sentiments, there were frequent sallies of wit, displays of eloquence, exhibitions of thought, and promptness of reply and repartee, that would have done honor to any body of men who were invited to it might be to play the orator. Many have doubted whether a speaking man, and a writing man could be concentrated in the same person. The doubt should no longer exist, for we can bear witness that newspaper editors, without practice, are as ready to think and to talk as upon their legs as any class of men, who speak in public by profession. The old hand remarks during the evening were suggested at the moment, from occurrences growing out of the festivity, and from the assembling of so many together upon a similar or grand. There were poets, presents, and poetry, both in prose and verse; bookmakers and dramatic writers of a high reputation and no mean capacity were there, and with a score of distinguished politicians, and men who make a name and fame for themselves, who, independently of the press, would never have been known beyond the place of their birth and labors.

The veterans of the corps told their experience, and a sad experience it was with some whose sentences were sublimed in their toast, and who indicated the press from the attraction which too many would use, abuse and banish. The experience was generally a common experience, and the opinions expressed common opinions, both as to the wrongs inflicted and the proper redress of grievances. Those who spoke of the power of the press spoke of it in no vain boasting, and in the full conviction that the press was rather a curse than a blessing to a people, unless it were more intelligent, responsible and accountable. All regarded it as a potent engine, for good or for evil, and to keep it pure those placed at the helm of this great and speaking power between man and man, and the community at large, should be men of truth and wisdom—men entrusted with the key of knowledge, and accountable to God and the people for the knowledge imparted. A proper self-respect was the true means of exacting respect from others. Coolness, good temper and dignity of character, were spoken of as the great qualifications for man placed as sentinels upon the watch-tower of liberty. It was said, too, and heartily responded to, that those who would proscribe the press should be proscribed. The young should receive, not from other men, but as other men, of the honors and emoluments of office—not merely for the sake of office, but for the sake of justice. Public opinion was wrong, and public opinion should be corrected. The press had been long the mouth-piece of little and mean passions, and should be made to expand and breathe nobility as dangerous to the country as injurious to the press itself. The question, also, was discussed whether public opinion created the press, or the press public opinion? Whether, as the first or second moral power for the world, it was in advance of public sentiment?

We might go on through the evening to the morning festivities, and should close with a very imperfect sketch of a profitable and delightful meeting. Some of the remarks we met with were two of the best of the same profession. We could wish such meetings were more frequent, as well from the social enjoyment derived from them, as from the power they would have to unite in every good cause and purpose of a common feeling and undivided pursuit. We have known each of them sit in part in our absence one from another. Sectional prejudices, state feelings, a difference in institutions, habits of life diversified in their character, and that everlasting exaction of time and labor which keeps us from the very best of our own country, and which, printing office at his domicile, have, in a measure, warped our better judgments. Our meeting here was in the very rally of the national circle, not north nor south, nor east nor west. If we had prejudices against them, how could we, if we had them here, they cannot come with us, after being here, but drinking wine together, with common pleasures and mutual feelings. The more there is of this meeting face to face and eye to eye, the better for the country. The press is, as was expressed in one of the speeches, the connecting link between the people of the nation; and a tremendous engine, as it is, it should be linked together, in no conspiracy for evil, but for the accomplishment of great and holy purposes, in a common bond of union. We remember, then, our common and harmonious festivity, as the members of a family remember those who are bound to them by the strongest ties of affection. If we are inclined heretofore to indulge in asperities, they will be softened by the recollection of the meeting of the whig editors, at Washington, upon the day of the inauguration of our president, and the friends of the United States. If we are ambitious of advancement in our calling, it shall be a generous emulation to excel each other in good works. Our rivalry shall be that of friends placed in positions of responsibility, and accountable, mainly by the position, to make to the public for a correct public sentiment, and more than this, for the perpetuity of our institutions. The press of a country is its conservative principle—necessary to establish, and also capable of keeping a people civilized, humane and virtuous. It is, too, the loudest and the most long-tongued voice of the people. It breathes the spirit of liberty upon the nation, and while it is a terror to evil doers it speaks in a voice of encouragement to the deserving of every age and every calling.

We come now to the sentimental offering, some few of which we have preserved. Of more speeches made, we can, for lack of time say no more than we have said. Of the speakers, it would be out of place to make distinction. For other particulars we refer to the main given below:

By J. B. Chandler. The conductors of the whig press in Washington. Their attention and courtesy to their brethren from other parts, like their discharge of their editorial duties, deserve our warmest thanks.

By Erastus Brooks. An unshackled press: The crushing mass of a free and independent people.

By John L. Carey, of the Baltimore American.—The independence of the press: The press must represent principles and sentiments which exist in the community; its true independence consists in preserving and enforcing such only as are true and good.

Loed is respectably connected in New York, and studied for the ministry, but was expelled from want of moral character. He then studied medicine in Philadelphia, and went to India as surgeon of a merchant vessel; and finally returned to Canada, his native country, with his usual Miscellaneous view in full operation, and has got into this scrape, and nearly got our country into a scrape likewise. We hope, however, that the whole affair may have an auspicious termination, and it will have, if it is discreetly managed. [N. Y. Times.]

THOS. JEFFERSON. The following interesting correspondence has been handed to us for publication, copied from the original deposited in the archives of gen. Tobias E. Stansbury, of Baltimore county. The envelope has the following endorsement:—A Maryland Republican.

TH: JEFFERSON Pr. U. S.
The Honble
The President of the Senate and
The Speaker of the H. of Representatives of Maryland
at Annapolis
WASHINGTON Decem. 10th, 07

Gentlemen
I received some time ago from the President of the Senate, and Speaker of the House of Representatives of Maryland and Address of that Legislature to which, on public consideration, it was thought advisable, that the answer should be deferred. I now ask permission to convey the answer to the Legislature through the same channel, and to tender you the assurance of my high consideration and respect.

TH: JEFFERSON.
The Honble.
The President of the Senate and
The Speaker of the H. of Representatives of Maryland

I received in due season the address of the Legislature of Maryland bearing date this third day of January last, in which, with their approbation of the general course of my administration, they were so good as to express their desire that I would consent to be proposed again to the public voice, on the expiration of my present term of office. Entertaining, as I do, for the Legislature of Maryland the warmest sentiments of high respect which would have prompted an immediate answer, I was certain, nevertheless, they would approve a delay which had for its objects to avoid a premature agitation of the public mind, on a subject so interesting as the election of a chief magistrate.

That I should lay down my charge at the proper period is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully. If some termination to the services of the chief magistrate be not fixed by the constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will in fact, become for life; and history shows how easily that degenerates into inheritance. Believing that a representative government, responsible at short periods of election, is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do so as which shall eventually impair that principle; and I should unwillingly be the person who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office.

Truth also requires me to add, that I am sensible of that decline which advanced years bring on; and, feeling their physical, I ought not to doubt their mental effect. Happy if I am the first to perceive, and to obey the admonition of nature, and to solicit a retreat from cares too great for the wearied faculties of age.

For the approbation which the Legislature of Maryland has been pleased to express of the principles and measures pursued in the management of my magistracy, be it as flattering, thankful, and should I be so fortunate as to carry into effect, the equal approbation and good will of my fellow citizens generally, it will be the comfort of my future days, and will close a service of forty years with the only reward it ever wished.

TH: JEFFERSON.

ARMY.
Col. Harney. The Charleston Mercury says:—"We write great praise to being assured by a distinguished officer just from Florida, that the report of Col. Harney's arrest is utterly untrue."

On the contrary, Col. Harney's conduct has received the marked approbation of the war department, and has been highly commended by general Armstrong himself in general orders read at the head of the troops."

NAVY.
"The Philadelphia Inquirer of Saturday, says:—"We learn that orders have been received at our navy yard, to proceed forthwith to the completion of the present frigate on the stocks, and also immediately to lay the keel of another. This is right. The government cannot be too prompt or active in the work of proper defence."

Commodore Renshaw has been re-ordered to the command of the naval station at Brooklyn. Purser Ramay has been ordered to the sloop-of-war Fairfield.

The broad pennant of commodore Shubrick was yesterday transferred from the Delaware to the U. S. ship of the line Pennsylvania, capt. Skinner.

[Norfolk Beacon March 10.]
It is said that the command of the sloop-of-war Fairfield is to be given to commander McIntosh, and that her destination will be the coast of Africa.

STATES OF THE UNION.

MAINE.
David Bronson, esq. of Anson, has been nominated by the whigs of the Kennebec and Somerset congressional district, for election to the U. States house of representatives, in the place of the hon. George Evans, transferred to the senate.

MASSACHUSETTS.
Governor Davis and lieutenant governor Hull have been nominated for re-election by the whig members of the Massachusetts legislature, and have consented to be candidates. The nominations were unanimous.

Wheat bounty. The secretary of state has published an abstract, showing the amount of bounty allowed for the raising of wheat in this state. By this it appears that the total number of applicants, for the years 1838 and 1840, is 7,184—the number of bushels raised 190,569. By an act passed March 2, 1838, the sum of two dollars was to be allowed to every person who should raise fifteen bushels, and five cents for every additional bushel. The amount allowed for the past two years is $18,477. In addition to this, claims on the raising of 12,273 bushels remain unadjudicated. [Phila. Inq.]

Western rail road. The house of representatives on Monday, 14th inst. of 19 to 8, passed a bill to aid the western rail road. It grants $700,000 to the same in aid of the same, and also the same in labor into cash, as a further aid to the road, provided the stockholders pay in $800,000, or twenty dollars upon each share now selling in the market at $18 for $100 paid, and also give the state full power to suspend the operations thereon, allowing five state directors, instead of four as at present.

Past day. Governor Davis, has appointed Thursday, the 8th day of April, as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer, in that commonwealth.

Message from the senate. Sir: I have transmitted to the house of representatives, for the consideration and use of both houses, a copy of certain resolutions of the legislature of Connecticut, "requesting the senators and representatives of that state in congress, to resist by all constitutional means every attempt to destroy or impair the protective policy of our government, and to use their exertions to procure the passage of such laws as will effectually protect the labor of this country from the policy and legislation of foreign governments;" and also certain resolutions of the legislature of Alabama, upon the same subject.

This is unquestionably a topic of great interest, and deserves the most careful and deliberate consideration. If, however, it is examined with the candor and patriotism its importance merits, it will be found that a wider difference of opinion here prevails than either facts or experience will justify. The controversy when disconnected from the complex and imposing circumstances which surround it, may be readily understood.

The question is generally debated and argued as if it were a matter regarding only the price of goods, while this is obviously but a subordinate element of the controversy. Revenue must be raised, at all admit, but there is a difference of opinion as to the amount and manner of raising it; because if assessed in the form of duties upon foreign merchandise, it is believed to have a serious influence on domestic industry. Many of the growers of cotton contend for the least amount that will subserve the most urgent and indispensable necessities of the government,—and the leading object appears to be to prevent the importation of foreign cottons. This policy, if carried out, would distribute this amount so as to give the least possible aid to manufacturing and mechanical labor, because favoring rival domestic productions is believed to diminish importations.

Another view of this policy is to encourage importations because a greater demand is supposed to be therby created for cotton, and the growth to be stimulated. It thus obviously terminates in the encouragement of a domestic business, and resolves itself into the same principle which influences all the producing classes who desire aid from the regulation of foreign trade. In pursuit of this object, many of the growers of cotton represent that they are the great exporting interest, and for that reason, insist as a right upon a policy that shall promote their prosperity. It is not, however, the exporting, but the importing trade that they would regulate for this purpose. In this, they have no the greater, or more immediate interest, than all the country—for all the country are consumers, and the burden of duties (as far as there is any) fall upon the consumer; indeed, if there were no consumers of foreign merchandise but the growers of cotton, it would be the same as if they were a very limited, and consequently the homeward trade comparatively small. It is difficult therefore to perceive the justice of such a claim, or to discover any grounds upon which it can rest for special favor, or any reason why the protective duties should be more considered in regulating foreign trade, than any other great interest.

If we assume the position that the more goods we import, the more cotton we shall export, and therefore we must encourage the importation of foreign goods, such a condition would such a policy bring us, if carried out? We should either derive most of our supplies, which are not produced by cultivating the soil, from foreign workshops, or should be compelled to work at the rate of wages which prevails in old and more populous countries. This is the inevitable result, for the planter of cotton finds a certain market abroad for his staple, while other agriculturists do not, and the assumption that the demand for cotton will increase as importations increase, is founded on the supposition that other produce will find little demand in the regions from which imports are chiefly derived, and therefore the cotton trade will reap the principal advantage. This view of public policy embraces but one interest, and looks only to the encouragement of that branch of American industry. The other great branches of agricultural industry, having no markets abroad capable of taking up the surplus of their productions, are forced upon the necessity of creating them at home, by diverting the labor of the soil to manufactures. The farmer wants to be supplied by diversity of occupation.

To accomplish this object, a policy, which is, in some extent, the opposite of that of the cotton grower has been deemed wise and expedient. The object has been to encourage the diversified production of certain articles, instead of importation, rather to encourage our own laborers, instead of resorting to the shops and manufactures of foreign countries. While this policy like that of the cotton grower, has for its end the encouragement of domestic industry, it seeks to accomplish its end by the regulation of foreign trade. But instead of aiming at the direct increase of importations, it seeks aid from a discrimination in the assessment of duties upon imports, which shall enable the manufacturer and mechanic, upon the principle thus afforded, to bring the produce of their labor into the market on favorable terms, against imported articles of the same description. It thus appears that both parties seek the enlargement of domestic production, through the regulation of foreign trade; but the general policy of those who advocate the increase of the agriculturists who are not connected with cotton, by discouraging manufactures and the mechanic trades; while that of the other tends to strengthen and invigorate the diversified pursuits of labor.

The question here arises, are these great interests irreconcilable, and must the one or the other policy be pursued, regardless of all other considerations? I have neither time, nor is this a fit occasion, to discuss the question; but it may be permitted to remark, that the fortunes of the country do not appear to rest upon any such alternative. If the policy which is opposed to diversity of employment, could be carried out in its fullest extent, it would end in paralyzing and impoverishing the country, involving those who advocate it in the common calamity. If their exports depend upon the amount of imports, these must in turn depend upon the ability of the population to consume, and the imports cannot exceed that ability. The advocates of the importation policy, therefore, a great interest in sustaining the common prosperity of the whole country, as that alone is capable of sustaining their policy. Labor, as now divided, acts upon, and restrains, to some extent, a portion only of the arable empire; but still diversity of employment is the best method of increasing it, and becoming the consumers of foreign products, as well as of raw cotton.

Whatever may be the objects of such a change in policy, there can be no misapprehension about the effect, for it must operate unfavorably to a division of labor, by discouraging manufacturing and mechanical pursuits; and I am not able to perceive any thing which can recommend such a change, unless it be desirable to substitute foreign for domestic productions. There may be those who believe the aggregate of importations will be increased by diminishing domestic productions; but even this may be well doubted, for we must consider whether it will not be as likely to impair the general ability to consume, as to increase importations.

Have we then reached a point when expediency or public policy requires us to put at hazard the great interests of the country, by adopting a change of policy which promises nothing but evil? There would seem to be but one possible contingency from which the growers of cotton can reap advantage from it, and that is by increasing importations. But they, as well as others, must perceive that this result can be obtained only at the expense of domestic labor, by diminishing domestic production. There is little probability that any advantage will accrue in this manner; or that there will be any equivalent to any interest for the sacrifice. The change can bring nothing with it to recommend it to us, and while it may be less injurious to others, it will probably bring no positive good to any. The revenue must be raised; and it is difficult to comprehend how any well founded objection can exist to a discrimination in the assessment so as to favor the great laboring classes; unless it is desirable to check their prosperity by diminishing their business. The amount raised by either process is the same; but if one method is beneficial, and the other injurious, we ought to find no difficulty in choosing between them.

This is a matter for grave consideration, and ought to be approached with candor and a conciliatory temper on all sides; and may we not feel a strong assurance that if it is so examined, it will not be passed upon the country. It is worth while to inquire whether, if it should eventually become the law of the land, it will not put at hazard our best interests, and excite an unprofitable agitation of the public mind. It is manifest, that in assessing the revenue, all the great interest should be considered, embraced and harmonized in the policy. This may be accomplished by a just discrimination, favoring all the great interests that are promoted by a division of labor, and without raising unnecessary revenue or resorting to high duties. This course is so free from well founded objections, and is so obviously the only one that will be likely to harmonize public opinion, and give tranquility to the public mind, that I trust it will meet with the approbation of those whose duty it is to adjust this question. The only question at issue is a choice between a fair and just discrimination and a horizontal level of duties by which the same amount is imposed on all articles, and the reasons in favor of the principle of discrimination seems to be decisive.

JOHN DAVIS.

Council chamber, Feb. 27th, 1841.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Election. From the returns that have come in of the election held in this State on Tuesday last, it is pretty evident that the entire democratic ticket for congress and state officers has been elected by a majority equal to that of the November election.

NEW YORK.

Free banks. A panic exists in this state respecting the free banks. We find the following article on the subject in the Albany Argus:

"Red Back" associations. The panic in relation to "red back" notes which has pervaded the public mind for several days, may be said to have reached a crisis yesterday. Down to Monday inclusive, 13 of these institutions had stopped payment, viz:

Millers' bank of Clyde.
Farmers' bank of Seneca county.
Tonawanda bank.
N. Y. city trust and banking co. (frud)
Tenth Ward bank, N. Y.
Chelsea bank.
Staten Island bank.
Washington bank.
Erie County bank, Buffalo.
Union bank.
Bank of Western N. Y. Rochester.
Farmers' and Mechanics' bank, Batavia.
Binghamton bank.

On Wednesday, the following were thrown out by the agents in this city, viz:
Bank of America, Buffalo.
Merchants' Exchange, "

And finally yesterday, the explosion became general, and the agents threw out the following:

Mechanics' bank of Buffalo.

United States "

Phoenix bank "

Bank Commerce "

Bank of Brockport.

Cattaraugus County bank.

Bank of Lodi.

St. Lawrence bank.

The two latter banks, it is supposed, will furnish their agents with funds to go on and keep up their redemptions in a short time; the officers and some of the stockholders of the St. Lawrence bank particularly, being among the most wealthy citizens of St. Lawrence county.

The Commercial bank of Oswego, (safely fund), we understand, has been relieved in small amounts; but such amounts as were sent in by banks to the agency, were refused.

The panic has burst so suddenly upon the agencies of the associations, that the bands placed with them were exhausted before they could arrange to meet such an extraordinary demand.

By a singular, if not an inadvisable construction of the law, by the late comptroller, (Mr. Cooke), preference has been given in the redemptions from the deposits in his hands to those who were the first to appear with their protests.

Yesterday, a bill was passed through both branches of the legislature, and waits only the signature of the governor to become a law, providing that the circulating notes be paid pro rata.

The comptroller has put forth an official document in reference to these banks, which has the effect of placing more confidence in them. The report gives the circulation and securities of each of the banks. In no case does the circulation at all approach the amount given in security, and although the stocks which form the main pledge of redemption are much depreciated, there is no good reason to doubt the ability of the banks to meet their liabilities. Many of the securities are in bond and mortgages—the amount varying from $14,000 to nearly $100,000 for each bank.

The Heidelberg, or patron war, which created so much fuss fifteen months since, is to be renewed, it seems. The year past, the bank has recovered judgment against its tenants for rent justly due him. Executions have been levied, but an open resistance is threatened by the Heidelbergers, and the sheriffs as yet stand in awe of the "quatern." The affair seems to become a serious one, and if much blood is not shed, much ink assuredly will be.

Statistics. In compliance with a resolution of the assembly, the clerk of that body submitted to the house a detailed statement of the returns of the census of the state, as obtained from the marshals of the northern and southern districts. The same has been printed, by order of the house, and makes a pamphlet of 80 pages, large 8vo. Some of the footings are annexed. "It is proper to say," remarks the clerk in an accompanying note, "that these aggregate figures are taken from the footings of the deputy and assistant marshals who were employed to take the census, and may not in all cases be entirely correct. These footings are now undergoing a careful revision in the department of state at Washington, which possibly may vary the results in some instances; but it is believed that the errors will be few and of but trifling importance."

Common schools. By the late report of the superintendent of common schools in the state of New York, it appears that there are 10,760 school districts in that commonwealth. This number shows an increase of sixty-three since the report of the preceding year. The number of children in the state over five and under sixteen years of age, exclusive of the city of New York, was 592,864 at the close of the year 1839. The number of children instructed in the common schools during the year was 572,995.
The superintendent remarks: "It is a subject of congratulation that so many children of the republic have had the school-room opened to them; and although it may not have afforded the high degree of instruction which may be desirable, yet much is gained by giving the opportunity of learning something. They have acquired the elements; the good seed is sown; and matured by general instruction, it will germinate and grow and expand, even by its own force. What is thus obtained can never be lost; and it furnishes the foundation for advancement and progress by the gradually improving standard of education."
The productive capital of the common school fund in the state of New York amounted to $2,033,407. It is the revenue arising from upwards of three millions and a half of the surplus revenue of the United States deposited in the state treasury in 1837. The school fund thus far has the benefit of the revenue yielded by a capital of more than $2,000,000. The average pay of teachers in the common schools is $18 per month. The schools are kept open, on an average, eight months in the year.
The opinion is expressed by the superintendent that it is not best in the schools entirely to be left by leaving a small portion of the expense to be paid by the inhabitants of each district, greater attention is secured to the good management of the schools. The amount raised by supervisors in the districts during the year 1839 was $214,747.

NEW JERSEY.
The legislature adjourned sine die on the 12th instant.
A state tax of $30,000 is deemed necessary for this year, and was laid. The state prints in so much need of its available means, as to require, in the estimation of the keeper and inspectors, a cash advance of 5,000 dollars, to keep it in successful gait. The manufacturers will not sell.
The People's bank at Paterson, has been re-chartered.
The bill of Mr. Sutphen, to impose further restrictions on the banks of the state, and to punish the suspended banks, has failed by a close vote.
We understand that George P. Moleston, esq. of New Brunswick, was yesterday elected attorney general of the state, vice Field, resigned, and Daniel Elmer, of Cumberland, judge of the supreme court, vice Dayton, resigned.
PENNSYLVANIA.
Education. There were 282,410 pupils in the different literary institutions of Pennsylvania during the past year. Of this number, 1,889 pupils are in colleges and universities; 1,430 in female seminaries; 2,465 in academies; 21,968 in the public schools of Philadelphia, and 254,908 in the common schools throughout the state.
One term. The joint resolution to amend the constitution of Pennsylvania, as to provide that the governor shall serve but one term in a period of nine years, passed a third reading in the senate of the state, on Monday, by a vote of 19 to 5.
The hon. John Banks, of Reading, has been unanimously nominated as the whig candidate for governor of Pennsylvania, by the state convention which met at Harrisburg on the 10th inst.

MARYLAND.

Extra session. Proclamation of gov. Grason, calling an extra session of the legislature. Warrens. The senate and house of delegates have declared, by their joint resolution of the fifth inst. that the time to which their session was then limited, was not sufficient to enable them "to transact the important business entrusted to their charge," and have requested me to convene them "at the earliest convenient day after the 15th of April next."

And whereas, the senate and house of delegates have the best means of forming a correct judgment in relation to the importance of the business under their consideration, and to the necessity of having further time to act upon it:

And whereas, it is desirable that questions of so much interest to the state as to require a special call of the legislature, should be settled without unnecessary delay:

I do therefore convene the general assembly of Maryland, in compliance with the request contained in the resolution aforesaid, and do accordingly give notice to the members of the legislature of the session of the legislature on Wednesday the 24th day of the present month, for the purpose of transacting such business as in their judgment the public interest may seem to require.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the state, this 15th day of March, in the [L. A.] year one thousand eight hundred and forty-one.

WM. GRASON.

By the governor, J. MURRAY, secretary of state.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The Raleigh Register of Tuesday says: Our banks have again suspended the payment of their liabilities in specie. They have been compelled to do this course because their credits with foreign banks from Philadelphia to this city, have become wholly unavailable for specie purposes. Hitherto, a draft on a Virginia or Philadelphia bank has answered the same purpose as specie, and our banks have thus been strengthened in their ability to meet their responsibilities; but now their checks on the Virginia and more northern banks, being paid in current notes only, they are no longer available as specie payments.

In republishing the foregoing paragraph, the Richmond Compiler of Thursday adds:

Our banks stand now pretty much alone. If they can continue to pay specie while there is no place where they can draw specie to restore that they pay out, and what is worse, exchange with New York per cent, against us—and render the proper aid to trade at the same time, they will do wonders.

ALABAMA.

The electoral vote. As we assisted to circulate the statement that the vote of Alabama would be cast out by congress, on account of the manner in which it was given, it becomes proper that we tell how the electors repaired their error, and saved the vote of the state. It is true, as we stated at the time, that in their public convention in the hall of the house of representatives, the electors voted vice no; but, at a private meeting in the evening (having probably learned that their mode of voting in the morning was illegal, and would vitiate the suffrage), they again voted—this time by ballot—and made out their returns accordingly, in pursuance of the requirements of the constitution. The oversight of the electors in their public proceeding the morning was thus repaired, and not only excused by the ingenuity of their private action in the evening.

[Florence (Ala.) Eng.

MISSISSIPPI.

The legislature has done itself honor, we were going to say—but this is making honesty rather too scarce in the market—by resolving, in spite of the official influence of governor McNutt, that the state was bound to redeem her bonds, and would redeem them. The resolutions to this effect, strange to say, were voted by the governor!!

LOUISIANA.

The house of representatives. On the 10th instant, adopted a resolution, requesting their senators and representatives in congress to use their endeavors to procure the alteration of the present naturalization laws, so as to require twenty-one years consecutive residence in the United States, before a foreigner could become naturalized. It passed by a vote of twenty-one to ten.

TENNESSEE.

The whigs assembled in convention at Murfreesburg, on the 4th instant, for the purpose of designating a candidate for governor in opposition to colonel Polk, at the August election. Forty countiers of the state were represented in the convention. After organizing, the convention adjourned till next day. On meeting next morning, the committee of nomination reported the name of JAMES C. JONES, of Wilson county, as its choice;—and thereupon the choice was unanimously agreed to by this convention.

KENTUCKY.

The senate have passed bill providing for the congressional election in April, instead of August, should an extra session of congress be called.

INDIANA.

We extract the following statement from the N. York Argus:

The legislature of Indiana adjourned on the 15th of February.

Laws were passed laying a poll tax of 75 cents, and a tax of 40 cents on each 100 dollars of property. The enumeration of persons subject to the poll tax, embraces about 100,000, yielding a revenue of $75,000.

The taxable property of the state is estimated at $100,000,000, on which 40 cents on each $100, yields 400,000.

From bank stock and other sources the state has an income of 150,000.

This is about $200,000 less than the interest on the state debt and the expenses of making remittances to New York and London to pay it. The state scrip, or bills of credit, issued in 1839, are receivable for taxes, and these bills will probably absorb the greater part of the amount collected from this source.

Provision has been made by law that real estate, household furniture, farming implements and mechanical tools, shall not be sold on execution for less than one-half their appraised value. And real estate may be redeemed in one year from the day of sale, on paying 12½ per cent. on the purchase money.

A law has also passed, appropriating the sinking fund, the surplus revenue fund, the saline fund, college fund, and the school fund, all to banking purposes. Such of these money are now loaned out, are to be called in and paid over to the state bank. There is a provision that if any debtor to the surplus fund shall desire longer time, it shall be granted to him at 6 per cent. interest, "upon delivering his note to the proper branch, with sufficient endorsers, for the payment of the sum he may owe. And it is provided also, that "the bank may in its discretion grant any indulgence to such debtor, which it usually grants to other borrowers," &c.

Ex-governor Noble has been appointed fund commissioner in place of general Stepp, legislated out of office.

In 1836 the legislature of Indiana passed a law providing for the construction of 1,329 miles of roads and canals, as follows:

Canals	900½ miles.
Turnpike roads	338 "
Rail roads	90½ "

1,329½

There has been expended already $7,199,449, and the sum required to complete them is estimated at $13,346,000, being at least one-fifth of the total value of all the real and personal property in the state.

The state has about 260 miles of canal in use, yielding about $5,000 in toll. Two rail roads yield about $266,000, being a total of $31,000, the present revenue growing out of a debt of fourteen millions of dollars.

Instead of a tax of 5 or 10 cents on a 100 dollars, the people are now to be taxed 75 cents on each 100 dollars, besides their town, county and village taxes, and in addition to this each male inhabitant of lawful age is required to pay a poll tax of 75 cents; and when all these taxes are collected there will not be enough by two hundred thousand dollars to pay the interest on the public debt.

ILLINOIS.

Banks. We learn by the Chicago American that by the suspension law the state bank of Illinois, is authorized to charge 7 per cent. interest on loans not exceeding six months, and 9 per cent. for a longer period, and is permitted to take $1, $2 and $3 notes. The bank is prohibited during the suspension of specie payments, from disposing of its specie, except in sums of $5 for change—may not increase the amount of circulation over the capital paid in, and is to receive and disburse the funds of the state, without charge. The bank is further required to pay the out standing warrants drawn by the auditor.

The directors of the state bank have re-established the branch at Chicago, and re-appointed the former cashier.

MISSOURI.

The legislature adjourned sine die on the 16th ult. after a session of about three months.

ABOLITION CONVENTION.

In the Rochester American Citizen of March 9th, we find the proceedings of a convention held on the 24th of February, at Warsaw, New York. "In compliance with a call addressed to Christians of every denomination in western New York" at which Eliza, Giddens presided, J. C. Jones and R. W. Lyman acted as secretaries. The names of the delegates in attendance are given—87 of whom are of Warsaw itself, and 43 from other places. The following are the resolutions adopted at the convention, most of them unanimously:

1. Resolved, That the institution of the slaveholding system are a swift witness against it, and fully convict those who appear as its apologists, of an attempt to screen from the point of faithful, Christian alike abhorrent to the just requisitions of God's pure and unalterable law, and to the unperverted sentiments of the civilized world.

2. That the slaveholding relation interposes a barrier to the spread of pure Christianity, and to the establishment of true gospel churches over a large and most interesting portion of our republic; that in the judgment of this meeting, the resident churches and Christian communities with which we are connected, are most solemnly bound to persist in prayer to God, and in the application of the most strenuous Christian efforts for the complete demolition of this barrier.

3. That that regard slaveholding to be a sin gross, and so utterly at variance with the gospel of Jesus Christ, that we ought, as Christians, to withhold all ecclesiastical connection from those slaveholders and slaveholding churches, who after having been faithfully and affectionately admonished, according to gospel rules, refuses to abandon this sin.

4. That those who either apologize for slaveholding, or object to its immediate, universal and unconditional abolition, or devise schemes of gradual or partial emancipation in its stead; do thereby array themselves, not merely against the interests of the slave, but against the cardinal principles of civil and religious freedom, but likewise against the doctrines of an orthodox Christian theology, embodied in the creeds, the confessions of faith, the scriptures, and the standard theological writings of the primitive evangelical denominations.

5. That the primitive churches held up before the community the true principles of reform, which if faithfully applied by modern churches, would supersede the necessity for anti-slavery, temperance, moral reform, missionary and other kindred societies.

6. That whilst that sound maxim both of human and divine law, to wit: that the necessary is as guilty as the principal, remains true, so long it will remain no less true, that the apologist for slavery and the witness of its inhumanity, who does not spread the alarm, is as really guilty as he who actually perpetrates its inhuman deeds.

7. That the churches of the north are present resulting from the atrocious wickedness necessarily resulting from the slave system, and many of them not only refuse to testify against it, and to admonish their members to shun it, but to admit of an alarming extent, and in various ways, have become its apologists, or real supporters.

8. That many of them either tolerate or require silence in their pulpits on the momentous subject of human rights: that in many of their theological schools they observe a caution dictated by expediency, or attempt wholly to repress the rising spirit of freedom; they receive, unrebuked, known slaveholders to their pulpits, and to their communications, along with their own, the unallowable doctrine of "ungodly gain," wrong from the unrequited toil of the crushed slave.

9. That it is the right and the duty of the re- spective churches to investigate the subject of slavery and to set upon it—to enter upon their records, and until they do so, the community will justly hold them recreant to the high duty prescribed to them in the gospel of the kingdom of sin, and as implicated deeply and willingly in the foulest transgressions of the divine law.

10. That the monthly concert of prayer for the peaceful abolition of slavery, is a stated and important anti-slavery meeting, which every Christian abolitionist should feel sacredly bound if possible to attend, and which, in the opinion of this convention, may be truly regarded as the thermometer in any community of the Christian abolitionism of that community.

THE CASE OF THE AMISTAD.

Supreme court of the U. States—January term, 1841. The United States, appellants, vs. the libellants and claimants of the property of Antonio, Ruiz, Ferrer and furniture, together with her cargo, and the Africans mentioned and described in the several libels and claims. On appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the district of Connecticut.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the case of an appeal from the decree of the circuit court of the district of Connecticut, sitting in admiralty. The leading facts, as they appear upon the transcript of the proceedings, are as follows:

On the 27th of June, 1839, the schooner L'Amistad, being the property of Spanish subjects, cleared out from the port of Havana, in the Island of Cuba, on a voyage to the United States, under the command of the schooner, were the governor's gun board of Cuba. Pedro Montez had with him four other negroes, also claimed by him as his slaves, and stated to be his property in a similar pass or document, also the high seas, at the distance of some 20 miles from the shore of Long Island. A part of the negroes were then on shore at Coluden point, Long Island, who were seized by lieutenant Gedney and brought on board. The vessel, with the negroes and claims of the property of Antonio, Ruiz, Ferrer and furniture, together with her cargo, and the Africans mentioned and described in the several libels and claims, was brought by lieutenant Gedney into the district of Connecticut, and libelled for salvage in the district court of the United States. A libel for salvage was also filed by Henry Green and Pelatiah Fordham of Sag Harbor, Long Island, on the 18th of September, Ruiz and Montez filed claims to the property of the schooner, and ownership of the negroes as their slaves, and of certain parts of the cargo, and prayed that the same might be "delivered to them, or to the representatives of her Catholic majesty, as might be most proper."

On the 19th of September, the attorney general of the United States for the district of Connecticut filed an information or libel, setting forth that the Spanish minister had officially presented to the proper department of the government of the United States, a claim for the restoration of the vessel, cargo and slaves, as the property of Spanish subjects which had arrived within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, and were taken possession of by the said public armed brig of the United States, under such circumstances as made it the duty of the United States to cause the same to be restored to the true proprietors, pursuant to the treaty between the United States and Spain; and praying the court, on its being made legally to appear that the claim of the Spanish minister was well founded, to make such order for the disposal of the vessel, cargo and slaves, as would best enable the United States to comply with their treaty stipulations. But, it should appear that the negroes were persons transported from Africa in violation of the laws of the United States, and brought within the United States contrary to the same laws; he then prayed the court to make such order for their removal to the coast of Africa, pursuant to the laws of the United States, as it should deem fit.

On the 19th of November the attorney of the United States filed a second information or libel similar to the first, and the exception of the second prayer above set forth in his former one. On the same day, Antonio G. Vega, the vice consul of Spain for the state of Connecticut, filed his libel, alleging that Antonio was a slave, the property of the representatives of Ramon Ferrer, and praying the court to cause him to be delivered to the said vice consul, that he might be returned by him to his lawful owner in the Island of Cuba.

On the 7th of January, 1840, the negroes (Cinco negros), with the exception of Antonio, and by their counsel, and an affidavit being made, that they were slaves, or the property of Ruiz and Montez, or that the court could, under the constitution or laws of the United States, or under any treaty exercise any jurisdiction over their persons by reason of the premises, and praying that they might be dismissed.

They specially set forth and insist in this answer that they were native born Africans, born free, and of right ought to be free and not slaves; that they were, or were not, kidnapped from their native land, unlawfully captured, and forcibly and wrongfully landed on board a certain vessel on the coast of Africa, which was unlawfully engaged in the slave trade, and were unlawfully transported in the same vessel to the United States, where they were sold as slaves; that they were unlawfully sold as slaves; that Ruiz and Montez, well knowing the premises, made a pretended purchase of them; that afterwards, on or about the 28th of May, 1839, they were taken on board the schooner "Amistad," and were transported to the United States (with Ferrer, captain of the Amistad), caused them, without law or right, to be placed on board of the Amistad, to be transported to some place unknown to them; that they were transported to the United States, where they were sold as slaves; that on the 2d of August, 1839, of Montauk Point, near Long Island; a part of them there went aboard, and were seized by lieutenant Gedney, and carried on board, and all of them were transported by him into the district of Connecticut.

On the 7th of January, 1840, Jose Antonio Telles and Messrs. Aspe and Laca, all Spanish subjects residing in Cuba, filed their claims as owners to certain portions of the goods found on board of the schooner L'Amistad.

On the same day, all the libellants and claimants, by their counsel, except Jose Ruiz and Pedro Montez, (whose libels and claims, as stated of record, respectively, were pursued by the Spanish minister, the same being merged in the claims), appeared, and the negroes also appeared by their counsel, and the case was heard on the libels, claims, answers and testimony of witnesses.

On the 22nd of January, 1840, the district court made a decree. By that decree, the court rejected the claim of Green and Fordham for salvage, but allowed salvage to lieutenant Gedgey and others on board the schooner Albatross, who had captured the Amelia, if, but not the negroes Cinquez and others; it allowed the claim of Tellinae and Aspe and Laca, with the exception of the above mentioned salvage. It dismissed the ibels and claims of Ruiz and Montez for salvage, and declining under the laws of Spain the Spanish mission. It allowed the claim of Ferrer's vice consul for Antonio, on behalf of Ferrer's representatives. It rejected the claims of Ramirez and Montez for the delivery of the negroes, but admitted them as cargo, with the exception of those already mentioned. The court decreed that the same should be delivered to the United States, as made by the attorney of the United States, on behalf of the Spanish minister, for the restoration of the negroes under the treaty; but it decreed that they should be delivered to the president of the United States, to be sent to Africa, pursuant to the act of 3d of March, 1819.

From this decree the district attorney, on behalf of the United States, appealed to the circuit court, except so far as it related to the restitution of the slave Antonio. The claimants Tellicinas and Aspe and Laca also appealed from that part of the decree which awarded salvage on the property respectively claimed by them. No appeal was interposed by Ruiz or Montez, or on behalf of the representatives of the owner of the Amistad. The circuit court, by a mere pro forma decree, affirmed the decree of the district court, reserving the question of salvage upon the claims of Tellicinas and A-pe and Laca. And from that decree the present appeal has been brought to this court.

The cause has been very elaborately argued, as well upon the merits as upon a motion on behalf of the appellants to dismiss the appeal. On the part of the United States it has been contended, 1. That the United States are entitled to the property in question, because the title thereto has been acquired by the United States by the capture of the vessel, cargo and negroes to the Spanish subjects on whose behalf they are claimed, pursuant to the treaty with Spain of the 27th of October, 1795. 2. That the United States have a right to intervene in the proceedings, because the title to the property in question is the subject of the suit, and the United States are entitled to the restitution of the property upon the application of the Spanish minister. These propositions have been strenuously denied on the other side. Other collateral and incidental points have been brought in, upon which it is not necessary at this moment to dwell.

Before entering upon the discussion of the main points involved in this interesting and important controversy, it may be necessary to say a few words as to the actual posture of the case as it now stands before us. In the first place, then, the only parties now before the court, on one side, are the United States, interfering for the sole purpose of procuring restitution of the property as Spanish property, pursuant to the treaty, upon the grounds stated by the other parties claiming the property in their respective countries, and upon the grounds that the said property in themselves, or any violation of the own rights, or sovereignty, or laws, by the acts complained of. They do not insist that these negroes have been imported into the United States in contravention of our own slave trade acts. They do not insist that the said negroes were taken for the purpose of being transported to Cuba as pirates or robbers, or as fugitive criminals found within our territories who have been guilty of offences against the laws of Spain. They do not assert that the seizure and bringing of the said cargo and negroes into the United States, without consent of Congress, for the purpose of adjudication, is a tortious act. They simply confine themselves to the right of the Spanish claimants to the restitution of their property, upon the facts asserted in their respective allegations.

On the 10th day of June, 1851, the court on the other side, as appellars, arc listed. Gedyney, on his libel for salvage, and the negroes (Cinquez and others) asserting themselves in their answer not to be slaves, but free native Africans, kidnapped in their own country, and illegally transported by force from their country, and now entitled to maintain their freedom.

No question has been here made as to the proprietary interest in the vessel and cargo. It is admitted that they belong to Spanish subjects, and that they ought to be restored. The only point on this head is, whether the restoration ought to be made on payment of ransom. This is the main controversy. Whether these negroes are the property of Ruiz and Montez, and ought to be delivered up; and to this, accordingly, we shall first direct our attention. It has been argued on behalf of the United States that the treaty of 1795 with Spain, which has in this particular been continued in full force by the treaty of 1819, raised in 1821. The sixth article of that treaty seems to have had principally in view cases where the property of the subjects of either state is seized by the subjects of the other, within the jurisdiction of the other, during war. The eighth article provides for cases where the shipping of the inhabitants of either state is forced, through stress of weather, pirate or enemies, or any other urgent necessity, to seek shelter in the ports of the other. The article does not say that the property seized within the present case, in its actual circumstances, falls within the purview of this article. But it does not seem necessary, for reasons hereafter stated, actually to decide it. The ninth article provides "that all ships and merchandise, of one party seized by the subjects of the other, shall be restored to the hands of any pirates or robbers, on the high seas, shall be brought into some port of either state, and shall be delivered to the custody of the officers of that port, in order to be taken care of and restored according to the true property, as far as may be due and sufficient to satisfy all claims concerning the property thereof." This is the article on which the main reliance is placed on behalf of the United States for the restitution of these negroes. To bring the case within the article, it is essential to establish, first, That these negroes, under all the circumstances, and without any appropriation of merchandise, are within the treaty; secondly, That there has been a rescue of them on the high seas out of the hands of pirates and robbers, which in the present case, can only be showing that they themselves are pirates and robbers; and thirdly, That the negroes were not the property of the true proprietors, and have established their own competent proof. If these negroes were at the time lawfully held as slaves under the laws of Spain, and recognised by those laws as property capable of being lawfully bought and sold, we see no reason why they should not be restored to the proprietor, in fulfilment of the intent of the treaty, to be included under the denomination of merchandise, [and] as such, ought to be restored to the claimants: for, upon that point, the laws of Spain would seem to furnish the proper rule of interpretation. But, admitting this, it is still to be shown, that the laws of Spain, and the essential facts and requisites has been established in proof; and the onus probandi of both lies upon the claimants to give rise to the causa fœderis. It is plain, beyond controversy, if we examine the evidence, that these negroes never were the lawful property of the Royal African Company, or of their subjects. They are natives of Africa, and were kidnapped there, and were unlawfully transported to Cuba, in violation of the laws and treaties of Spain, and the most solemn edicts and declarations of that government. By the laws of Spain, and the treaties of Spain, the slave trade is utterly abolished; the dealing in that trade is deemed a heinous crime: and the negroes were rebely introduced into the dominions of Spain are declared to be free. Ruiz and Montez are proved to have made the pretended purchase of these negroes with a full knowledge of all the circumstances, and to be violent and insolent in their conduct towards the respondent. The district attorney here admitted, in open court, upon the record, that these negroes were native Africans, and recently imported into Cuba, as alleged in their answers to the libels. Ruiz and Montez supposed proprietary interest, and the respondent, in the absence of any evidence, if we are at liberty to look at the evidence or the admissions of the district attorney. If, then, these negroes are not slaves, but are kidnapped Africans, who, by the laws of Spain itself, are entitled to their liberty, and to be restored to their native country, and to Cuba, and illegally detained and restrained on board of the Amatada, there is no pretence to say that they are pirates or robbers. We may lament the dreadful acts by which they asserted their liberty, but we cannot but sympathize with them in their endeavor to regain their native country; but they cannot be deemed pirates or robbers in the sense of the law of nations, or the treaty with Spain, or the laws of Spain itself, at least so far as those laws have been construed by our courts. The Amatada, Captain of Ruiz and Montez assert there to be no such

This posture of the facts would seem of itself to put an end to the whole inquiry upon the merits. But it is argued, on behalf of the United States, that the ship and cargo and negroes were duly documented as belonging to Spanish subjects, and this is a fact which cannot be denied. It is also admitted that full faith and credit is to be given to them; and that they are to be held conclusive evidence in this case, even although it should be established by the most satisfactory proofs that they have been obtained by means of frauds and impositions upon the constituted authorities of Spain. And upon this we can in no wise assent. There is nothing in this treaty which justifies or sustains the argument. We do not here meddle with the point whether there has been any connivance in this illegal traffic on the part of the judicial authorities or subordinate officers of Cuba; but even if such a connivance or animadversion is necessary, and ought not to be pursued unless it were indispensible to public justice, although it has been strongly pressed at the bar.—What we proceed upon is this: that although public property found on board the ship, and although the cargo and crew certainly are to be deemed prima facie evidence of the facts which they purport to state, yet they are always open to be impugned for fraud; and whether that fraud be in the original obtaining of the documents, or in the subsequent fraudulent and illegal use of them, the subsequent fraud is established, it overthrows all their sanctity, and destroys them as proofs. Fraud will vitiate any, even the most solemn, transactions, and an assertion of title to property founded upon it is utterly void.—The very language of the ninth article of the treaty of 1795, in relation to the property of the United States, is sufficient proof of this property. And how can that be proved either due or sufficient, which is not a connected and stained issue of fraud? This is not a mere rule of municipal jurisprudence.—It is a rule more clear than the law of nations, as an established principle of private law and duties, and intercourse, than the doctrine that the papers are but prima facie evidence, and that, if they are shown to be fraudulent, they are not to be held proof of any valid title. This rule is familiarly applied, and indeed is of every-day occurrence in the courts of the United States, in all allegations of fraud, and, as is apparent from numerous instances to be found in the reports of this court; and it is just as applicable to the transactions of civil intercourse between nations in times of peace. If a private ship clothed with Spanish papers should enter the ports of the United States, and should be seized by the authorities and rights belonging to the United States of Spain under our treaties or laws, and she should in reality belong to the subjects of another nation, which was not entitled to any such privilege, immunities or rights, and the proprietors were seeking to evade the laws of our country by flying under the flag of Spain, there can be no doubt that it would be the duty of our courts to stop the disguise, and to look at the case according to its naked realities. In the solemn treaties between nations, it can hardly be presumed that either state intended to provide the other with a cloak for protecting frauds; but all the provisions are to be construed as intended to be applied to bona fide transactions. The 17th article of the treaty with Spain, which provides for certain passports and certificates as evidence of property on board of the ships of both states, is in its true meaning and intent, either of the parties is engaged in a war. They are issued by the parties, and annexed to the treaty. It never was annexed; and therefore, in case the Amiable Isabella, (S. Wheat, R. J.), it was held inoperative.

It is also a most important consideration to the present case, which ought not to be lost sight of, that, supposing these African negroes not to be slaves, but kidnapped, and free negroes, the treaty between Spain cannot be applied to them, and the United States are bound to respect their rights as much as those of Spanish subjects. The conflict of rights between the parties under such circumstances becomes positive and inevitable, and must be decided upon the eternal principles of justice and international law. If the contest were about any goods on board of this ship, to which American citizens asserted a title, which was denied by the Spanish claimants, there could be no doubt of the right of such American citizens to litigate their claims before any competent American tribunal, notwithstanding the treaty with Spain. A fortiori the doctrine must apply where human life and human liberty are in issue, and constitute the very essence of the controversy. The treaty with Spain over could have intended to take away the equal rights of all foreigners, who should contest their claims before any of our courts, to equal justice, or to deprive such foreigners of the protection given them by other treaties, or by the general law of nations.—Upon the merits of the case, then, there does not seem to us to be any ground for saying that these negroes ought to be deemed free, and that the Spanish treaty interposes no obstacle to the just assertion of their rights.

There is another consideration growing out of this part of the case which necessarily draws to judgment. It is observable that the United States, in their original claim, filed it in the alternative to have the negroes, if slaves and Spanish property, restored to the proprietors; or, if not slaves, but negroes who had been transported from Africa in violation of the laws of the United States, and brought into the United States contrary to the same laws, then the court to pass an order to enable the United States to remove such persons to the coast of Africa, to be delivered there to such agent as may be authorized to receive and provide for them; and in the subsequent period, this last alternative claim was not insisted on, and another claim was interposed omitting it, from which the conclusion naturally arises that it was abandoned. The decree of the district court, in the present case, is in conformity with the decree of the United States, to be transported to the coast of Africa under the act of the 3d of March, 1819, ch. 224. The United States do not now insist upon any affirmance of this part of the decree; and in our judgment, upon the facts and law of the case, it is not necessary to assert that the case comes within the purview of the act of 1819, or of any other of our prohibitory slave trade acts. These negroes were never taken from Africa or brought to the United States in contravention of those acts. When the American government, in its possession of the negroes asserting their freedom, and in no sense could they possibly intend to import themselves here, as slaves, or for sale as slaves. In this view of the matter, that part of the decree of the district court is unattainable, and must be reversed.

The view which has been thus taken of this case upon the merits under the first point renders it wholly unnecessary for us to give any opinion upon the other point, as to the right of the United States to intervene in the decree of the district court.

We dismiss this, therefore, as well as several minor points made at the argument.

As to the claim of Lieut. Gedney for the salvage service, it is understood that the United States do not now desire to perpetrate any wrong, and in pursuance of it, it is deemed reasonable by the court. It was a highly meritorious and useful service to the proprietors of the ship and cargo; and such as, by the general principles of maritime law, is always deemed a just foundation for salvage.—The rate allowed by the court does not seem to us to have been beyond the exercise of a sound discretion, under the very peculiar and embarrassing circumstances of the case.

Upon the whole, our opinion is that the decree of the circuit court affirming that of the district court ought to be affirmed, except so far as it directed the negroes to be delivered to the president to be transported to Africa in pursuance of the act of the 3d of March, 1819, and, as to this, it ought to be reversed, and that the said negroes be declared to be free, and be dismissed from the custody of the court, and go without pay. THE DECREE.

The United States, appellants, vs. the libellants and claimants of the schooner Amiable Isabella, her cargo, apparel and furniture, together with her tackle, and the Africans mentioned and described in the several libels and claims. An appeal from the circuit court of the United States to the district of Connecticut.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the circuit court of the United States for the district of Connecticut, and was argued by counsel. On consideration of the same, it is the opinion of this court that there is error in that part of the decree of the circuit court, affirming the decree of the district court, which ordered the said negroes to be delivered to the president of the United States to be transported to Africa in pursuance of the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1819, and that, as to that part, it ought to be reversed, and, in all other respects, that the said decree of the circuit court ought to be affirmed. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed by this court, that the decree of the said circuit court be, and the same is hereby, affirmed, except as to the part aforesaid, and, as to that part, that it be reversed, and that the cause be remanded to the circuit court with directions to enter in lieu of that part a decree that the said negroes be, and are hereby, declared to be free, and that they be dismissed from the custody of the court, and be discharged from the suit, and go thereof quit without day. WM. THOS. CARROLL, C. S. C. U. S.

DEBATE ON THE PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

In senate, January, 19, 1841.

Mr. WILKIE said: However imperfectly I feel myself qualified to discuss this subject, I am, nevertheless, without, in this respect, occupying an impartial position. Indiana, in her progressive advances from a wilderness state to the dignity of the fourth or fifth member of the union, has reached that period in her history when she may hold with as much pride as any of the original thirteen, between the old states and the new. While, then, I listen with most respectful consideration to able counsels than I myself can aspire to give upon a subject whose growing magnitude has inspired verities, with such apprehension as even to justify precipitate and immature legislation, I shall endeavor so to record my vote upon the several propositions before us as to secure to the new states all the equity they claim, and to the old states all the rights which they challenge, and to all the states in general an equal basis of the scales of justice, to be gained, as I conceive, from no other source than from the proceeds of our bountiful domain.

In our plan of government, sir, simple as its object and well-defined as its purposes are, many difficult and complicated questions are necessarily occurring. They are chiefly questions of power. Our confederated, and at the same time republican, principle—our relations with the Indian tribes—our partial system of domestic slavery—and our protective tariff system, are all full enough of difficulties to this extent, that we are not able to solve its severest trial. Indeed, sir, parties have a tendency to organize themselves not so much upon measures of policy as upon abstract questions of constitutional construction. This tendency of party is greatly injurious, by producing political sophisms and defined theories which override every practical power for good conferred by our constitution.

The land question is not properly a question of power, and yet incidentally it involves considerations of the same character. Over the public domain which lies within the limits of our original states, the United States seem to have something more than a simple property jurisdiction or a mere private ownership. This is proved by their right to make laws for its convenience and government, and by their right to reserve its territory and its resources. All questions concerning those lands in courts of their own creation. Such powers are appurtenant to a species of territorial sovereignty.

I concur fully with senators who have ascribed so great importance to the measures now before us, in regard to merely as a question of finance, it carries a grave and serious import. Not the least among the high functions of government is its power to raise and expend money. Next to the power to declare war, and to place under the administration the sacred life and fortune of the citizen, the power to raise revenue is the highest prerogative of sovereignty. Of equal importance is it if we have respect to the question of population or settlement and of social organization. These are the great questions which the medium through which senators choose to regard the subject. Would the senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON), complain that we will not treat the public domain as a fund for revenue, the senator from Tennessee, (Mr. ALEXANDER), contends that it is by no means a question of finance, and that the honorable senator from Virginia, (Mr. CALHOUN), is right in his contention that I do with the honorable senator who introduced the bill soon on your table, in the priority of the period of pre-emption law, I protest against the justice of the remedy which you have accompanied its introduction, and to which I shall have occasion hereafter to advert. My purpose now is merely to express my regret that a measure so interesting, and, I may add, beneficent, in the final disposition of the subject, should have been subjected to this body without a conjuration of influences well calculated to disturb the harmony of our legislation—influences which have lately been aroused in the conflict of contending parties, and which had expended their energies in the most conclusive demonstrations at the ballot box.

To one or all of these causes it is owing that our statute book groans under the weight of enactment in regard to the management of our land system. Since the colonial and agrarian system of Rome, no nation has had such a complication of laws regulating its domain. It may well be conceived that so extensive and fertile a territory would be a prolific subject of legislation. Our entire domain is computed at 1,085,356,252 acres of land, to add 400,000,000 of which the Indian title has been extinguished, and remains unextinguished to near 700,000,000 acres. Of this vast domain, about seven-tenths lies east, and two-tenths west of the Rocky mountains. As yet we have sold to individuals, for the purpose of settlement, 1,000,000 acres, and if we add to that grants and reservations to individuals, &c. there will still remain more than 900,000,000 acres in which the United States has a proprietary interest.

It is true that these terms are given to the future stamps upon these terms are given to the user for the abode of man, and for the development not only of the physical but of the moral and intellectual energies of the Caucasian race. Extending to the shores of the Pacific ocean, the retiring savage shall give place to the Anglo-Saxon, to the European, to the American, and upon the last great drama where can be seen, the triumphs of civilization, of liberty, and of religion.

Already upon a considerable part of this domain have these great purposes begun their accomplishment. Of the territory above mentioned, an area of about 250,000,000 acres has been organized into republican states, and nine more stars of virgin lustre shine resplendent in the galaxy of the union.

The bill and amendments before us contemplate a permanent and conclusive adjustment of the interest of the United States in the public domain, from a general view which we have taken of its use, and of the nature of the trust with which the government is invested in regard to it, we are prepared to discuss the several principles and details involved in the bill and proposed amendments.

From the beginning of our history, settlement and occupancy seem to have been the object of the government. It is true that largesses have ever been proposed, no bounties awarded, to induce a cultivation of our wild domain. On the other hand, government has been ever ready to withhold, from time to time, extinguished the Indian title, and throw the lands into market. The Indian claim removed, no other obstacle has been left by our laws in the way of settlement, no limits prescribed to the explorations of the adventurous pioneer. The method of settling the western lands in compact masses by townships at a time has been always repudiated. The government has incurred no expense to protect the settlements; no garrisons or military posts have been established upon our frontiers. The government has been ever ready to try, it has been left to the same fearless and hardy spirit of individual resolution which dared to encounter the obstacles of nature and the terrors of the forest to defend the pioneers against the marauding Indians, and to give the first firm footing to the advance of the pioneer. The rifle and the axe have gone together into the wilderness borne by the same hand. The mother has left the couch, where her infant reposed, to watch over the labors of the backwoodsman while engaged in his daily and toilsome task, and to give the first alarm when the prowling Indian, or the treacherous pioneer, approached the habitation. The first midnight repose has been rendered secure only by the guardianship of the hunter sentinel.

In such a way as this, sir, have your great transmontane valleys been settled; until now, security has succeeded to danger, and the alarms of a border war are drowned in the noisy tread of commerce and speculation. The pioneer has borne the dangers of the adventure, shall he not reap its honors and rewards? Unaided, unregarded, uncompensated, he has laid, in virtus and in peace, the foundations of several of our great cities. He has strengthened the bonds of our confederacy, aided new interest to your commerce, augmented sources to your revenue, secured to you liberties, and fresh glories to your empire. Will you now withdraw from him your protection, and leave him to the mercies of the war, or, rather, will you not confirm to him his ancient charter? Is the same wise and liberal policy yet to continue, of covering this continent with republican states, or is the sordid greed of avarice to arrest this march of civil liberty towards its utmost destination? Is this paternal government willing to adopt the motto

"Quærenda pecunia primum est, virtus post nimis," to postpone the highest political interests of its people to a consideration of revenue?

It is remarkable that, in almost every deed of cession from the states, and in both the treaties with France and Spain for the purchase of Louisiana and Florida, guarantees are contained securing to the people of the acquired territory a republican form of government, and free and equal admission into the union. If, then, even in our foreign negotiations this appears to be a fundamental object, let us not thwart, by our domestic policy the earliest attainment of so great an end. Let revenue be a mere incidental consideration, or, in the expressive and simple language of a member of the first congress, "let us make the best of liberty, our people, and our land."

Sensors object to the pre-emption policy mainly upon these grounds:

1. That it injures our exchequer by diminishing the price received for the lands.

2. That, by giving privileges and bonuses upon the people of the new states, it is partial in its operation and unjust to the people of the old states.

3. That it produces an unnatural and forced drain upon the population of the old states. And

4. That it engenders a spirit of insubordination to the laws, and will lead to mischievous riots and excesses by tolerating a scramble for the public property.

To the first objection, I reply, that, before the former pre-emption laws had operated to any extent, the gross average at which the lands have been sold since the present minimum price was established is about one dollar and thirty cents per acre. The inconceivable loss of five cents per acre does not weigh a feather in the scale against the equity of pre-emption. To suppose even the ill-founded complaints of a single state having public lands within its borders, you ought not to hesitate to make so small a sacrifice. You have assessed the value of the lands at $1.25 per acre. Why should you suppose them to state at auction? Most of the old lands are not worth the minimum price, and yet you refuse, and for good reasons, to graduate them downwards. Why should you graduate them upwards? In any department of business there are the auctioneers and it ought to be considered when it is possible to do so, the parent of frequently ruinous speculation, arising from an undue competition, which such an occasion generally arouses. Upon the commerce of our citizens we lay an equal duty, and do not sell the protection of our navy to the highest bidder. The facilities of the public mail and the privileges of the patent office are afforded at fixed rates. No part of our revenue except from land, is raised in the shambles. Government affords none of its favors, none of its privileges, to the cupidity of wealth, save the domicile of the poor man, of which, by conquest or purchase, it has become the lord paramount.

The second objection assumes what I cannot grant—"that the right of pre-emption is a bounty or a privilege." The pre-emptor pays a fair equivalent for his right, of the value of the land to the government than the higher price which the capitalist might bid at auction. Foregoing now the argument of increased resources and augmented national wealth produced by conveying the lands to the actual occupants and cultivators, and the consideration of enhanced value given to the adjacent lands by improvements in their neighborhood. How much the sale of this class of lands has been hastened by such causes it is impossible to estimate, but I venture the assertion that your treasury, enriched as it has been from every source, including the twenty-five millions of treasury notes which have been issued, could not stand the shock of yielding up its gains derived in this very way. Is it more the nature of bounty to give these lands for a fixed price to the first occupant, to the most industrious citizen, than to the wealthiest, who may perchance bid more than they are worth? But in what respect is this system unjust to the people of the old states? Certainly, the lands are not a fund for individual aggrandizement and profit. Whatever the government, as the trustee of the lands, owes to the states upon the great principles of equity, which I shall try and discuss, it can be under no obligation to parcel the domain out per capita among the individual names of people. The people of the old states, remaining united and compact, may purchase is denied to them for purposes of investment and speculation (I do not like the word) which is allowed to him who is willing to join the new community in the wilderness, to lay his health, and to build his altar there. If the government does not hold these lands in trust for individual advantage, then it has a right to fix what principles it pleases for their sale and disposition; and surely no complaint can justly be made when those principles are friendly to the earliest development of the social and political system, and to the increase of population within the limits of the new territory. Of this I am fully satisfied.

I am willing to accord a character of plausibility to the third objection to pre-emption, above enumerated. Perhaps the tendency of American enterprise is too much to a diffusive population. To every section of the union the government owes an equal patronage, and no praiseworthy citizen build up the west would desire to see his own section built up at the expense of the sister states. Especially would no western statesman commend himself to his constituents by the enactment of partial laws. The chain of dependence is such between the most distant parts of our confederacy, that nations are so injuriously affected without sensible loss to the other. It is impossible, however, to restrain the emigrating spirit of our countrymen, and no better rule can be adopted than to leave each one free to content himself with which point to his own prosperity and happiness. While the rewards of agriculture in the rich and fertile plains west of the mountains are so tempting to the citizen than the appropriate pursuits to which those are destined who remain in the Atlantic states, it would be wrong to check that virtuous ambition which is so clamorous to reach them. Let it be remembered that agriculture is the almost universal pursuit of the western emigrant; and the more this proportion of our population increases, the more our real independence and security, and the faster our commerce will be augmented. I am not about to adopt the exclusive and exploded doctrine of the economists, which decried the productive quality to the operations of commerce and to the labors of the artisan; but I do contend that agriculture is a employment is the best adapted to the genius of our people, and to the condition of our country, and that it ought, and ever will, I trust, maintain a proud preponderance. Need I remind you, sir, that this class, in every emergency, will be the prop and stay of our republic; that here we shall find the true and the just basis of our government; that here we shall find their true abiding place, and that redaction and misrule never attend the peaceful domicile of the husbandman?

But there is a view of this subject which takes out of the objection, as we are discussing it. It is, that, although emigration may be too rapid from the old states to the new, the nature of our pursuits is such that there is a constant circulation of our population. Though, in the process of this mighty provincial ascension which has so astonished us with growth, the blood may be forced through the arteries in unusual currents to the extremities, yet the self-restoring effect of nature shall return it through a thousand veins to the seat of life. The traveler from the old states, after many days, will return with the spoils of industry, and pour the grateful offering into the maternal lap.

A single word or two, sir, shall suffice in reply to the fourth objection. It is in effect "a beginning of the question," for if you invite the occupant to take possession of your lands, he cannot be a trespasser. You are not of 1847 forever trespassing upon the public lands, and yet how little has the moral sense of the community been shocked by the frequent and constantly recurring violations of that act which we have witnessed. The universal sentiment of the people is, that the trespasser is a villain. The law seeks a home and a domicile for his wife and his children often against any rule of society? In vain do you set up the artificial authority of any law against so holy a purpose! Restrict your pre-emption law to the actual settler; guard against speculation by the law; and your statute book will have no reproaches nor opprobrium rest upon your authority from any of the acts which you fear. That there will be no strife or violent contention among the several beneficiaries of the pre-emption law, the experience of the past sufficiently proves. The northwest corner of Indiana (within my own observation) has been settled by pre-emptors. A more orderly, industrious, or better regulated community is not to be found.

The argument in favor of pre-emption is no pregnant, that it seems almost superfluous to adduce the authority of other governments which have uniformly extended the kindest protection towards their infant settlements. From the time when the wandering Scythian roamed from one hunting ground or pasture to another, as his tribe and his family would expire—from the period of the Feldmark and bookland of the ancient Saxon—there has been no mercenary legislation upon lands. The far-famed agrarian laws of Rome were designed to aid and protect the colonist. The states of our own confederacy have either surrendered their lands to settlers or sold them at a nominal price. We are all conversant with that force of public opinion which constrained Massachusetts to pass laws requiring the successful plaintiff in ejectment to pay the occupying claimant for what they termed his "betterments," answering to what "melioramenta" of the civil law, or the "improvements" of the western squatter. A rigorous policy against the settler would be a violation of contemporary settlement and of all the lights of experience.

But senators say that the new states, not content with bearing the palm of successful rivalry from their older sisters, have really outstripped themselves, and have asserted the rights of majority before they have attained the age of twenty-one. Grant that this is true, sir. We have at least the proud satisfaction of knowing that our greatness is not "been thrust upon us." It is a trophy of our own achieving, we glory in the distant and most infancy, in our wilderness state, we have earned the honors of manhood. We boast not strength alone, but wisdom. In the ordinance of 1787, before the birth of your constitution, we laughingly pronounced the principle of majority to be a maxim; that, in an ordinance creating a government designed to be temporary, those great principles should be laid down as the fundamental basis of our society, and expressed to be forever binding and irrevocable upon the people and states thereafter. Wise, Sir, in Hannibal, we were correct to liberty to our infancy, and now that our noon-day sun is culminating upon the continent, we conjure you to apprehend no evil, nor to fear influences, however powerful, which are thus benign. Let senators realize, and let the people be made aware, that out their favors with a saring hand, under what difficulties, under what discouragements, and under what painful perils our early settlements were effected. Let them remember how, even in later times, it has cost us all our energies to bring our owners upon the growing forest. The state of Indiana has an area of upwards of twenty-two millions of acres, and her citizens have already contributed to the national treasury, as the price of their demesnes, more than twenty millions of dollars. Indiana, sir, is a state of great resources, and, after such exhaustion, has their industry been taxed to cultivate and stock their farms and to procure that bountiful subsistence which an American citizen demands.

You have been reminded, sir, by what I have said too gratuitous a spirit towards the new states, of the bounty and munificence, or, as the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PASTOR), eloquently expresses it, of the justice (for what higher attribute can be claimed in these degenerate ages?) of Virginia and the other conceding states, in surrendering their rich possessions to the union. The new states congratulate themselves upon this result. They congratulate the union. Had the state retained this territory we should not now perhaps have been in the hands of a paternal government bestowing its reclaimed guaranty for our admission into the union. Wisconsin, Iowa, Florida, would not have been that guaranty yet to be faithfully and speedily performed. The territory northwest of the Ohio river would have been a mere appendage to the Old Dominion. Louisiana, Kentucky, and Mississippi, if not acquired, nor the navigation of the Mississippi secured. We should not now have boasted N. Orleans, the peerless exporting city of the continent; nor would our great staple-growing region of the south have been so happily prospering. The great city of Ohio, the Illinois and the Wabash, to pour the life of duty their abundant and cradles supplies into her bosom, thus giving to her annual eighty millions of exports one-third of the elements of their value.

As a representative of western interests, I do not complain of the policy of the government, nor will I be forgotten that commerce is its costly defence, and manufactures a protection springing from your laws. Of necessity, almost, the pecuniary patronage of the government is lured to the seaboard. In proportion to its numbers the west is the largest tax paying section of our country, for the simple reason that not an article of import is produced there. These drains upon our industry we submit to with an uncomplaining temper. But we cannot forget the equity which such considerations raise when you are called to pass laws upon subjects peculiarly affecting our interests. Our staples are the agricultural prods, which seem to be placed beyond the pale of constitutional protection. Compared with the magnitude of the agricultural interest, the other branches of industry are almost insignificant. Commerce has its one hundred millions of exports, and an equal amount of imports, and our manufactures double the seend these sums in amount, but agriculture, towering above all, ascends to two thousand millions per annum. No nation can be perfectly independent, and which does not raise its own breadstuffs; and the highest condition of social happiness and prosperity is attained when other interests to be sure are flourishing, but when the agricultural interest maintains the ascendant. In every vicissitude of trade, and in every revolution of government, while the land and distress too often mark their desolating career in other countries, in peace and in war, our teeming soil continues to yield its fruits to the labor of the husbandman, and our barns and granaries to furnish plentiful resources of subsistence. No event in history is associated with such a mass of human happiness, present and prospective, as the settlement of our western country, by multiplying and cheapening the food upon which man subsists. But I will not press this topic further. The people of the west, in their growing strength, expect from congress just and considerate laws, not so much from their power to enforce them as from the enlightened appreciation in which their claims must be held by the entire union.

It is matter of regret that the dignity of these claims should be disparaged, or suspicion be thrown upon them, by the manner in which the present bill was introduced into the senate. When pre-emption laws became the mere foot-note of party, or were converted into engines for political warfare, it is no wonder that they fail to command that general assent to which they are entitled. The honorable member who brought in this bill remarked, upon its introduction, that the federal party (as he was pleased to term the whig party) in the recent presidential canvass, shown so devoted a love for negro chains and their inmates, he was fearful they would anticipate the friends of the administration in pressing the measure of a permanent pre-emption law; he therefore hastened to submit the proposed measure. Sir, the significant title prefixed to this bill, if it shall not be interpreted as ironical upon a worthy beneficiaries, has at least that aspect inference to one of the great parties engaged. In recent presidential struggle. Certainly, to prefix the bill or its title, or some other association, have produced in this debate not a little rancor against the emblems adopted, for good cause, by the whigs in the late contest. The freight with which the pre-emption vessel is laden is acceptable to no constituency but the one for which it was under which she sails. In a word, sir, it cannot be concealed that this measure is intended to overreach the action of the coming administration, and either to are that administration into an antagonistic position, or obstruct its efforts by a forced and sudden interposition of a policy for which the country was as ripe eight eight years ago as now. It matters not to me, however, whether this communication be achieved under the star of general Harrison—or whether it be the consequence of that series of conservative and patriotic measures which are to restore the character of the age and to elevate our institutions—or whether now urged on by influences no longer to be resisted, the measure has been precipitated upon us by the stern virtue which is felt and appreciated, and I may add, feared, in the character of general Harrison, and by that powerful voice of the people which has pronounced his election.

Connected with the subject of a final settlement of the land question, and proposed by the bill, two antagonistic measures have been presented to the senate. That contained in the amendment of the honorable senate from Kentucky (Mr. CATTEENEX) proposes a grant to the actual settler, whose estate shall not exceed the value of six hundred dollars of pre-emption for any quantity of land not exceeding 320 acres, and to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several states of the union in just and equitable proportions. The other, proposed by the honorable member from North Carolina, Mr. CALDWELL, proposes a cession of the public lands to the several states within whose limits they lie, upon conditions, the principal of which are, that the states shall annually pay to the general government sixty-five per cent of the gross proceeds, and that the cession "shall be in full of the five per cent fund, on any part thereof not already accrued to any state; and the said states shall be exclusively liable for all charges that may hereafter arise from the surveys, extended management, and public sale, and extinguishment of Indian title within the limits of said states respectively." It also provides that the states may pass pre-emption and graduation laws. I shall first consider the amendment of the senator from North Carolina.

I object to this scheme as annulling the whole land system approved by the experience of forty years; as destroying that uniformity which contributed so much, not only to the security of titles, but to the value of improvements made upon the newly purchased lands. It transfers the monuments of title from the archives of this government to the custody of the executives of the several states, the forms of conveyance of course to be devised by the authorities of those states. It creates new responsibilities unknown to the constitution, and dangerous to the revenues. Who can believe that the states will meet pecuniary engagements of this kind with promptitude? Your laws cannot enforce their collection, and your only reliance is upon the faith of the states. In original engagements of the several states with the world, there is no event which is a sufficient guaranty for the redemption of any pecuniary obligation. But here the case is very different. This proposition creates relations between the states and the federal government not very dissimilar to those which existed under the old articles of confederation. A principal inducement for abolishing the old confederacy was, because requisitions for money (even for so serious a consideration as the payment of the revolutionary debt) made by congress upon the states was not regarded. The failure of a single debtor state to meet engagements imposed by this measure would produce dissimulation, and justify a like remission on the part of others. In every aspect of the case, the relation between the states and the federal government is to be degraded, but when that relation is relied upon to supply a considerable portion of our current revenue, it can result only in disaster and disappointment until the sense of obligation shall ultimately be broken. But one expectation of the kind has been since the ratification of our constitution, and that was in the act of 1836 depositing forty millions of our surplus revenue with the states. From the moment that this act was passed, and in contravention of its very terms, the sense of the nation has pronounced it a distribution and not a deposit act. That fund (or rather so much of it as was deposited) has ceased to belong to the resources of the federal government; and he who would treat it as such subjects himself to the just and severe reprobation of all.

But if, for any purpose, and particularly for revenue purposes, it is unwise and hazardous to involve the states in a condition of indebtedness to the union, how is the argument strengthened and the danger increased when the ownership of that indebtedness is the price of their retention of all the public lands have already asserted that the proprietary interest of this government in these lands, and the authority necessarily assumed in consequence thereof, is in derogation of the rights and sovereignty of the states. Such doctrine has been held, I believe, at least in Alabama and Missouri. They have been advocated by prominent members, both upon this floor and in the other branch of congress. I can regard this amendment in no other light than that of a suffering wedge for the purpose of all the public domain to the states where they lie. What sir, are the principles of the contemplated cession? Not surely the employment of the states as agents merely of this government for the sale of the lands, but a transfer to them in their own right, by virtue of a contract of purchase. It was so treated by the committee on public lands at the last session, who were friendly to the measure. The amendment ex termino recognises a certain right on the part of the states to control these lands, at least so strong as to enable them to render it impossible for the government further to direct their management. How long will it be after a cession made under such motives and impulses, until the states, habituated to regard these lands in the first instance as their own, will not feel that it is necessary to retain only sixty five per cent of their proceeds to the general treasury? By this act you weaken, nay, almost destroy, the sanction of the old deeds of cession from the original states, which now cannot be violations of the constitution, and the legal title has been forgotten a contract which, after the lapse of a little time, shall seem to carry with it no moral obligation. I mean up all when I say that the success of this measure is the loss of the lands.

The ground of the objection which other senators have handled, of the great inequality in this plan among the several states to which the cession is to be made, further than to quote a passage upon that subject from the report of a committee in the Indiana legislature, made in February last.—

"Besides the objections that will be made to this measure by the old states, its gross inequality cannot make it generally acceptable to the new states. The portion allotted to Indiana would be double that of Ohio, and nearly as large as the whole of the whole of Indiana, Missouri, Arkansas and Michigan likewise. The result would be, that those states are to have the least benefit who have borne the heat and burden of the day. The settlement of Michigan, Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi and Louisiana, has been comparatively easy to that of Ohio and Indiana. They have endured no devastating wars, their homes have not been pillaged and destroyed and their citizens massacred, as ours have been; nor have they paid into the national coffers any thing like the sums of money that Ohio and Indiana have paid. Therefore, this measure of Mr. Calhoun, so unequal in all its bearings, cannot be acceptable, especially to Indiana."

To this I will only add, that it is impossible so unequal a system can endure; and, in its destruction, it is probable the relation will be altered by the deeds you have given them, stippled of all condition. In such a dilemma, of but little avail will be the defence in your deed, or your reverentary interest.

The committee of this body on the public lands of the last session did not attempt a vindication of this measure upon any ground of economy or right, but base their recommendation upon the equity due to the new states, and upon the impracticability of the subject as a topic of federal legislation; and, as if doubting the validity of their position, they attempted to lessen the importance of the matter by disparaging the fund deemed to be available out of the public domain. I shall not attempt to follow the committee through the intricate process of reasoning by which they endeavor to show that the present value of all the unsold lands in the nine states upon which this amendment would operate, (being 160,000,000 acres), amounts only to the sum of $28,400,000, or about 17 cents per acre, although it would be difficult to assent to such an estimate. The committee, to determine the extent of the subject, should have looked at that boundless territory which lies west of the states immediately named in the amendment, and which will claim its benefits the moment they are admitted to the confederacy. If it is idle to suppose that their claim can be repelled, nor do I imagine that the advocates of this plan contemplate any other result. The consequence is, that Iowa, or any of the territories, coming into the union with the new states, will claim an immediate cession of their lands. The average area of the western states is 30,000,000 acres; this, divided among 60,000 inhabitants, would be 500 acres to each person, and to each family of six persons 3,000 acres. Thirty-five per cent of this (their proper interest) would be five hundred to each family of six acres. What an appeal to the cupid of our territorial inhabitants! What clamorous demand will it begel, on the part of the territories, for premature admission into the union! What conflicts with your authority! How will the storm be blown in their cap, and corrupt the legislation of the federal states! If there can be any appliance to tempt the population from the old states into the territories, the wit of man could not devise a more effectual one than this.

But, sir, it will give rise to other and unusual difficulties. The federal government will be backward to extinguish the Indian title within the territories when the benefit is to inure to the people of those territories as soon as they are organized into states. The uniform policy of the government has been to extinguish those titles as fast as practicable; but now that the neighboring settlements have rendered the Indian lands more valuable, there will be a constant struggle between the territories and the federal government, to render it necessary to sacrifice. It has been the boast of our institutions, that amidst the jarring interests of states, the government has always preserved the most partial relation towards its provincial appendages, the territories. Let the policy of cession succeed, and this relation will be broken, and in its place will be substituted the most cold and bitter rivalry. One of the states named in the amendment, Michigan, has remaining within her limits about eight millions of acres of Indian lands. These lands lie adjacent to the most fertile and valuable territory. You had not many thanks from Michigan when you gave her these lands in lieu of those valuable possessions on the Maumee bay, and her gratitude will scarce be increased when you require her to pay for her own coders for the extinction of the Indian title.

I cannot omit, before concluding my remarks upon this topic, to inquire, what would be the condition of Indiana if this cession were accepted? Evidently on the subject of positive loss. There are remaining within the limits of Indiana, including the Miami reserve not yet purchased, unsold lands amounting to 5,776,000 acres. From this deduct the sixteenth sections reserved for school purposes, and the canal lands, (in all about 651,000 acres), and there remain 5,125,000 acres. A low market value is refused land which has been in market for twenty to thirty years. The whole cannot be estimated at more than seventy-five cents per acre, making a sum of $3,791,631. Thirty-five per cent. on this amount is $1,327,070, which is the gross sum to be paid by the state. Against this sum we have to set off the following amounts:

Gross amounts due the Missinies and Pottawatomies by existing treaties	$255,541
Perpetual annuities under those treaties of $26,070, equal, at 5 per cent. to a cash sum of	761,400
Three per cent. fund on net amount of $3,602,050 is	108,061
Estimate for extinguishing the residuum of the Miami title	550,000
Estimate (by the commissioner of Indian affairs) for expenses of emigration of the Missinies	55,000
Estimate (by the commissioner of Indian affairs) for their subsistence one year	36,666
Five per cent. estimated expenses of survey and sale is	189,581
	1,956,262
Estimate by topographical bureau for connecting Cumberland road in Indiana	3,144,250
	85,100,502

So that the state of Indiana, without including the Cumberland road, would be loser by the proposed cession six hundred and twenty-nine thousand one hundred and eighty-two dollars, and, with the loss of the Cumberland road, three million seven hundred and seventy-three thousand four hundred and thirty-two dollars. The committee on the public lands, in recommending this cession, expressly say that "their report has been drawn up on the supposition that expenditures in the new states by this government for internal improvements would cease should the bill pass;" in which they also include the annual appropriation for improving the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. They credit (by the operation of the bill) the federal government, and, consequently, charge the nine states embraced in the bill, among other things, with the withdrawal from those states of the following expenditures:

Grants and donations of land (except the sixteenth sections)	$7,017,540
Improvements in the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, and Cumberland road	6,999,274
Five per cent. fund to be surrendered by the states	10,214,262
	$24,171,076

This loss, it is true, they distribute through a period of eighty years, (the length of time computed to be necessary to dispose of the lands), but the states interested in those improvements would hardly be willing to forego, at so critical a period of their affairs, almost the only hold which they have upon the pecuniary patronage of the government. In every aspect in which it can be viewed, this plan of conditional cession is full of objections not to be overcome.

The amendment of the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CATTENDEN), proposing a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the several states of the union, is a renewal of a measure offered nine years ago by another distinguished senator from the same state, (Mr. CLAY), which twice passed this body, and was concurred in by the popular branch by large majorities, but did not receive an affirmative vote. It was then a measure of benefit and of fruitful hope; it is now remedial.—When we contemplate the present pecuniary condition of the states, and contrast it with what it probably would have been had the distribution bill become a law; and when we review the substantial series of measures which for the last nine years have marked the progress of the government, and their influence upon the policy of the states, it is impossible to suppress our regret at a loss which many years of wise legislation will never securely restore. When the distribution bill of 1832 was negatived by the president, the states were involved in the most trivial amount of debt.—At the present time the president estimates the annual interest upon their debts to the twelve millions of dollars, which at six per cent. makes a principal debt of two hundred millions. It is easy to trace this ruinous condition of the states to its primary causes, most prominent among which stands the defeat of the distribution bill. At that time your treasury, from an excess of revenue, was full of an unexpended war administration (of the government), was redundant, and your revenues outran the necessities of the government. Instead of withdrawing this excess from our exchequer, (which would have been effected by giving the proceeds of the lands to the states), the whole of our revenues were removed from their accustomed depository, the bank of the United States, and placed in the hands of the treasury, by the secretary of the treasury, these banks immediately increased their discounts to an unparalleled extent, and flooded the country with currency. Suddenly a wild and infuriated spirit of speculation overran the land. Individuals and states were hurried by an irresistible impulsion into the most extravagant enterprises, the sequel of which, on the part of the states, is found in the tale of two hundred millions of debt.

Meanwhile, our custom houses continued to pour their flood of revenue into the national coffers until in 1834 a surplus of more than forty millions had accumulated. As a measure of the highest necessity, this surplus was, by an act of that date, directed to be deposited with the states, the true effect of which was a distribution to the states of the amount paid under that act, about twenty-nine millions.—Unfortunately, for want of a supposed competency in congress to do so, no specific application of this fund was directed. Some of the states invested their portion of the fund for various purposes, others divided the principal sum per capita among their people, and the general effect of the distribution, the possession of the money was to induce new undertakings by the states, and an increased accumulation of liability. Their resources being thus squandered and exhausted, it was impossible that either individuals or states could long continue to serve themselves in such a career, and the revolution has come, with which we are all too familiar to require a recital of it.

Having looked at this situation picture, let us for a moment imagine what would have been our condition had the distribution bill been passed. Having withdrawn from our current revenues so much as proceeded from the lands, the deposit banks would have held no excess. The daily drafts of the treasury would have employed all our funds, and the banks could not have enlarged their discounts beyond the ordinary wants of commerce.—That rash spirit of individual adventure, which, combined in masses, controlled and directed the legislative councils of the country to the same ends, would have been stopped. The monies received by the states from the lands were directed by the bill to specific objects. These were, to purposes of internal improvement or the payment of debts contracted therefor, of education, and of the colonization of free blacks. This stimulated by no exultation and thus produced no extravagance, and what monuments would not the states already have built in aid of commerce! what prouder monuments in aid of science and of intellect—unburdened with debt, and endowed with means and capabilities for progress, and achievement in the arts, great objects of patriotism and benevolence through an untold series of years!

By a report from the secretary of the treasury, made in 1838, it appears that if the land bill of 1832 had passed, the states would have received, up to the 30th of September of that year, the sum of $57,227,230. Of this, the share of Ohio would have been $4,957,832; of Indiana, $2,965,744; of Illinois, $1,797,554; of Alabama, $1,965,934; and of New York, $8,190,102. These would have been the sum of money received by the states in addition to the two per cent. fund accruing to the new states, and to the expenses incident to the sales of the lands. In addition to this, Indiana would have received 115,000 acres of land to make her equal with the former grants, and the other states in the same proportion. To reach the same equality. If the author of the land bill of 1832 deserves what posterity will award him, perpetual remembrance from his country, what must we say of those administrators of our affairs who have had the states in that condition, and who have diverted, and the fruits of which are now like waters of bitterness in our mouths?

But gentlemen say that the distribution is unconstitutional, and in violation of the deeds of cession from the United States to the states.

In opposition to this view, I shall not detain the senate to recapitulate at any length the argument which has been so ably maintained, and is so familiar to the country. As to that portion of our territory ceded by the old states, it cannot be denied that congress look to it in trust—in trust for all the states, old and new, and not for the people of the states. In this respect the proceeds of the land are different from ordinary revenues which are collected from the people, and for their benefit, and not for the states. The proceeds of the land are the property of the states, and congress the trustee. There is no principle in law or ethics which prevents a trustee from surrendering at pleasure a trust; and into whose hands can he make the surrender but those of the cestui que trust—the benefit of the trust? And here this argument ends, and conclusively. For if, according to the very terms of the deeds of cession, this be a trust for the use of the states, it must, of necessity, be in their several and corporate capacity. The cession, then, cannot be found in our system. It was the states who surrendered to the federal government all the powers contained in our constitution; the most of these powers, in their exercise, operate upon the people of the United States, and the duties of the government inure to their benefit. But there is an exception in the very terms of the charter. I cannot, under our constitution, conceive the idea which has been expressed by the learned senator from S. Carolina, (Mr. CATTENDEN), of states in their aggregate capacity. I can in their federal capacity; and if in this capacity they were intended to hold their interest in the lands, the deeds would have expressed the tenure to be for the benefit of the "United States," and not "for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become and shall become members of the confederation or federal alliance of the said states, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions," &c.

Then came the constitution, providing that "the congress shall have the power to make and enforce all the laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into effect all the powers vested in the government by this constitution, and all the powers and authorities which shall be delegated to the government by the states." Then came the constitution, providing that "the congress shall have the power to make and enforce all the laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into effect all the powers vested in the government by this constitution, and all the powers and authorities which shall be delegated to the government by the states." Then came the constitution, providing that "the congress shall have the power to make and enforce all the laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into effect all the powers vested in the government by this constitution, and all the powers and authorities which shall be delegated to the government by the states."

Many powers have been exercised by congress which the constitution has not delegated in terms. For example, congress have made increments in state stocks; they have required duties to be paid on companies and other associations, to supply which other classes must be taxed; they have given five per cent. of the lands to the new states, and grants of land; they have granted pensions and bounties to individuals; they have purchased territory beyond the limits of the territory of the United States out of it confederate states, and the have made scientific explorations. Not one of these but is of more equivocal authority than the cession of the proceeds of the lands to all the states.

The senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CATTENDEN), is indignant at a proposition which, he says, is to withdraw four millions of annual revenue, to be applied by additional duties upon imports. If it be such an outrage to divert this four millions (the annual proceeds of the lands) from their proper use, into the treasuries of the several states, how much more grievously do we wound the constitution if we annihilate these proceeds altogether, and dry up the source of revenue? And yet, sir, the late president has made this very recommendation. In his annual message of December, 1838, general Jackson says: "It seems to me to be our true policy that the public lands shall cease as soon as practicable to be a source of revenue." And he proceeds to recommend such a disposition of them as shall bearly reimburse expenses. This was the very session after the land bill had been first introduced and passed this body, and yet the senator from Missouri now condenses it as an affirmation of the very principle annihilated by general Jackson.

For myself, sir, I subscribe to the doctrine that the lands are the property of ordinary citizens, and not of the government. The proceeds of ordinary revenue. In their management so many questions of state policy, of jarring interests, and of patriotic accommodation are mingled that they furnish too uncertain a reliance; and the competency of this government to administer them with all that is necessary for its economical administration is greatly impaired with high interests so immediately connected with the system of impost duties, plainly indicates another and a better direction of the land fund. That direction, sir, it is deemed an amendment under consideration, and it is demanded by a fair and unobscured stretch of authority which the people have rarely exerted upon their legislative functionaries. We cannot if we would shut our eyes to the condition of the states. Laboring under mountains of debt, I will not say that the burden of impost duties, in a year or two, become insupportable, and that their faith will be dishonored, because I believe they will sustain their honor at any sacrifice. My own state (Indiana) is largely a debtor state, but, during the suspension of 1837, she was one of only two states, I believe, in the union who were not in default in specie. And she will continue to do so. But a few days ago I saw a notice from her fund commissioner of his readiness to pay her present January instalment of interest.

The vice president then, in pursuance of the notice he had previously given, withdrew from the chair as presiding officer for the residue of the present session.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the senate proceeded to ballot for president pro tem.

On the ballot forty-six votes were cast—of which

Mr. Southard, of New Jersey, received	26
Mr. King, of Alabama, received	15

Mr. Southard having been declared duly elected, was accompanied to the chair by Messrs. Clay and Preston, when he rose and addressed the senate in substance as follows:

SENATORS: A custom which has existed since the establishment of the government requires from me, on this occasion, an acknowledgment of your confidence and respect. A feeling stronger than any law of custom leads me to the expression of my thanks. For eight years successively I have been a member of this body, associated with you in the obligations of duty, in the conflicts of opinion, and in the struggles of debate; with few exceptions, my conduct has been known to you as a United States senator. Under such circumstances, I must be far less sensitive than I feel myself to be, in regard to the opinions of my associates, if I could receive such a proof of your confidence without the deepest sensibility and the most grateful feeling.

I have interested upon me duties, to the discharge of which you may, I fear, discover that I am incompetent. Forms I have not studied; precedents I have never examined, and with the rules of order I have only made myself so far acquainted as to be able to keep myself within their limits. Experience in the duties of the chair I have had none.

But my omission to learn is not without excuse; the dignified order and decorum which pervades this body, the skill and intelligence which adorn the members little desire to acquire a knowledge of technical rules. I must seek, then, in the conduct, character and feeling of this body, an apology for any deficiencies which may be found in the execution of the trust with which I have been honored. In entering upon it, but for a short time, I have no promises to make, no pledges to give. The task required of me is not hard to be understood, though it may be found difficult in practice. I am aware, as you all are aware, that it demands a study of all the rules of order and modes of proceeding, legislative, executive and judicial; promptitude, decision and firmness, which must not hesitate to apply the authority of the body without considering on whom its pressure may fall; but, above and beyond all, an unswerving, unshaking impartiality toward each and every member. A failure in the former may be overlooked or pardoned; but no mantle is broad enough to cover the latter.

Should I fail in the former, I know that I have a refuge in the generous confidence and liberality of generous men; but I transgress in regard to the latter, you ought not to extend to me that charity which suffers long and forbears much.

I will not detain you with any remarks as to the importance of this body, or of its action in this government. There is no question of its position, however trivial or unimportant it may appear at the moment, which does not, in its ultimate consequences, operate on the great and permanent interests of the nation, and which may, at some moment, be made to bear on those free institutions which we find our best, and may I not say last, hope of securing liberty to man. Let each of us, then, in our respective positions, look to it, that our own hands be pure, and our conscience clear, where the great interests of our common country are concerned.

On motion, the senate went into the consideration of executive business, and, after some time spent therein, the doors were re-opened for a few moments, when the senate adjourned.

March 12. The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. Rives, to grant extra pay to those persons connected with the late war who had been permitted in a former resolution "making additional allowances," &c. was briefly discussed, and, on motion of Mr. Huntington, laid on the table.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and, after some time spent therein, adjourned to Monday.

March 15. Mr. Tappan laid before the senate a letter from Blair & Rives, stating that they should hold the senate to the contract made with them, as printers to the 27th congress, and demanding a copy of all the documents, the printing of which may have been or shall be ordered during the 27th congress, as fast as the orders shall be made, &c. &c. In the session of Mr. Preston, the paper was laid on the table.

Mr. Preston then rose and addressed the senate as follows: It is, I am sure, painfully within the recollection of the senate, that a few days since a very unpleasant collision occurred on this floor between the senator from Kentucky and the senator from Alabama. Any interruption of the habitual and characteristic harmony of this body or the parliamentary decorum of its proceedings, is, under any circumstances, deeply to be regretted—but certainly in the present case, inasmuch as the manifestation of heat occurred between senators of such long and distinguished standing. It might well be supposed, that nothing but mistake or accident could have led to such a result, and, thoroughly convinced of this, I rise, Mr. President, to state my conviction of the existence of misapprehension, and to state succinctly the mode in which it occurred.

On the occasion alluded to, the senator from Kentucky conceiving that the remarks of the senator from Alabama were calculated and intended to be injurious to his character, and personally offensive, retorted in language of direct affront—language which I am convinced he could not have employed but under a deep sense of injury. In this view of the remarks of the senator from Alabama, I am convinced, indeed, I am convinced, from information which has casually come to my possession, that the senator from Alabama did not intend to be personally offensive. At the bottom of this affair, therefore, there is a misapprehension, which is removed with pleasure, and in the confident belief that, being announced, the honorable and distinguished senators will permit no formal difficulty to arrest an adjustment which is earnestly demanded by the senate and the country.

Mr. Clay, of Ky. said he shared with the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston), in the regret which he had manifested, on account of the occurrence, disturbing the usual harmony and good feeling which prevail in the senate, to which he had alluded; and he bore with pleasure testimony to the high-minded feeling which had prompted that senator to make the apology which he had just presented.

Before he (Mr. C.) proceeded to respond particularly to that appeal, he wished to submit a few general observations on the senate in regard to the propriety of congressional or parliamentary debate.

Every senator had the most perfect right to speak with the utmost freedom of those who were in power; he might denounce them as arbitrary, wicked and incompetent, and their measures as tyrannical and dangerous to the best interests of the country. So it was equally the right of every member to deliver his sentiments without reserve on the character of all persons not members of the body, but whose names or characters were connected with the subject under debate, and all brought before the senate as candidates for appointment to office. All this a member has a right to do under no other responsibility than that which his own conscience and public opinion impose. But while this right was clear and undeniable, was essential to the discharge of official duty, and was in no case to be restrained, the same liberty did not extend to the language of senators towards each other, or in reference to their motives. In speaking to or of each other, the utmost respect and decorum ought ever to be preserved, all personalities, and especially all imputation of improper motives. Under these impressions as to the privileges of debate, and guided by these rules, Mr. C. had spoken, a few days since, of the elder editor of the Globe newspaper, whom he then proposed to dismiss from the position of printer to the senate. Had not that individual been thus legitimately and directly before the body, he should have forbore, as he had always hitherto, in his public station, forbore, to say a word in regard to him or the paper which he edited. Notwithstanding last year's most unparalleled abuse and unscrupulous attacks of himself, Mr. C. had remained silent; and so he should still have remained; but when the name of that person was directly before the senate, and his character and conduct of a public journal became a legitimate subject for its consideration, he had felt it to be his right to speak of him in the terms he had done. When, on the next day, the senator from Alabama (Mr. King) addressed the senate, he must say that whilst that gentleman was speaking, he had thought that there was on his part, a studied, a premeditated, and, as he then believed, a preconceived design to make an assault upon him and his character. And when the senator concluded by instituting a comparison of Mr. C. to a man whom he had, but a day before, declared to be infamous, and of whom he had spoken as a common libeller, and of his paper as libellous, he did not doubt that his object was a personal offence to Mr. C. It was under this impression that Mr. C. had addressed to the senate some remarks which he intended as deliberate offences to that senator.

But it was due to the senator from Alabama as well as to himself to state that he had since received satisfactory information on which he placed implicit reliance, that there had been no purpose or intention on the part of that senator to offer any personal affront to Mr. C. or to cast the slightest imputation on his character or honor. Mr. C. had therefore been mistaken as to the design which he had supposed that senator to entertain; and he must have entirely misapprehended the language employed. Ready, therefore, at all times promptly to repair an injury as he hoped he ever should be to repair an indignity, and always taking more pleasure to repair than to retaliate, and without any regard to the nicety of mere technical forms, to which those acquainted with him well knew he never attached great importance—under these circumstances as thus explained, and with the understanding which he now had of the intentions of that senator, it was with infinite pleasure to him declared every epithet in the least derogatory to him, to his honor, or to his character to be withdrawn.

[This declaration elicited a spontaneous burst of applause from the surrounding audience, who had listened with eager attention to all that he said. The chair, however, interferred, and the applause was immediately suppressed.]

Mr. King said: I concur with the senator from Kentucky as to the duty which every senator owes to himself and to his constituents. It is his duty. He should studiously avoid all personalities, and keep himself strictly within the rules of order, and never depart from decorum in debate. I have long been a member of this senate, and I can fearlessly appeal to my brother senators to say whether on any occasion I have violated prescribed rules, or been guilty of indecorum in debate.

The senator from Kentucky, from whom he received the information, has not been misinformed. That senator having said that characteristic frankness, explicitly and avowedly the senator's expression used by him, I now feel myself at liberty to state, and I do it in the same spirit of frankness, that nothing which was said by me was intended to be personally offensive to that senator; nor was it any design in me to offend him. I felt that his character as a gentleman or man of honor. I make this statement with pleasure; for, while I am always prepared to defend my honor when assailed, I carefully avoid attacking others.

Mr. Preston stated that he could not repress the feelings which prompted him to congratulate the senate and the country upon the honorable adjustment of this painful controversy. The gentleman had acted as became their high character and distinguished position—affording an example for the future, of a fearless and candid course under circumstances of apparent difficulty; while the painful suspense in which the senate has been involved for some days would be, he trusted, a guaranty for the cautious maintenance of a scrupulous forbearance in debate hereafter. Again he congratulated the gentleman, the senate, and the country.

[On the conclusion of these remarks, Mr. Clay rose and advanced to Mr. King, and shook hands with him, amidst loud applause from senators and auditory.]

On motion of Mr. Rives, the letter from the adjutant general explanatory of an amendment which had occurred in the proceedings of the court martial on the trial of major general Scott, was ordered to be printed, together with a letter from the secretary of the senate in relation to the same.

On motion of Mr. Merrick,

Resolved, That a committee of two senators be appointed to wait on the president of the United States and inform him that the senate, having finished the business before them, are ready to adjourn unless he may have further communication to make.

Mr. Merrick and Mr. Phelps were appointed by the chair the committee.

Mr. Merrick, from the committee appointed to wait on the president of the United States, reported that the committee had waited on the president, in pursuance of the resolution, and had been informed that the president had no further communication to make, expressing, at the same time, his kind regard for the senators, individually and collectively, and his best wishes for their return to their homes.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate then adjourned without day.

CHRONICLE.

BAVKE. The Georgia Rail Road bank, suspended payments on $250,000, after paying $200,000 in specie funds. The directors say they still have $100,000 of specie to resume with when the ensuing crop shall have enabled their debtors to make payments.

NEW YORK. The New York Exchange has been closed for some time on account of the depreciation of the credit of her moneyed institutions. The notes of the free banks are at a heavy discount, and the safety fund institutions are closed.

The Richmond Compiler of Wednesday says: "A sale of Virginia stock took place at the Coffee house yesterday, 20 inst., brought $76. This is the first time in price, that is, no indication of any positive diminution in the intrinsic value of the stock. It only shows the scarcity of money."

BEST ROOT SUGAR. The Boston Journal remarks that there are, comparatively, but few manufactures of the immense quantities of sugar manufactured on the continent of Europe, from the beet root. It is computed that in France there are nearly six hundred beet root sugar manufacturers in operation—and the whole amount of the annual production in Europe, is estimated at 150,000,000 pounds. In Austria and Italy, this business has lately been neglected with the exception of a few small quantities in the latter country, and in France and Germany, it has increased greatly within the last six or eight years. The duties on sugar imported from the French colonies have lately been reduced. What effect they may have on the manufacture of beet root sugar, time will determine.

JOSEPH BONAPARTE. The count de Surville (Joseph Bonaparte), whose health suffered severely in the campaign, has had a quite re-established. The poor of St. Louis's Kirby, a wandering beggar, died at New-Brunswick Paddock, where the count resides, have had 25 guineas distributed amongst them by his orders. The uniform benevolence displayed by the ex-king during his protracted residence in England, has been so generally indicated that the epithet of "the good Joseph," applied to him by madams Junot in her memoirs, was fully merited. He is extremely popular in his neighborhood.

(English paper.)

BOSTON AND LOWELL RAIL ROAD. From the last annual report we learn that four miles of second track have been laid during the last year, making twenty miles of this track now in use, and leaving about five miles only to be laid, which will probably be completed in the course of the ensuing summer. The amount expended in construction to the present time is $1,722,342; leaving of the capital unexpended $70,757. The receipts of the last year amounted to $231,275, of which about passengers in cars of the Boston and Lowell rail road $59,23; merchandise in do. $8,323, mail $353; passengers from the Nashua and Lowell roads $4,247; merchandise in do. $2,228; and from the Rogers from Boston and Portland rail road $16,733; merchandise do. $4,358.

The expenses of the year were for repairs of road $2,112; interest of money and salaries, 12,453; other expenses $55,933; total $91,400. Two dividends have been paid during the year, of four per cent. each; on $1,690,000, amounting to $132,000.

BOSTON HARBOR. It appears by statements made by the committee of the most intelligent merchants of Boston, before a committee of the Massachusetts legislature, during its present session, that Boston harbor is gradually filling up.

CANAL ACROSS THE Isthmus. By advice from Panama, brought by the schooner America, from Chagres, we learn that the department, or state, is now called, remained quiet under the new order of things, and that the obstacles heretofore interposed, by the clashing of the local and general governments with regard to the proposed canal across the Isthmus, have been efficiently set at rest.

This important undertaking seems at length in a fair way to be accomplished, through the mediation of the Franco-Granadian company, established in Paris. The necessary funds are already provided, and we are assured that the work will be immediately commenced, and prosecuted to its completion. Further particulars in our next.

(N. York Jour. Com.)

THE COTTON TRADE. The following table exhibits the movements in cotton this season, to the latest dates, from the ports respectively, all calculated from the first of last October.

CONVENERGENCE. The convener of the rev. Dr. Elliott, as bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church for the diocese of Georgia, took place at Savannah on the 15th ult. There were present, the bishop of North Carolina, bishop Giddens, of South Carolina, and bishop Mead, of Virginia, besides the rectors of many diocesan churches. The ordination sermon was preached by the bishop of Virginia.

HENRY CLAY reached Baltimore on Tuesday evening, and on Wednesday morning was taken suddenly ill, but is recovering.

EXCHANGE. New York on London 64; on France 56; on Amsterdam 104; on Philadelphia 104; on Richmond, Norfolk, Raleigh, Wilmington, &c. 3s 3d; Charleston 21; Augusta 13; Macon 20; Columbus 15; Savannah 41; Mobile 10 1/2; New Orleans 8; New York 10 1/2.

EMIGRANTS. The department of state has a statement of the number and description of passengers who arrived in the United States, from foreign countries in the year 1840, so far as returns have been received at the consulates. The returns are incomplete; they however, show that 113,206 persons came to the United States, by sea, during the year.

ERICKSON'S PROPELLERS. The barque Clarion, which has been fitted up with Erickson's propeller, made a trial of her speed on Friday in New York harbor. The experiment has been entirely successful—the machine made seven and a half miles per hour, when the engine made forty-one revolutions. They are talking about applying the propellers to all the New York packets.

EXTRA SESSIONS. The following extra sessions of Congress have been called since the organization of our government.

John Adams was inaugurated on the 4th of March, 1797. He convened congress, May 1st 1797. His first extra session was convened on the 10th of March, 1801. Thomas Jefferson was inaugurated the 4th of March, 1801. He ordered a call session Oct. 17, 1803.

James Madison was delivered on the 4th of March, 1809. He convened congress May 23, 1809, also on the 23rd of May, 1813.

Marin Van Buren was inaugurated the 4th of March, 1837, and convened congress the 4th of Sept. 1837.

William Henry Harrison was inaugurated on the 4th of March, 1841, and convened congress on the 31st of May, 1841.

FLOCK. In Boston $1 50; for Howard street $4 75; fancy brands 6 12 1/2.

FLORIDA. St. Augustine, March 7. Information reached here last evening that an express arrived at Pliska, from Fort Russell, on the night of the 4th, bringing intelligence that captain Barstow, with one hundred men, (including nine mounted), came up with the Indians (whom heapt. Alburta had been compelled to retreat from on account of the smallness of the detachment) on the 2nd of March, and had captured an attack upon them. Captain B. had placed the nine mounted men in ambush, as a reserve, and led the rest of the company in finding the Indians in such a body, he made a signal for the mounted men to advance. No sooner was the signal made, when the Indians, having cut off these men from the main body, fired upon them, killing six, and wounding three, who retreated to the fort, being wounded. The express was met six miles off the Pliska, without knowing any thing further. The wounded men state that captain B. was killed.

Captain Carr, 51 dragoon, with one hundred men, was sent out from Pliska a few days previous, and returned shortly after the express had arrived from Fort Russell. He immediately supplied his men with provisions, and started for captain Barstow's band ground. It is impossible to give the particulars under such a circumstance. There is no knowing the loss, as yet, that captain B. has met with. Lieut. Alburta had lost six or seven men the day before, in his skirmish with the Indians, and was forced to retreat on account of their number. This looks very much like a New Orleans.

ICE. An English paper mentions that one of the American ships at Calcutta, recently landed 400 tons of ice, which sold at the wholesale rate of one penny per pound, getting a profit, exclusive of port duties, of upwards of 100 per cent.

LOSS OF THE STEAMBOAT RANDOLPH. On Tuesday evening, the steamboat John Randolph struck a snag during her passage up the river, a little above Carrollton, and went down shortly after. The Coastwise states that the destruction of property is estimated at $150,000, mostly insured. There were 200 hhds. of sugar on board. The boat was insured for $30,000, but cost more. A rumor prevails that a number of persons lost lives—this does not appear to be confirmed.

(New Orleans Bee.)

LAW DECISION. We understand, says the St. Louis New Era, that the circuit court, at its sitting on Wednesday, decided that the devolution of a steamboat, or other vessel, from her regular route, except to save life, violated the policy of insurance, and released the insurers from liability. The case before the court was that of the steamer R. R. Reed, a few years since in the lower Mississippi. She had two days of her trip to render assistance to the George Collier, aground upon her bar. After getting her off, she proceeded upon her regular route, and on the next day, she and her cargo became a total loss. The owners of a part of the cargo brought suit against the insurance office for the recovery of the amount insured.

The court judge (strongly) was against the right of the plaintiff to recover. So that it should be generally understood by navigators upon the western waters, that to stop their vessels, or to deviate from their usual route, except in the emergency of a straits not only the policy of insurance upon the boat, but likewise the cargo. Such has not generally been regarded as the law, for the uniform practice has been for the boats to relieve each other when in difficulty. The principle is, we are told, new, such a case not having been before presented in any of the courts for adjudication.

THE MISSTRICK. We paid a visit, says the New Orleans Commercial Advertiser, to the skeleton of the gigantic animal to which this name has been attached, as commemorative of the spot where it was discovered. It is difficult for the imagination to conceive the size and form of the creature, which was certainly undoubtedly attired by these stupendous relics—a creature, half elephant, half crocodile, of such colossal stature, that the largest living specimens of animated nature, shrink into Lilliputian dimensions when contrasted with its wonderful bulk. A mammoth, to whose daily food the monsters of the deep must have contributed, and whose mammoth mass could only have been grown by the prodigious quantity of the country which it infested. The history of this marvellous creature is buried in oblivion, or only preserved in the dim and fabulous traditions of Indian tradition, and yet to the naturalist and man of science, it affords a source of profound instruction and information, as its habits, food, mode of existence and the probable period when it roamed the prairies of the West, may be ascertained from the waters of our largest streams, may all be either satisfactorily determined or approximately deduced from an examination of its bony carcass.

PASSENGERS TO THE INSANITARY. Lyford's Commercial Advertiser states that "the number of passengers, according to tickets, who were taken to the city of Washington, from February 20th to March 4th, inclusive, was only 2,496; the number that came on the 10th of March, for Washington, was 1,000; and the number that came on the 15th, 1,700; and the number belonging to this city, who took seats on the 3d and 4th, which is included in the first named number, was 967."

THE PROPECT OF THE GOLD MINES IN THE U. S. It is estimated that more than two millions of dollars per annum. Within the last three years, there have been mined from these mines, $1,337,550.

STOCKS. Shares of the U. S. bank of Pennsylvania are quoted at 16 1/2 in New York, and sales of 335 shares on the 16th in Philadelphia at 16 1/2; Indiana bonds 50 1/2.

WEBSTER'S REPLY TO HAYNE. The Washington correspondent of the Boston Atlas relates an anecdote in relation to the celebrated reply of Mr. Webster to Mr. Hayne that has never before been published. At the time of the delivery of the famous speech, the National Intelligencer, who had been the most accomplished reporter in the country, chanced to be in the capital. Hearing that Mr. Webster intended to reply, and being told by his friends that he would not undergo once more his long neglected location of a reporter. In—read, however, of consuming about half an hour, as Mr. Webster had promised in the commencement of his speech, he went to the gallery before he had finished—Mr. Gales continuing to take note of every word, in the momentary expectation of his concluding.

Unwilling to leave off before Mr. Webster had finished, Mr. Gales continued the next day until he had concluded. But when he came to look at the notes, the magnitude of the task that it would be to write them out, appeared so formidable, that he shrank from it as an impossibility, with the many other engagements that occupied his time.

Soon after, Mr. Webster called upon Mr. Gales to require him to do his duty. This it was impossible for the former to give any thing beyond a mere sketch, having spoken unpreparedly, and to much greater length than he had any expectation of doing when he began. Mr. Gales, however, was not to be so easily complied; but his lady, who had been in the habit of assisting her husband in reading his notes when a reporter, undertook the task. This the course of a week, Mr. Gales submitted to Mr. Webster a full report of his speech in the hand-writing of his wife. It will be remembered that that speech of Mr. Webster was not published until after the expiration of a week. It was owing to these circumstances. Mr. Gales has now in his possession the notes, handsomely bound.

It is stated that Mr. Webster did not change five words in his speech. This is the case of a very few instances on record, in which we have a master-piece of eloquence taken down as it fell from the lips of the speaker.

MR. VAN BRECK. ex-president, left Washington on the 13th instant, arrived a few days in Baltimore, where he received the news of the death of his wife. He left on the 16th for Philadelphia. He notifies his friends in New York, in a letter declining a dinner there, that he will be in New York on the 18th instant.

WOLVES IN THE MOUNTAINS. It is said that Krumpholtz, a hunter in Owyhee, one of the Sandwich Islands, has slain more than nine miles in circumference, and a few three fourths a lake of liquid lava, one mile and a half long, and of a burning intense heat, and glowing with incense brilliancy.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The steamship Caledonia arrived at Boston at eleven o'clock A. M. on Saturday the 20th instant, having left Liverpool on the 4th instant.

The packet ship George Washington, which sailed from New York February 9, and carried out intelligence of the third suspension of specie payments by the United States bank, arrived at Liverpool on the 31 of March. This intelligence did not, of course, reach London till the next day, and we have no account of its reception in that metropolis. It is announced in the Liverpool papers, but none of them contain a word of comment.

The bills on Messrs. Morrison drawn by the U. States bank, have been accepted, and a portion of them subsequently discounted by the Bank of England.

From China there is nothing of much consequence. The over-land mail had not arrived when the steamer left. From Syria, Egypt and Turkey, the news was still a pacific as usual. Mehemet Ali, unable to resist the allied powers, appears disposed to put the best face upon affairs, and to submit with the best possible grace to an unpleasant necessity.

The Greeks, so far as it goes, is pacific. There is, certainly, nothing that would seem at all to threaten the present amicable relations of the European powers. In the house of commons, on Monday, Lord Palmerston said that he saw nothing which, in his apprehension, was likely to lead to the disturbance of pacific relations between France and England.

The Liverpool Mail blusters and talks of war, but is entitled to no attention. It is particularly vindictive against this country. It says: "the revenue is declining—the expenditure is increasing—we are at war in China, and we shall be at war with the United States in the course of six weeks, and most probably with France also. Lord John Russell has therefore quite enough to do, and we wish him a safe journey." If he could manage to stir up a rebellion in Ireland, it would tend very much to the tranquility of that country; for, when we are at war, we can never have too much of it. The sooner it rages, the sooner it ends. Ireland will never be a peaceful and prosperous country until it is reconquered and thrashed into obedience. The United States will continue to plunder and plunder until New York is burnt and Maine smouldered. The news brought by the packet yesterday is conclusive on this point."

The McLeod affair and the boundary question had caused much talk in England, the former, at one time, being the all engrossing topic.

It was rumored in Paris at the latest dates that the French cabinet was disposed to offer her mediation to arrange our McLeod dispute with the U. States.

United States bank. As the news of the suspension of the Philadelphia bank had just reached Liverpool, and is announced without comment in the papers of that city, it is impossible to judge of the effect it has produced.

ENGLAND.

London, Wednesday, March 3. The excitement here was intense when the news respecting the arrest and imprisonment of McLeod was promulgated, and the funds slightly declined in consequence. That excitement is now over, and the funds have recovered—the public being under the impression that the next advice from the United States, both as regards the case of McLeod and the boundary question, will place these difficulties between the two governments in a more favorable position.

The boundary question. In the house of commons, Feb. 15, sir Robert Peel addressed an inquiry to the foreign secretary, respecting the question of the northeastern boundary of the U. States, to which he received the following reply:

Lord Palmerston said that the present situation of affairs was this: Great Britain had first proposed a draft of a convention for the appointment of a commission to settle the boundary. That draft had not been accepted by the United States, and a counter draft was sent over by that government. It was not one of which ministers in this country could accept, and in the early part of last year they made another proposal. They thought that it would have been accepted by the American cabinet; but it had been dispatched to Great Britain another proposition, which had not received answer on this side of the water.

They survey on which a report had been made had taken place independently of the pending negotiation in order to save time, and to secure as much information as possible relative to the geographical interests of Great Britain. Of course what had been done was only on the ex-parte statement of the British commissioners, and could not be binding (nor was it, of course, meant to be so), upon the other party. The United States had also sent commissioners of their own to inquire, in the latter part of last summer, but he believed they had not made any material progress.

Capture of the Caroline. In the house of commons on the 1st inst. sir J. Graham addressed an inquiry to ministers in relation to a pension granted to lieut. McCormick of the royal navy, for wounds received in the service, and the nature of that service. Lord John Russell answered that the services of lieut. McCormick, in the capture of the Caroline, had been recommended for a pension to the lords of the admiralty were performed by him under the command of the supreme colonial authorities in the capture of the Caroline. That recommendation had been given in the house of admiralty in the commencement of the last year.

Parliament has been occupied principally with subjects of little interest to the American reader. The trial of the earl of Cadogan, in the house of lords, is the principal topic of conversation. The trial occupied the whole of Tuesday the 16th inst. The court returned an unanimous verdict of "not guilty," the duke of Cleveland answering "not guilty, heavily, upon my honor." The evidence failed to prove the identity of capt. Tuck-It as described in the indictment.

Six hundred and forty-eight thousand passengers were conveyed during the last six months upon the Great Western railway, without a single fatal accident to one of them.

The Thames tunnel is now 1,124 feet 8 inches in length, and the excavation for the shaft has been made to the depth of 23 feet, leaving only about 50 feet more to be completed.

The Globe (ministerial paper) announces that her majesty is again in an "interesting situation," at once exciting the hopes and sympathies of the nation.

Sir Will Colborne is to succeed sir John Harvey, governor of New Brunswick, who has been recalled.

Loss of the Governor Fenner. One of the most awful collisions that ever took place at sea, happened on the morning of Saturday, 20th ult. about two o'clock. The American ship Governor Fenner, captain Andrews, left Liverpool the preceding day, about noon, with a crew of seventeen men, and one hundred and six steerage passengers, consisting of men, women and children; and when off Holyhead, she came in collision with the steamer Nottingham, striking her hullsides, and reducing her to a complete wreck. Contrary, however, to what might be expected, the vessel striking sustained greater injury than the one struck. The Nottingham, though greatly injured, continued to float, and ultimately arrived in port; but the Governor Fenner was dreadfully shattered, that she began to sink immediately, and in less than five minutes went to the bottom, engulfing in the waves not less than one hundred and twenty-two souls! The only persons saved belonging to the ship, were captain Andrews and the mate, who were both on deck when the vessels struck. The mate saved his life by jumping from the fore-yard-arm on the deck of the Nottingham, and the captain after failing to jump on the steamer, caught a rope that was hanging from her side, just as his own vessel was going down. The shrieks of the unhappy passengers, who were roused from their beds by the shock, were most appalling; but in less than five minutes the vessel went down, carrying with it every soul on board.

The Governor Fenner was a ten year old ship, built at New York, and was repaired at Liverpool, and strengthened, at an expenditure of $8,000, with a number of iron keels. She was about 500 tons burden, and was considered in every respect one of the best and most seaworthy of the vessels of her class. She was the property of Messrs. Andrews & Co. of New York. The commander, capt. S. E. Andrews, was a fine man, and owned a quarter of the vessel.

Liverpool cotton markets. During the week ending Feb. 20, the demand for cotton was extensive, and the sales amounted at 47,750 bales, including 17,300 American on speculation, and 436 for export. 25,500 New Orleans, at 6d. to 8 1/4 d. The sales of the week ending the 27th ult. were 51,750 bales, including 9,500 American on speculation; 16,250 New Orleans, 6d. to 13 1/4; 4,080 Mobile, &c. 6 1/2 to 7 1/2. The market being freely supplied, the demand was moderate.

Feb. 27. We have had a great demand for cotton to day, and the sales amount to 7,500 bales at very full prices, with a gradually advancing market. Speculators are by no means inactive, having taken an above line of 2,500 bales.

March 1. We have had another brisk day in cotton. Consumers are very active buyers, and have taken 5,000 bales at Saturday's full prices, in many instances an advance of 4d. on Friday's prices has been made; 2,000 bales are placed to speculators' account; to-day the market closes with a firm and healthy feeling.

March 3. To day there has been a very limited demand for cotton, not more than 2,500 bales, including 800 American on speculation. The partial advance obtained in the early part of the week is quite lost.

Liverpool corn market, March 2. The only alteration, on Friday last, in the duties on grain from foreign ports is a decrease of 14. 6d. per quarter on rye. Some further parcels of bonded flour, here and on the passage, have changed hands at 25s. a 25s. 6d. per bid, and some few purchasers, for export, have been made at 25s. at which this article is now generally held, and in consequence the spirit of speculation has a little subsided; in bonded grain little has been done, and prices quoted almost nominally.

March 3. At this day's market we experienced a slushiness, influenced by the decline in Mark-lane yesterday, and sales were made only to a very moderate extent of wheat at a decline of 1d. to 2d. per 70 lbs. and of other articles at barely the nominal prices of this day work.

The corn trade and the crops. A decided improvement has taken place both in the demand for and value of wheat within the last eight days; and it appears to be the general opinion, that a further rise in the price must occur. This disposition to speculate seems principally to be on the exportation, that the stocks are greatly exhausted, and that an importation from abroad will be required before next harvest. The quantity held by the merchants and millers is, we know, unusually small; but we feel convinced that larger stocks are held at the present time by growers than was the case at the present time of either 1840 or 1839. That there was room for a rise, after the unnecessary depression which prices underwent last autumn, we are fully prepared to allow; but, when we take the appearance of the sick-yields in all parts of the country, we think a somewhat too sanguine view of the subject is taken, and certainly are not disposed to believe that there will be any difficulty in finding the quantity of wheat necessary to carry us to the next harvest; whilst, therefore, the growing crop progresses favorably, no real reason exists to apprehend any very considerable rise on present terms, though a healthy trade, and the obtaining of few shillings up and down may, we think, be expected. The weather has, during the week, been mild and open, with a good deal of rain, which has kept the land in too wet a state to allow of fine work being actively commenced. Respecting the wheat plant, we continue to receive very satisfactory accounts, most of the reports describing the appearance of the blade as vigorous and healthy.

Most important and calamitous intelligence from Pechie and Chusan. At 9 P. M. on Oct. 6, H. M. S. Cruiser, H. W. Gifford, esq. commander, arrived from Chusan. Her letters were delivered to H. M. S. Columbian; the packet was large but few have as yet reached Macao. We presume orders from her superior officer prevented captain Gifford from remaining; but her arrival in India—should she be the first to arrive—would comfort the British in China will cause great disappointment to thousands.

The intelligence brought by the Cruiser is, that an imperial commissioner is on his way to Canton invested with imperial powers to amicably arrange the difficulties between the British and the Chinese, and that corresponding with his progress, admiral Elliot is proceeding with the whole fleet to the northward, with the intention of meeting the imperial commissioner in Canton, and to commence negotiations for the arrangement of affairs. The commissioner may be expected to arrive in Canton about the 13th or 20th inst.

Lin, the present governor of Canton, and formerly High Commissioner, is placed under what the Chinese call "examiners" who are to investigate his conduct since his arrival in Canton on March 10, 1839.

The state of matters in Chusan is very lamentable. Mrs. Noble, 3 of H. M. S. officers and 25 men (a boat's crew) had been seized by the Chinese, and sent over to Ningpo; they were well treated, and with fair speeches, the Chinese promise they shall be restored immediately the English evacuate Chusan. The last words we have heard are that captain Elliot and Mr. Morrison had gone over to Ningpo to negotiate for their release. Keshen has been repeatedly in communication with admiral Elliot; the Chinese statesmen is described as being perfectly blind in his manner, but where the son of his conversations was to deprecate the opium trade; and it is said some kind of buff promises have been made by the chief commissioner that the opium trade shall be one of the questions of the future negotiations.

We have heard the foregoing intelligence as being most important and calamitous; we consider it is the most disastrous, the most miserable intelligence that can go abroad for the national honor and commercial interest of England.

Mark and remark the absurdity of the proceedings: a British naval force arrives off the Peiho river; the mere appearance of these ships sends the Peking government into a tremor; the idea of depriving one of the highest officers in the empire to confer with the English barbarian on the subject of his grievances; well, why does not the barbarian, with his armed force—the emperor and his presence in the waters of the province of Pechie—he has already proved,—commence his negotiations—by negotiations are to be again commenced—on board H. M. ship, or at Tientsin, only 80 miles from Peking, the capital of the empire, and where the son of heaven, the sacred and supreme ruler resides?

Not he is cajoled by the bland, polite and wily Keshen to remove the only evidence of his power the only efficient part of his mission—her majesty's ships of war—near 2,000 miles to the southward, at the commencement of the northeast monsoon, and renew his negotiations in Canton—that city where the British name and nation has been trampled in the dust and robbed of its property! that city over which the English flag should have waved three months ago! But why should the British superintendent, who in April, 1839, he would make his boat to hold any one! O most lame and impotent conclusion! The result of the capture of Chusan, of the loss of British lives, the pinning sickness of gallant British soldiers, and the British negotiations in Canton—that city where the British name and nation has been trampled in the dust and robbed of its property! The result of the capture of Chusan, of the loss of British lives, the pinning sickness of gallant British soldiers, and the British negotiations in Canton—that city where the British name and nation has been trampled in the dust and robbed of its property! The result of the capture of Chusan, of the loss of British lives, the pinning sickness of gallant British soldiers, and the British negotiations in Canton—that city where the British name and nation has been trampled in the dust and robbed of its property!

The end, then, of nearly two years of intense anxiety is, that British affairs and interests in the autumn of 1840, are exactly where they were in the spring of 1838—not where they then were, but exactly where they are now, and consequently, in a most degraded condition.

Another imperial commissioner is to come to Canton to settle matters; this, doubtless not to be wished commotion, would have resulted before a single day had the British superintendent been ordered by British troops on June 22, and immediately afterwards possession taken of the city of Canton.

The effect of these negotiations will be to disturb matters, to cause great fluctuations in the markets, and injure very materially British commerce.

[Canton Register, Oct. 7.]

England and China. We commend to the attention of our readers the following letter, written by the rev. Dr. PAXTER, who has resided several years in Canton, and enjoyed unusual facilities for forming a correct estimate of the Chinese character, and of the contest, now become a national one, between a powerful island power and the greatest sovereign in the east. It was written at the request of a distinguished gentleman, but as the views of the writer, founded upon a close observation of events occurring under his own eye, differ from the prevailing opinions respecting that controversy, we are permitted to publish it, in order to present our readers with no common degree of interest.

To the hon. S. T. J. Sir: Several weeks have elapsed since our conversation relative to the existing difficulties between England and China. On the subject of the opium trade, I have had several occasions for conversation, and have been much interested in the subject, and with candor have endeavored to present the facts, concerning which there has been and still is great misapprehension in this country. At this late hour I reply to your request, and the often repeated solicitations of public men and private friends, to exhibit the views of disinterested and impartial observers, who have been in China during this revolution. As the opinions of most are strongly established against the justice of the British cause, it seems necessary to approach the topic with reserve and with claims well founded to impartiality. With increased attachment to my own country, from having left it, I can view, without bias, the virtues and vices of the Chinese. I can give no higher proof than that my life is devoted exclusively to their best good; that I love and honor England cannot be denied, and that I regret the partiality of her government and public men in this claim.

Two very common and erroneous opinions are entertained on this subject, viz: that the British government has sent a military and naval force to China, to perpetrate the opium traffic; and that the British object is to compel the Chinese government not to adopt by those who have resided in China. In official language the real object is "to demand for the past and security for the future" or satisfaction for wrongs acknowledged on all sides, which has been done, and to secure the commerce which, by imperial edict, has been "cut off to eternity," and, by right of treaty, to prevent the recurrence of the evil which has been inflicted on the Chinese on the one hand, and the prevention of the recurrence of outrages committed on the English on the other.

So far as appears, the British government has never sympathized with the opium traffic, but quite the contrary. Lord Palmerston, in 1835, addressed the British superintendent of the opium trade in China to this effect: "Her majesty's government cannot protect her subjects, in carrying on a traffic which is prohibited by the nation to which they trade." So far from fostering the opium traffic, the British superintendent, captain Elliot, in 1838, made overtures to his excellency Tang, governor of Canton, to meet him, or his officers, at the night depute, to concert measures for the suppression of an evil in which both Chinese and English were implicated. His excellency replied, "I rule over this land, and you, (i. e. the south of China); the evil which assails you, is not to me more than an insect upon a man's nose, which is brushed off at pleasure. I require none of your assistance." Then the British superintendent, upon the arrival of the British ships, ordered the British schooners out of the inner waters. His sentiments in reference to the result of this traffic, at that time, were thus expressed: "The distressing degradation of the foreign character, the painful fact that such causes expose us more and more to the just indignation of this government and people, and diminish the sympathies of our own." [Chinese Repository, vol. 7, page 432 and 3].

When captain Elliot heard of the appointment of an imperial commissioner, to repair to Canton to suppress the trade, he renewed his overtures to meet him, but with the same want of success. On the arrival of Lin at Canton, March 11, 1837, where he was met by an innocent and guileless captain Elliot, bearing of this traffic to the provincial city, at the risk of his life. Reaching Whampoa, he presented his passport at the custom house, but was told he could not proceed. Through a linguistic interpreter, he heard that British subjects are in distress at Canton. I hold in my hand the official permit to pass and repass between Macao and Canton; dead or alive, I am going to Canton," and passed on, pursued by Chinese officers and soldiers, and who could proceed no further than by her majesty's cutter, he took a small boat, manned with men from the ship Larne, and in full uniform proceeded, sword in hand, showing off the soldiers, and others that opposed him, and, during the officers to fire upon him. As the official boats were anchored in the river, swinging to the tide, before they could get round he had passed ahead of them, and by extreme good fortune succeeded in reaching the British ship. A new party, who had been sent, who claimed to be present, threw open the gate to him and fled for his safety. Had the wind died away, or the tide failed five minutes sooner, he had been killed, as the cordon of Chinese soldiers would have been too strong for him. He then proceeded to the British ship, and, after all communication. The manner in which the gallant officer effected his landing will long be remembered by those who experienced the emotions his presence afforded, and whose condition was thus improved. He then proceeded to the British ship, and, after all communication. The manner in which the gallant officer effected his landing will long be remembered by those who experienced the emotions his presence afforded, and whose condition was thus improved. He then proceeded to the British ship, and, after all communication. The manner in which the gallant officer effected his landing will long be remembered by those who experienced the emotions his presence afforded, and whose condition was thus improved.

The aspect of affairs was now entirely changed. Instead of being a difficulty between the Chinese and a few individuals, it became a contest on the one between the count of St. James and Tsou-Kwang. A British officer in the discharge of his duty, with two hundred or more of his fellow subjects, innocent or guilty become prisoners. The surrender of the opium, both that which was in China and that which was on the passage thither, was demanded on penalty of starvation and death. In this dilemma, captain Elliot requires it to be surrendered to him, judging, in my view, the government for the indemnity, and hence the ground for requiring pay from the Chinese. Had the contrary course been waded in the usual way, and the loss had been upon the party engaged in the trade, it is probable that the British government had never made any such demand.

Soon after the imprisonment of all foreigners in Canton, in conversation with captain Elliot, he remarked, (and the circumstances justify repeating what otherwise might seem a breach of confidence), "I repeat the words of Lord Palmerston. So far as the opium traffic is concerned, her majesty's government is prepared to go to the utmost extreme to suppress it. It is not to be a question of the life of a British subject, but it is the point at which a new understanding must be had between the two governments." In the second communication to Lord Palmerston, after his arrival at Canton, captain Elliot wrote, "I have the honor to inform you that every feeling of humanity must revolt."

In the manifesto of capt. Elliot, published in Chinese on the arrival of the British forces, Jan. 26, 1840, he uses the following language in reference to his former error: "The British government disregarded the immediate order of Elliot to forbid the imperial pleasure, which he was ready faithfully to do in a manner consistent with the dignity of the empire, the preservation of peace, and the obligations of justice to innocent and to absent ones, unconnected with the traffic in opium, &c." [Chinese Repository, vol. 7, p. 110].

That line of demarcation laid down by Lord Palmerston has been passed. A British schooner sailing from Macao to Hong-Kong, manned by seven jacks and one European, who never had any thing to do with opium in his life, (neither was the schooner carrying opium), was detained under Lanton. A Chinese war junk, or boat, approached her in this situation, and fired charcoal into the air, and then boarded her, and killed each of the crew as he did not jump overboard. Mr. Mass, the only white man, had his nose and ears cut off, and the latter warily thrust in his mouth, and he left in the bottom of the boat, as they supposed, dead, but he survives a witness against them. This act has been acknowledged by the government by bestowing rewards upon the perpetrators. At first it was presumed none but pirates could have done such a deed. Now, it is sincerely believed that it is the object of the British government to prevent the recurrence of such outrages, and to restore her commerce, and to perform a work which, when accomplished, shall lay the people of the East under lasting obligations to her, and, so far from meriting severe censure, shall receive the gratulations and thanks of western nations.

These are the views regarding the justice of the interference of the British government, which are generally entertained by all foreign residents in China. The impartial editor of the Chinese Repository (vide C. R. May, 1839, vol. 8, p. 8.) writes, "We would have the era which has been so well reached by our efforts to bring the united moral power of the western world to bear with an irresistible pressure on the high barriers which have so long separated China from the most enlightened and peaceful states of Christendom. The real ground of dissatisfaction with the Chinese is now to all. (Vol. 8, p. 8.) The rubicon is passed. Within the boundaries over which the Chinese claim jurisdiction, a force has entered that cannot be expelled and will not pay homage. The struggle now begun will not only ought not to end, until the cities, the rights, and immunities usually yielded to and claimed by civilized nations are secured. All the world must rejoice that such a force is here."

The wisdom of the course adopted by that force since its arrival in China is not now a subject of consideration; my object is obtained if the few of many facts, above alluded to, shall tend to correct the misapprehension of this public mind. The subject is not exhausted.

Our word in respect to the opium evil. Whatever speculative opinions may have been entertained formerly of the innocence of the use of opium, that it is a harmless luxury, can no longer be entertained. Though much has been published, both in China and in western nations, upon the evil, so far as I have seen, the half has not been told or generally conceived. The evil is of the most revolting character, and is it to be supposed that an enlightened and Christian nation, that gloried in having accomplished so much for the advancement of our race in other parts of the world, should send a naval and military expedition to China to force on her this odious traffic? If so, we may the voice of universal censure be raised against her, and the displeasure of Him who rules over the nations and avenges the wrongs of the innocent be feared and realized. With great respect, yours, &c.

Washington, March 15, 1841.

The treaty between France and Buenos Ayres is now passed by the two chambers, and ratified by the French government.

The French papers speak of the financial embarrassments of the government. There are not more than sixty millions of francs in the treasury—a sum inadequate to defray the ordinary expenses of the administration.

Inundations in France. The Rhine has again burst through its temporary banks; the river may be seen carrying away large trees, timber, and cattle, and sometimes even entire cottages. Dwellers in isolated habitations have become a prey to the most cruel suffering; many are to be seen on the roofs, raising their arms and voices, and crying for succor. The cattle have generally gone to the hills, but many have been drowned in the stables and farms.

General Bugaud has sailed for Algiers. Great works of colonization will be commenced in the Medjida, where a number of villages are to be founded and to be constructed. Two thousand Swiss Catholics, who had resolved on emigrating to America, have been invited by the French authorities to form a settlement in the Medjida, where they have been promised an extensive tract of land.

ALGIERES.

It is stated that col. Camignac had completely routed 900 of Abd el-Kader's regular troops, supported by a considerable body of Kabies, who presented themselves at the gates of the town. The ground was sharply contested, but the Arabs finally fled. The French loss is not stated.

SPAIN.

There was very little news from Spain. The Douro question having been settled, the Madrid elections had occupied considerable attention. Gen. Espinero had been elected senator at Saragossa. All the deputies returned by that city belonged to the liberal party.

There has been an outbreak by the medical students in Madrid, which, however, had been promptly suppressed.

PORTUGAL.

All the recent military demonstrations consequent upon the anticipated rupture with Spain, have been annulled, and the projected works of defence discontinued; the government has directed its attention to the measure, which has long been a favorite one, of dissolving the national guard, and re-constructing it on the principle of the old militia.

SWITZERLAND.

The approbation of the grand council of Berne has been given to the acts of the executive council. In aiding the government of Argau during the late disturbances by a majority of 70 votes to 16.

It is stated that the French government, in compliance with an application from the cabinet of Vienna, has sent instructions to baron Mortier, its ambassador to the Swiss confederation, to support the emperor against the emperor against the suppression of the convents in the canton of Argau.

SWEDEN.

Stockholm. The Russian ambassador recently assisted the footman of a lady of distinction. This, in the king's palace, is punishable with death; and as the lady has formally complained to the court, the reply of the emperor is most anxiously looked for.

TRAVEL, EGYPT, AND SYRIA.

The Levant mail arrived in London on the 3d instant, with intelligence from Turkey, Egypt and Syria, but the news is of little importance.

The dates from Constantinople are to the 8th ult. On the 4th a conference was held at the ministry of foreign affairs, between the ambassadors of the four allied powers and Redschid pasha, who had entirely recovered from his late illness. Nothing had transpired respecting the object.

The sublime port announced, on the 4th, in a proclamation, the conclusion of the Egyptian year.

The sultan expressed to Marabout Bey his satisfaction at the manner in which he had conducted the negotiations with Mehmet Ali. The whole Ottoman fleet, which reached the bay of Marmorie, and on the 5th a portion of it set sail for Constantinople. The rest was to have followed in a day or two.

It was expected that commodore Napier would shortly repair to Smyrna, and that two ships of the line, and that the remainder of the fleet would proceed, partly to Malta, and partly to Syracuse.

Advices from Alexandria are to the 7th ult. Ibrahim Pasha was expected at Alexandria or at Damietta, to ascend the Nile on the 8th or 9th ult.

The firm expected from Constantinople had not arrived, notwithstanding the despatch of the fleet, and private advices stated that neither it nor the return of the consul-general might be expected till the settlement of all particulars at issue between the portie and the pasha.

Further, that Russia was endeavoring to compass the downfall of Redschid pasha, as a partisan of British interests, and the negotiator of a secret treaty, whereby England had obtained the freedom of the Nile, and the Egyptian for her steam boats, and the maintenance of a garrison of 500 men, at Acra, &c.

Mehmet Ali had commenced his military colonization, and had promised commodore Napier that he would take an early opportunity of abolishing negro slavery. He had ordered a review of cavalry and military on the 6th inst. at which the commodore was present.

The plague still continued at Alexandria and Rosetta.

The Turkish forces under general Jochum were at Jaffa, and all attempts to interfere with the retreating army had been relinquished. Up to that moment, however, preparations for an attack had been persevered in for on the same day, 2d ult. letters arrived at Alexandria from Beyrout by the Emnetic packet, (three days en route), stating that they were shipping camels there for the attack on Gaza.

SOUTH AMERICA.

New Grenada. The following is a copy of a letter received by captain Waite, of the brig Enima, from an American gentleman. [No folk Beacon.

Maracaibo, February 13th, 1841. From our last advices received within a few days from New Grenada, affairs in that unfortunate country are represented as being in a most deplorable and gloomy state. The government troops 800 strong under colonel Musulas, marched into Cacueta, without any opposition; the inhabitants having deserted the town. General Herrera was on his march to the north with 1,500 troops destined it is supposed, for Mompox, where the revolutionary general Carmona has under him 2,400 well disciplined men. Mompox is a small town on the river Magdalena, distant about six days travelling from Carthagena, and he has no doubt selected that post to prevent his government troops from descending the river. General Marcano, the commander of Carthagena, has stationed a number of gun boats on the river to sustain him. In the republic of Venezuela every thing is tranquil; but should the revolutionists unfortunately succeed in New Grenada, fears are entertained that it will affect public tranquillity here.

The president of the U. States has recognized George Chacon, as vice consul of Spain, for the port of Philadelphia.

CIRCULAR.

Department of state, March 20, 1841.

To the hon. Thomas Faring, secretary of treasury:

Sir: The president is of opinion that it is a great abuse to bring the patronage of the general government into conflict with the freedom of election; and that this abuse ought to be corrected wherever

It will be time enough hereafter for the democracy to designate its candidate. It is not to be denied that feelings of personal kindness towards myself, and for which I cannot be too grateful, have been among the motives for this early designating me for the station from which I have just retired. This feeling constitutes a dangerous ingredient in political operations, and from no one could an attempt to check it proceed more properly than from myself. Preparations for the next presidential election are not, on this occasion, and at this crisis, liable to the ordinary objection of prejudging the conduct of the incumbent for the time being, inasmuch as he will, at all events, retire at the expiration of the constitutional term.

The most appropriate as well as most useful exertion which can be made at this time by my friends, is in adopting the best measures and means in their power for the explanation and diffusion of their principles, the detection of falsehoods, and the dissipation of truth among the great body of the people, leaving the selection of their candidate to a more suitable period. In the latter, the democracy never had less to apprehend from discussion among its members, since there has not, according to mature judgment, ever been a moment when the noble and patriotic sentiment advanced by their distinguished representative, "every thing for the cause—nothing for men"—was so universal among the supporters of our principles.

In the efforts to be made by the great democracy of the United States for the re-establishment of the general principles in the administration of the general government, I shall be placed, in many respects, by the station I have occupied and the known sentiments of the people in reference to the conduct becoming the position in which I stand, in the eyes of an observer only. But I will not, I assure you, be that of one indifferent to the result. I can never, while I live, look on an unconcerned spectator where the great principles, to the establishment of which I have devoted the best years of my life, and the success of which, I am assured, is essential to the welfare of my country are at issue, and my friends are struggling for their preservation with the stern energies of men conscious of the justice of their cause, and animated by the full assurance of its ultimate triumph.

I cannot close this communication without expressing my sincere acknowledgments for the friendly expressions of regard and confidence conveyed by your letter, and assuring you that they added much to the gratification I received from the honorable testimonial by which it was accompanied. Respectfully your friend and fellow citizen,

M. VAN BUREN.

THE McLEOD CASE. The hon. J. J. Crittenden, attorney general of the United States, left the seat of government last week, and proceeded to Lockport, New York, in consequence of the pending trial there of McLeod.

A correspondent of the New York American, says:—"The conclusion having been adopted, that in the present state of this question it would be improper to arrest the proceedings before an investigation into the circumstance of the offence of which he is accused, the following inquiry naturally presents itself: whether the federal government has a right to intervene, as the law now stands, for the protection of McLeod?"

That it has such a right under the constitution can scarcely be doubted, when it is considered—

1st. That the federal government is invested with the exclusive power over all the affairs of the country, and the states are prohibited from interfering with them in any manner except with the express consent of congress. Art. 1, sec. 10.

2d. All governments have, by the inherent rights of sovereignty, the power to maintain those rights, and to avenge or to exact satisfaction, or to pardon, as they may elect, any aggression upon them by other sovereign states or acting under their authority.

3d. As aggressions of this character must necessarily be the subject of national attention, and be repelled; or, if requisite, satisfaction must be exacted by the national arm; it follows that so far as the punishment or pardon of such offences may form the object of negotiation with foreign powers, the justification of the federal government by the constitution is complete, and that the states as to offences of this character. I do not intend to say that the state courts are divested of the power to inquire into such offences, or that they may try, convict and sentence persons accused of such crimes; do I mean to say that, under the laws as they now stand, the sentence may not be carried into effect. There is some doubt, how-far the 25th section of the judiciary act would authorize an appeal to the federal courts in case of conviction. Still, it is not probable that the executive of a state would hesitate, if requested by the president, to postpone the execution of the sentence, until congress should pass the laws necessary to bring the question within the cognizance of the federal courts—either by appeal after conviction, or by removing the cause before trial, in a mode similar to that provided in revenue cases by the act of 1833.

The want of a law to carry the powers of the federal government into effect may prove a temporary embarrassment; but it can be easily remedied at a jury for the term of the court to have commenced on Monday, the term would not be held, and the trial of McLeod will of necessity from this cause, independent of others, be postponed till the next term of the court.

Trial postponed. In consequence of an error committed by the clerk of Niagara county, in drawing a jury for the term of the court to have commenced on Monday, the term would not be held, and the trial of McLeod will of necessity from this cause, independent of others, be postponed till the next term of the court. The federal government will then possess the actual power, as well as the constitutional authority, of disposing of the question. The manner in which that power is to be exercised will form the next subject of inquiry. J. B.

Frontier defence. While we entertain no apprehension of any speedy, or even remote, collision with Great Britain, we cannot but express our surprise and regret that so little interest appears to be felt for the protection of our northern frontier.

From Buffalo to Mackinac—every foot of which is accessible to an enemy—there are not fifteen hundred troops stationed: Nor is a single fort or garrison—not a single block house or breast work—nothing which wears the slightest appearance of a fortification! The whole border is perfectly, shamelessly, exposed; while upon the opposite shore, there are numerous depots of war munitions—forts, garrisons, block houses, &c. well fortified and well manned. And within two days march of the lakes there are more than six thousand veteran and disciplined troops, ready at a moment's notice, to enter upon all the duties of sanguinary warfare.

PRINTERS TO THE SENATE. The discharge of the publishers of the Globe from the office of printers to the senate was upon the ground that the office had been taken over by an office at New York, accepting it they had received it with the implied condition that the duration of it might be determined at any time. It was urged on the other side that a contract had been made between the parties which the senate had no right to annul. On this point the remarks of Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, will show the views entertained by a majority of the senate.

Balt. Amer.

"What sort of contract was it? A contract which carried in germine the principle of its own dissolution. A contract with an office which had no business office at the will of the senate. He should like to know whether the employment of any officer was not a contract? It belonged to this class of contractors—after he have performed the work, I will pay you." There was the contract; and in accepting an office, which is itself a contract, with the pension accepted it with this consideration—that he could be removed at any moment. It was a parliamentary office, and all such were at will. No principle was better understood than that all parliamentary officers are at will. All were at will. The speaker of the house of representatives was at will—they might remove him. Did not our collectors, districts attorneys, and marshals, hold their office for a period of years, and yet with a definite condition?

"And what difference did the bond make? Did not their clerk give bond? And yet was he not removable? This was the effect and operation of the bond—simply, inasmuch as they were charged with a very important duty, that they perform the duty with fidelity as long as they remain in office. That was all. There was the limitation of it. It was in the nature of things—that if an officer holds his office at will, the same condition goes with the contract. He takes it subject to the necessary restriction. What, then, was the necessary contract? We were to have such and such an agreement, and you pay at a certain rate. And what did the other say? I will do it at this rate—subject to your wish or refusal. There was the contract, and the whole contract."

THE COTTON INTEREST. The subjoined advertisement, which we find in a London magazine, confirms the rumors for sometime prevalent in this country, relative to the formation of a large British company to promote the cultivation of cotton in the East Indies.

While on this subject it may not be uninteresting to furnish some estimates of the relative proportions of cotton grown at this time in different parts of the world. We derive the estimates from an able article in the Merchants' Magazine for March, and they are to be considered as very general in their character. They show, nevertheless, that the cotton interest is one of the greatest magnitude throughout the globe.

The entire growth of cotton in the world is computed at one hundred and twenty millions of pounds. Of this amount, it is estimated, that five hundred and fifty million pounds are produced in the United States; thirty millions in Brazil; eight millions in the West Indies; twenty-seven millions in Egypt; thirty-six millions in the west of Africa; one hundred and twenty millions in the west of Asia; thirty-five millions in Mexico and South America, exclusive of Brazil; and fourteen millions elsewhere. At ten cents per pound this crop would be worth one hundred millions of dollars.

Of this amount it is estimated that there are consumed or manufactured

In England,	350,000,000 lbs.
the United States,	150,000,000 "
France,	80,000,000 "
India and China,	200,000,000 "
South America and Mexico,	35,000,000 "
Germany,	35,000,000 "
Turkey and Africa,	45,000,000 "
Spain,	10,000,000 "
Prussia,	20,000,000 "

And the remainder elsewhere.

It is stated that the value of cotton manufactures in England is actually

In England, is actually	$170,000,000
In France,	70,000,000
In the United States,	60,000,000

The capital employed in the eastern states of the United States in the cotton manufacture in 1831, was $40,612,285.

The following advertisement explains the character of the projected enterprise of the British in the East Indies.

East India Cotton company. Capital, £800,000, in 20,000 shares of £25 each. Deposite £2 10s. per share.

Bankers. Messrs. Glynne, Halifax; Mills & Co. London; Macleod and Salford Bank, Manchester; Messrs. Beckett, Blyde & Co. Leeds.

Solicitor. Messrs. Swan, Stevens & Co. Frederick's-place, Old Jewry, and 10, Whitehall.

The principal object of the East India cotton company will be to supply the English market with a cheaper and superior cotton of Indian growth. The overwhelming importance of this question in relation to the manufacturer and the shipowner, was strikingly brought before the directors of the East India company by a deputation from the Manchester chamber of commerce, on the presentation of a memorial which stated, "that the quantity of cotton imported into Great Britain in the first eleven months of the year 1839, amounted to 1,374,316 bales, of the value of £14,000,000 sterling, in its unmanufactured state, of which only 96,112 bales were from the East Indies, of the value of about £600,000, or only five per cent. of the whole value of cotton imported, about ninety per cent. of our supply being drawn from foreign sources. That the value of the above quantity of cotton in its manufactured state was £10,000,000 sterling per annum, giving freight for 300,000 tons of shipping, and employment to upwards of 2,000,000 persons;" and concluded by pointing to India as an available, and at the same time a more desirable source of supply.

That a large profit is to be derived by improving the culture of cotton in India, and preparing it for the English market, has been placed beyond a doubt by the successful results of the experiments recently made; the difference in quantity alone, its superior quality between the indigenous cotton and seed without it, the great saving of its weight, being in the same field, as five to one in favor of improved culture.

It was evidently a conviction of the greatest interest at stake which induced the East India company, (although prohibited themselves by the terms of their charter, and such as it may be to procure from the United States, within the last twelve months, at their own cost, through the express mission of captain Bayles, a body of experienced cotton planters, who are now on their way to India. A deputation of the East India cotton company have had interviews of a highly encouraging nature with the late chairman and the deputy chairman of the East India company, the president of the board of control and board of trade, and the several parties in London, at Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, Newcastle and Bristol, interested in this most important object, all of whom agree in the urgent necessity that a company should be formed for the purpose of carrying out this object—the establishment of such a company being, in their judgment, calculated to insure ample returns to parties embarking capital, a relief from foreign dependency, and a wide channel of profit and employment to British shipping.

Applications for shares and prospectuses, with the names of the provisional directors, to be made to the bankers, to the solicitors, or to the secretary, at the company's office, 30 Backlbury, London.

FREDERICK MAXWELL DANDON, secretary.

THE GOVERNMENT STEAMER hoo building at the navy yard in this city, will be launched about the middle of next month. She is of beautiful model, and judging from a hasty examination of her last week, she is as strong and good as any can make her. Preparations are making for getting her engine on board, and her hull is nearly finished. Her copper is on, and the painters are at work on the bulwarks and men are preparing the "ways" for the launch. From the Journal of Commerce, that her iron cannon shaft and cranks are now on board of a tow boat in the North River, being the first attempt at making these parts of the machinery of iron. The shaft is 18 inches in diameter and 10 feet long, and weighs 12,461 lbs. They are from the West Point foundry.

SNAGS IN THE MISSISSIPPI. Captain Lee, U. S. engineer writes to the chief engineer, colonel Totten, that the river Mississippi was never so clear of snags as at the close of 1839, and indeed, the few that remained scattered over its length, can hardly be said to offer any obstruction. The whole number that have been removed the past year, amounts to 535, and the number of trees killed from the falling snags, 1,153. Of these, 4,097 snags and 167 trees have been taken from the Mississippi, and 950 snags and trees from the Ohio river.

ARMY.

The Savannah Republican of the 8th inst. says: the U. S. steamer Beaufort, is just in from Florida, bringing us the following interesting letter from one of our correspondents:

Florida, March 8.

GENTLEMEN: Another flower is marched to the sweat that decks the brow of our gallant, but wreath little army in Florida. The battle of Orange creek, by lieutenant Alberts, fought day before yesterday, though a small one, is seldom surpassed in skill, brave and determined perseverance. While sitting in the door of his tent, at Fort Brooks, lieutenant Alberts heard the crack of Indian rifles, immediately succeeded by their yells, in the direction of Orange creek bridge. He mounted his men, and found that, after leaving a small guard at the fort, he could command but twenty-three. With these he sallied forth, and in a short march, soon came upon the savages in large numbers, and poured upon them a shower of balls and buck shot. This caused the warriors to ring with their yells and brought upon him what was evidently the whole band of Alca Tustenuggee, long known to number from 70 to 100 warriors. Lieut. A. and his men returned the "war whoop" with imitative Indian ferocity, and thus the battle raged for half an hour, when the Indians took to flight, and the fort was left. As he supposed, master of the field—but it was a ruse to cut him off from the fort; as the Indians, stretching across in his rear, now attacked him with redoubled effort, but were again driven to the hammock, with only a few arrows, and the whole were seen to fall and be carried off. By this time the ammunition was exhausted, and finding the orderly sergeant, a corporal and three privates severely wounded, Lieut. Alberts returned to the fort. But he did not return to rest. He had not yet ascertained the cause of the first firing and alarm, and fearing for the fate of a small party sent by him that morning to Fort Russell, five miles off, for provisions, he put his men on the march, and in a short time with 18 soldiers again set out for the bridge, and passing the scene of his contest, soon came upon the dead body of corporal Long, who had been "on parade" hunting. This accounted for the alarm. He then crossed the bridge and hastened through the creek hammock, upon the edge of which he again received the solution of his fate. Tustenuggee from both sides of the road. Here the force and attack of the enemy was tremendous—their yells hideous and terrific. Two men killed and six wounded, fell in their tracks, but the balance raised the war shout and rushing the fire with the timidity of a deer, four of the red skins were seen to fall, and these in front gave way before the little band of soldiers. The Indians now collected in the pine barrens and skirt of the hammock, but not being able to retain their position, were driven to the edge of the road from bush to bush for a mile and a half, when they gave it up and returned into the hammock. At one time, during this last attack, the lieutenant mused how they would all be annihilated, but the cheering, the coolness and the bravery of the little band, was unlocked for by Tustenuggee's warriors.

This gallantry was worthy of a nobler field. As an instance of the coolness being displayed, private Lane, during the last of the engagement, finding his gun missing fire, was seen to drop upon his knee and taking out his screw-driver, removed the old flint, and inserting a new one, re-commenced firing more to his satisfaction.

For Holmes, E. F. March 3.

You are aware, I believe, that Gen. Armstrong has 380 men, women and children, in at Tampa, who are to embark for Arkansas on or before the 10th inst. They are closely guarded night and day, by a company of infantry and a company of dragoons, so that they cannot escape. I tried it, and were shot down and bayoneted—one killed instantly and the other died from his wounds. If Gen. A. gets these Indians off, as I have no doubt he will, will be more than has been done for many a day. I approve most cordially of his plan, and think, if it thoroughly succeeded, would succeed better than any thus far tried; but I am still of the opinion, that both on the score of economy and business, a force of at least 20,000 men should be sent here. However, I think our services, are likely soon to be exacted, for those which will "try men's souls." We cannot long keep out of a war with England and preserve our honor. As much as I deprecate a war, (and, unlike my friend Mr. Norrell, though a military man, I do not sincerely "deprecate" one), I would rather shed the last drop of my blood than submit to the wrongs she has heaped upon us. Not only so, but she violently enters our territory, invade our borders, murder our people, and attempt to dictate humanity to us in an affair that belongs to another nation. Does the blood of '76 run in our veins? Shall we then submit to what they ought not? Our wrongs are almost unnumbered. I have wandered from my subject, which was to give you Florida news.

Yours, truly,

Lieutenant Alberts, who so gallantly met his way with 17 men through 100 Indians in Florida, and reached Fort Russell, with only one man killed and one man missing, is a practical printer. He was a few years ago editor and proprietor of a paper published at Martinsburg, Va. but afterwards received a commission in the army from president Jackson.

NAVY.

The U. S. ship Cyane, from the Mediterranean, and Dolphin and Grampus, from the coast, were at the Cape de Verd Islands on the 9th of February.

The senior Colonel Hawley, of the United States army, "Colonel Hawley" built at Baltimore, under the supervision of captain D. S. Miles, assistant quartermaster, left on the 18th instant, for Piliaki, East Florida, via Norfolk, Charleston and Savannah. He is a distinguished sailor, and has been in consequence of the weather. This boat is commanded by captain John Pearson, and her crew consists of one mate, two engineers, three firemen, one cook and five deck hands. Captain D. S. Miles is a passenger on board.

Correspondence of the N. York American.

U. S. brig Dolphin, Porto Praya bay, St. Jago,

Cape de Verde Islands, Feb. 7, 1841.

My dear sir: We sailed from the quarantine ground on the 10th Nov., at 10 o'clock, and arrived at Madeira, and the Rio Nunez, arrived at Sierra Leone on the 10th January. The United States schooner Grampus joined us in the Nunez, on the 1st December, which completed our squadron on the coast.

We left Sierra Leone on the 14th January, in great haste, with twenty-six cases of African fever upon our sick list, and arrived here on the 29th. The schooner Grampus, having been detained by the illness of her crew, did not arrive until the 20th, when it attained its height, and numbered forty four, including the captain, 1st lieutenant and assistant surgeon, who were the only officers sick. Our ship presented the spectacle of a perfect hospital, with the trunk for our dispensary—and we lost nine men on the passage with fever, viz: H. Green, J. Morris, C. Grawold, T. P. Riccard, J. Downy, W. E. Burns, G. Pines, J. Smith, and Stephen Tyson; the two former jumped overboard in delirium, and the four former are a boat-swain's mate, a cooper, armorer and yoman, a great hole in the list of our petty officers, and which entirely broke our crew.

We left the Grampus at Sierra Leone; she was to and did follow us on Saturday, the 10th inst. and arrived here on the 30th, being as yet just 14 days, from the 16th of January. It was, in fact, one of the most remarkable coincidences, the greatest number per sick list at any one time was the same as ours, just forty-four.

The fever attacked her officers more generally than ours, and from port to port; Mr. Drake, (a midshipman, of Newark, N. J.) was in water, and with the gunner, and when she arrived here, the only officers not upon the list, were the captain, assistant surgeon and Mr. Drake; the two former were sick with fever for two days, and at the same time during the passage, and the latter was left all alone, with the sole charge of the vessel. She lost but three of her company, one of whom was her master, Mr. Albert Smith Whittier, (a passed midshipman, from Maine), and two others, viz: J. A. Smith, and on the night of the 23d; he was an honest to his profession, and died universally regretted by all who knew him.

It was our good fortune to find the United States ship Cyane here, bound on a cruise down the coast, by whose officers we have been treated with every kindness and attention, and to whom we feel very grateful, particularly to Drs. Hunter and Grier, whose assistance and attentions, as we were destitute of our own, were invaluable. She is now lying at Sierra Leone and Monrovia, and sails thence for the West Indies and home.

Our sick, and those of the Grampus, are ashore in the hospital and all, without a solitary exception, convalescing; some few have returned on board and are now doing light duty. The captain is staying with Mr. Gardiner, our consul, and for the last three or four days, has walked out. The doctor and Mr. Ward (our 1st lieutenant) are also recovering rapidly, and will soon be again on duty.

The climate, which is most delightful, has had the effect of magic on our sick, and has done more towards their recovery than all the medicines known.

The Cyane is to remain here until we are again upon our legs, and to the exertions of her assistant surgeon (Dr. Grier, who is surgeon of the hospital ashore) we are indebted to the early convalescence of the crew.

We shall not be able to leave here before the 1st of March, and it is to our regret that we cannot direct for the West Indies, and thence home, where we shall probably arrive about the middle of May. The Grampus is to return to the coast, and will be home about the middle of July. I annex a list of the officers of the squadron, which our consul says is the largest (the equal not the inferior), American one, ever before in this port, and which you may rely on for its correctness.

Of the U. States ship Cyane, viz: W. K. Latimer, commander; S. W. Giddin, 1st lieutenant; S. F. Hazard, 2d lieutenant; A. Taylor, 3rd lieutenant; B. M. Dove, 4th lieutenant; Lewis B. Hunter, surgeon; W. Grier, assistant surgeon; H. Bridge, purser; J. A. Smith, 1st midshipman; J. A. Smith, 2d midshipman; W. Reid, passed midshipman; F. Alexander, E. Allen, G. B. Balch, F. W. Colby, A. McRae, C. W. Place and A. C. Rhind, midshipmen; Geo. Cotto, cabin's clerk; Lieutenants F. J. P. Mason, and Mr. Goldsborough, are passengers home in the Cyane.

Of the U. States schooner Grampus, viz: John Stoue Paine, lieutenant commanding; C. Heywood, 1st lieutenant; J. P. Mason, 2nd lieutenant; S. W. Whittier, purser, (died 23d ultimo); J. S. Patterson, passed midshipman; A. J. Drake, C. S. Throckmorton, J. Ladd and A. McLaughlin, midshipmen; George Paine, cabin's clerk.

Of the U. States ship Dolphin, viz: C. H. B. commander; J. H. Ward, 1st lieutenant; T. W. Hunt, 2d lieutenant; J. D. Gibson, purser; R. W. Leece, assistant surgeon; M. Woodhill and R. D. Izard, passed midshipmen; J. Barry, C. H. Caldwell, and J. A. Smith, midshipmen; T. Meeker, cabin's clerk; Adam Young, master's mate.

By the arrival yesterday, of an American brig from the river Gambia, which is to sail direct for Salvador, we are, in fact, invited to leave the coast, and the opportunity of ending upon this ground, in fulfillment of a promise I made you just before leaving the United States.

STATES OF THE UNION.

EXECUTIVE. The following states have not yet chosen representatives to the 27th congress: Rhode Island, Connecticut, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, Illinois and Missouri—twelve in all.

Of these, Connecticut and Virginia hold their election in April; all the others in August, except Maryland, which holds its in October, but in the case of that, in case of an extra session, as in this case, the governor may have a special election for an election, and Mississippi, which holds its in November.

Authority may be vested in the executive of the other states to provide for a special election—though that we have no positive knowledge.

In New York a vacancy exists in the district lately represented by Francis Granger—which will be supplied by a special election.

THE FUGITIVE QUESTION. New York Virginia. The Boston American says: The inspection bill which recently passed the Virginia legislature, provides that any vessel whatever, owned in whole or in part, or commanded by any citizen or resident of the state of New York, or any vessel bound to any port in New York from Virginia, shall be subject to inspection—foreign and national vessels excepted.

The design of the inspection thus ordered is "to see that no slave or person held to service in Virginia, or person charged with the commission of any crime, shall be concealed on board said vessel."

The captain or owner of any such vessel departing without inspection is subject to a penalty, for the benefit of any person who will sue for the same. Every vessel as above described that enters within the limits of Virginia is to be taken under the eye of the inspector, and to be held by him until a bond with two sureties is given by the captain or owner to secure the payment of any judgment rendered on violation of the act. If the captain or owner cannot procure such a bond, then his promise, under oath, not to violate any of the conditions of the act, shall be sufficient. Every vessel is liable for the expenses of her inspection.

The act is not to go into force until May, 1842. The governor is also authorized to suspend its operation if the governor of New York should comply with the requisitions of Virginia for the surrender of three persons demanded as fugitives from justice, and if the New York law entitled "an act to extend the right of trial by jury," shall be repealed.

"It is not eight words of the bill that speak against the bill, believing that it involved an infraction of the constitution. It is certainly to be regretted that some means could not be found for setting the difficulty through the judicial tribunals of the country. Mr. Robertson, of the house of delegates, spoke of the bill, during the debate, in these terms:

"I believe it to be in conflict with the constitution of the United States—country to sound policy—doing violence to the friendly—nay, fraternal feelings which should prevail, which I am fully convinced do at this moment prevail, between the great body of the people of New York and Virginia—and as tending to loosen, and it may be, finally to sunder the bonds of our glorious and now happy union. I repeat, sir, with respect to state it, as my firm conviction, that the strongest feelings of regard towards one another, as well as of attachment to the union, pervades the great mass of the people of these two states. I look with confidence to that feeling to afford us that redress which is due alike to our rights and our safety. That feeling, that feeling will doubtless be wounded, bruised, by the passage of this bill; but I confide in the strength of it to overcome the tendencies of this measure, that are adverse to an amicable adjustment, and to render on justice in spite of the insinuations it is calculated to create."

House of delegates of Virginia. On the 19th, the following resolution was submitted to the house of delegates, by Mr. May:

"Whereas it appears, that the governor of New York has demanded of the governor of Virginia, a fugitive from justice, legally charged with crime in that state, and now confined in this; and that such demand hath been made in conformity with the constitution and laws of the United States; but that the governor of this state considering that the governor of New York, has very recently refused to comply with a similar demand upon him, made by this state, he deemed it proper to decline for the present to surrender the said fugitive. And while the general assembly both fully and lawfully, and the course adopted by the governor in his present refusal, to comply with a similar demand upon him, made by this state, and patriotic desire to induce the state of New York to comply with the constitutional obligations to this state; yet as the general assembly hath solemnly protested against the conduct of that state on the occasion alluded to, as a palpable violation of those obligations; and has maintained and still maintains that it is the duty of the executive of each state to surrender fugitives legally charged with crime, when properly demanded by any other state, is our imperative duty to reject the demand, and issue a resolution to that effect by the general assembly. That in its opinion, any fugitive legally charged with crime and demanded by the governor of New York, according to the constitution and laws of the U. S. ought to be surrendered notwithstanding the refusal of the governor of that state to act in a similar case."

On Mr. Bly's motion, the resolution was laid upon the table.

"This resolution was followed by another on the motion of Mr. Taylor, of King George, which was adopted. It directed the governor to endeavor to communicate the late executive order respecting a demand made by the governor of New York for the surrender of a fugitive from justice; and the reasons for his refusal to comply with such demand, and a copy of the demand."

In the course of the morning's session, the following communication was received from the governor: "Executive department, March 19, 1841."

"Sir: I have just received a copy of a resolution adopted this day by the house of delegates, requesting me to communicate the late executive order respecting a demand made by the governor of New York for the surrender of a fugitive from justice, and the reasons for my refusal to comply with such demand, and a copy of the demand."

"I accordingly transmit a copy of the order of this department, of the 10th inst, and of the demand of the governor of New York, from which it will be perceived that I have deemed it my duty to suspend a compliance with the demand of the governor of New York, until the governor of New York shall recede from his refusal to comply with a previous similar demand on behalf of this state."

"It is presumed that the origin and progress of this controversy with the state of New York are familiar to the house of delegates; and it is therefore hoped that the documents now communicated will satisfactorily respond to their resolution. Should the house of delegates or the general assembly, however, deem it their duty to take any further action in reference to the course of this department, it may be consistent with their sense of justice to direct the governor of Virginia to assign reasons in detail the reasons and responsibilities which have influenced my conduct. Your obedient servant,

THOMAS W. GILMER.

To the speaker of the house of delegates. The accompanying documents are forwarded to the following demand of the governor of New York:

"William H. Seward, governor of the state of N. York, to his excellency the governor of Virginia:

"It appears by the annexed papers, duly authenticated, and in the presence of Robert F. Curry, a delegate charged in this state with the crime of forgery—and it has been represented to me, that he has fled from the justice of this state and has taken refuge within the state of Virginia—"

"Now, therefore, pursuant to the provisions of the constitution and laws of the United States, in such cases made and provided, I do hereby require, that the said Robert F. Curry be apprehended and delivered to John D. Dix, of Illinois, who is hereby duly authorized to receive him, and convey him to the state of N. York, there to be dealt with according to law."

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto affixed my name, and the privy seal of the state, this 14th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1841."

By the governor: Samuel Blatchford, private secretary.

The other document, accompanying the governor's letter, was the executive order declining the surrender of the fugitive.

In relation to this subject the Richmond Enquirer of the 10th inst. says:

"There is some diversity of opinion—much was said in the house of delegates yesterday (both morning and evening)—about the course of the governor of Virginia in relation to Curry. There seems, however, to be but one opinion as to the high and mainly motives by which he has been actuated—Those who differ most with the governor, are among the first to adore his spirit and his patriotism—Many sincerely regret his course, and approve none harshly condemn him. A decided majority of the house of delegates seem to regret his decision, and will probably pass some resolution to that effect. But not a friend of the inspection bill ventures into the hall to question the propriety of its provisions, and vindicate our constitutional rights."

Resignation of the governor of Virginia. We were somewhat astonished to perceive by Richmond papers received yesterday, that the action of the legislature of Virginia in reference to the controversy with New York, had led to the resignation of the governor of that commonwealth. The reason of the adoption of this course may be stated in a very few words.—New York in the first place refused to give up fugitives from justice, when demanded by Virginia, and when a similar demand was made by New York, gov. Gilmer, of Virginia, applied the "lex talionis," and refused to give up an indicted forger. The legislature of Virginia, upon reviewing the circumstances of the refusal of gov. Gilmer, came to a resolution, which the governor acted upon, and so expressed it in a resolution, adopted with singular unanimity. The governor, therefore, finding that he could not conscientiously reflect the views of the legislature, in this very important matter, immediately resigned his place. This took place on Saturday, and the legislature were to meet on Monday to choose a successor. We shall be disappointed if this event does not occasion a deeper sense of the injustice of the conduct of the authorities of New York, not only towards Virginia, but to the whole south. It will awaken a feeling which it will not be easy to repress. The south, under the national compact, has rights which should not be invaded without danger. To use a common axiom, "the last drop will overflow the bucket," and here is cause for apprehension that the last drop is coming on apach—May heaven avert the consequences!

The legislature of this state, on Monday, adjourned sine die, without going into the election of a chief magistrate, and without appointing a new without a commander. Scenes of considerable excitement took place previous to the adjournment, which, says the Compiler, "were unworthy the members of the Virginia legislature."

ILLINOIS AND MISSOURI DIFFICULTIES. The Alto Telegraph, in speaking of the prohibition by the citizens of Illinois, of any further work on the pier, north of Bloody Island, says: We learn that two pieces of ordnance left this place for Illinois last opposite St. Louis, where they are now assembled for the purpose of raising any encroachment which may be attempted against the rights and sovereignty of this state, or the property of her citizens. The hope is induced that steps will be promptly taken to prevent a refusal to force. [St. Louis Republican.]

STATE CREDIT. Joel Crawford, esq. of Georgia, who a year or two since, visited England for the purpose of negotiating a loan on the bonds of Georgia, wrote to the Georgia Enquirer, that the legislature of that state on the 14th of Nov. 1840:

"The leading object at which the legislature of Georgia should now aim, with a view to carry on her public works, is the establishment of a high state credit; and it is the least to assure you, that much intercourse with capitalists on both sides of the Atlantic, that adequate and stable revenue laws are absolutely indispensable. They have not, or ought not to have any confidence in pledges of bank dividends or bank capital. They apprehend that the state governments do not tax the people to raise the means of maintaining the public faith, and therefore they will not rely on it. But let the state of Georgia impose the requisite tax, and such an earnest is given, as will at once dispel all doubts."

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Fast day. Governor Page has appointed the 15th of April, to be observed throughout the state as a day of humiliation and prayer.

MARSHFIELD.

Boston punctuality. Mr. Bancroft, the present collector of the port of Boston, will retire from his office March 31, that is at the close of the present year. It is reported that he has received from Mr. Bancroft has collected more than ten millions of dollars of revenue, every bond which has been taken by him and has fallen due, is discharged.—There is not now a single instance of default on the part of any merchant during his official term. Such a result, it is believed, has never occurred for any other period of the same length of time. It is most honorable testimony to the character of the Boston merchants now on the stage.

Legislature. In the house, on Tuesday morning, a resolution was passed by a vote of 100 to 70, that $20,000, in anticipation of the revenue, passed to be engrossed. A bill to give the Commonwealth a bank further time to close its concerns, passed to the third reading; and a resolve from the senate to pay the clerk of the two branches $10 per diem, was rejected after its third reading.

At 11 A. M. the two branches met in convention for the purpose of choosing four directors of the Western rail road. The choice fell upon Parker

L. Hall, of Pittsfield, John W. Lincoln, of Worcester, John Howard, of Springfield, Wm. Jackson, of Newton.

The bill from the house to abolish imprisonment for debt in this commonwealth, was on Monday afternoon postponed to the next session.

The legislature were to adjourn on Wednesday last.

In the house, this morning, a motion to reconsider the vote which related to the bill from the senate, relating to intermarriage between persons of different races, was lost, 124 to 108. (Boston Tran.)

The tariff. In the house of representatives at the 9th inst. the following preamble and resolution were reported by Mr. Higelow, of Boston, from the committee on commerce.

Whereas, a crisis has arrived, which seems to demand a careful revision of the various measures of public policy heretofore pursued by the federal government; among which the laws regulating trade and imposing duties upon imports are of great importance, involving as they do, the interests of the industrious and laboring classes of the country; and whereas, certain resolutions of the legislature of the state of Connecticut and Alabama have been submitted to this legislature, for the purpose of obtaining an expression of the opinions of the representatives of the people of this commonwealth, upon a subject of this importance to their interests and prosperity, therefore,

Resolved, That a sound and wise policy seems to require of the federal government, in raising a revenue by the assessment of duties upon imports, to discriminate between those articles which come in competition with the products and manufactures of this country, and those which are the products and manufactures of foreign countries; in order that these duties may be so levied as to encourage domestic productions and aid the laboring classes of our own country.

Resolved, That just discrimination in the assessment of duties, by favoring all the great interests which are promoted by a division of labor, and without raising unnecessary or extravagant revenues or resorting to high duties, will be of universal benefit to all sections of this great country, and to all classes of its laboring and industrious citizens; and is the only system which can harmonize public opinion, and at the same time, secure to the people that encouragement and protection in the diversified pursuits of labor which they have a right to ask of the general government.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolves to the governors of the several states, and also to each of the senators and representatives of this commonwealth in congress.

NEW YORK.

A singular divorce case. The records of the proceedings of the legislatures of some of the states present frequent cases of the dissolution of the marriage contract by legislative enactment, and, more rarely, when that mode is resorted to, without strict adherence to any general principle or well settled judicial rule. In this state, the practice has wisely been to confine such applications to the court of chancery, where they are decided upon a uniform and rigid construction of the statute.

A case is now pending before the New York senate, however, which is quite peculiar in its features. The common law fixes the "age of consent," as it is termed, at 12 years for a female.—Some years since the statute law of this state varied that age of consent to 14 years, and at the same time declared it a felonious offence to marry a female under that age, without the consent of her parents or guardians. Subsequently, the statute was amended, so as to restore the common law, and 12 years of age as the period when a female becomes legally marriageable; but the penalty against elopemently marrying a female less than 14 years of age was inadvertently left in force.

During the autumn of 1838, a daughter of a citizen of Stephentown, Kentucky, named Catherine, aged about 12 years, attended the common school of the district in which he resided, and when going and returning was in the habit of calling at a neighbor's house on the way. The mistress of this house seems to have been an inveterate match maker, and she so filled the simple girl's mind with notions of matrimony, having reference to a particular young man of her acquaintance, as to prepare her to take that important step at the first convenient opportunity.

At the course of even's, the common law, neither of the girl were absent from their residence, at a funeral, which would detain them for nearly a day, and this occasion was improved by the husband of the officious match maker, and others, to persuade the victim, (though not a party to the persuasion on her part), to ride to a clergyman's in the vicinity, and be married to the young man—who would seem, from the statements before the senate, to have played but a secondary part in the affair.

Resulting from these proceedings was the indictment of the conspirators, and the sentence of the court in the prison. Meanwhile the wife is such, in the eyes of the law; although the punishment of the husband pronounces her still under the control of her parents. To put an end to this double and incompatible relation, legislative action seems to be necessary.

A bill for this purpose was reported by Mr. Strong, from the judiciary committee, and was before the committee of the whole on Tuesday, but was re-committed on Friday, for the purpose of having the facts spread upon the journals in a formal report, lest the case should be drawn into a precedent.

ALBANY ARMS.

J. Phillips Phenix, esq. on Monday evening received the intimation of the whig convention, as the candidate of that party for mayor of New York at the next election.

A letter from New York, March 17, says: An express arrived in the city last night from Albany, bringing news of the return of gov. Seward, and of his signature to the bill abolishing all preferences in cases of protested notes upon the free banks. All bill holders are to be treated alike, and there is now no inducement now to break down the banks by panics and purchase of bills. The legislative proceedings are not of any additional importance.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Another anthracite furnace. The Miners' Journal states that one of the largest class of anthracite furnaces, recently erected at Danville, by Messrs. Biddle, Chambers & Co. was blown in a few days since under the superintendence of a Pennsylvania charcoal furnace man, and is now doing well—with a fair prospect of running out from eighty to one hundred tons of metal weekly. This is the third anthracite furnace in operation in Danville.

Banks. The following tabular statement, as prepared by the Harrisburg reporter, from the authorized returns to the auditor general of Pennsylvania, exhibits an aggregate view of the resources and liabilities of all the banks in this state, exclusive of the U. S. bank. The returns from which it was taken, are made up to the first discount day in October, 1840:

Resources.
Notes and bills discounted,	$28,076,283 66
Specie,	4,163,512 38
Notes and checks of other banks,	8,502,766 51
Due by other banks,	7,794,185 35
Due to state, &c. &c.	2,501,845 93
Expenses,	155,996 09
Bills of exchange,	614,413 93
Stocks,	3,173,945 80
Loans to commonwealth,	1,274,004 42
Miscellaneous,	2,803,603 98
Total resources,	$58,994,363 80
Liabilities.
Capital stock paid in,	$24,614,259 49
Notes in circulation,	8,832,227 47
Due to other banks,	8,830,867 28
Due depositors,	12,609,817 60
Dividends on hand,	125,485 69
Contingent fund,	1,723,880 51
Profit and loss,	414,692 90
Discounts, exchange, &c.	687,175 82
Due to commonwealth,	291,752 40
Loans and bonds—none.
Miscellaneous,	1,412,027 11
Total liabilities,	$58,994,363 80

In the lower house of the legislature, on Friday the 12th inst. the bill for the relief of the banks, reported by Mr. Hinckman, was lost. On the question of the adoption of the 1st section,—which suspends the penalties of the resumption resolutions of 1810 for a refusal to pay specie, until the 15th day of May 1841,—the vote stood 42 yeas and 42 nays. A motion to reconsider this vote was afterwards made, and lost, by yeas 46, nays 47. In the senate, Mr. Spackman's bill for the relief of the banks has passed to a second reading.

Tavern licenses. The temperance bill. The vote on this bill, which was lost in the house a day or two since, was reconsidered yesterday with trifling amendments which were concurred in by the senate. The bill requires that all application for licenses, with the names of who petition for the same, shall be published in the public papers; and if increased the tax on licenses considerably. The bill will be likely to thin off tippling shops very materially but will not effect, in the least the interests of respectable houses. Though the may have to pay a much heavier tax, their business will be great in proportion which will more than compensate them for the increase of tax. The bill is a good one, and will give the cause of temperance aid and decency an impetus not easily overcome.

Mr. Penrose's resignation. In the senate on Saturday the 13th inst. Mr. Penrose, in pursuance of a purpose some days since announced, resigned the office of speaker of that body. His address on the occasion was touching and appropriate. On Mr. Penrose retiring from the chair, the senate proceeded to elect a successor, when John H. Ewing, (whig) of Washington county, was chosen speaker on the first ballot. The vote was for Ewing 18, Coplan, (V. B.) 7. Scattering 9.

Finances. In the senate on Saturday the 13th inst. Mr. Reed, from the committee on finance, made a report embracing among other matters an estimate of the probable receipts, from various sources of revenue, together with the amount of interest that will be payable, during the coming year.

It appears from this report that, the amount received last year, pledged to the interest fund, was as follows:

Auction duties	$77,925
Collateral inheritance tax	13,549
Dividends on turnpike, bridge and navigation stock	38,850
Canal and rail road tolls	$59,265

—$191,989

which in most particulars the committee believe to be justified by reasonable calculation, is as follows:

Auction duties	$73,000
Collateral inheritance tax	24,000
Dividends on turnpike, bridge and navigation stock	37,000
Canal and rail road tolls	$55,000
State tax under act 11th June, 1840	$60,000

—$1,489,000

The amount of interest which will be payable during the year ending Feb. 1, 1842, will be

—$1,660,000

To which must be added, premium on specie at 7 per cent. assumed to be a fair average

—116,200

—$1,776,200

Deduct amount appropriated to interest fund

—1,499,000

Deficiency at end of fiscal year

—$287,200

To meet this deficiency, the committee propose to add to the interest fund, the following revenue:

Tax on retailers' licenses, (estimated)

$20,000

License commissions

25,000

Tax on writs

55,000

Tavern licenses

25,000

Land office fees

$222,900

Leaving a deficiency of but $54,700 in the interest fund. It is believed by the committee that the receipt from taxes under the act of 1840, even with the present very defective system of assessment, will exceed the amount above stated. From the best judgment they can form, they are of opinion that the receipts from that source during the year will be $500,000, which would leave a surplus of $245,300 to be applied to the sinking fund. If a change be effected in the assessments throughout the state, the receipts may be for the next year increased at $1,000,000, giving a surplus of 445,300 dollars.

The following abstract of the bill for the better securing of the payment of the interest on the public debt, and for the creation of a sinking fund," as reported by Mr. Reed, from the committee on finance, is given in the Telegraph of yesterday. The bill passed the committee of the whole on Monday.

Sec. 1. That the state treasurer on the receipt of income specifically set apart from this fund, shall deposit it in the Bank of Pennsylvania.

Sec. 2. That the interest of state debt to be paid in specie, semi-annually, and the excess to be applied to the purchase of $200,000 per year of state stock.

Sec. 3. An act to be laid before the legislature annually.

Sec. 4. The banks to pay drafts of commissioners in specie or current funds.

Sec. 5. How commissioners shall act in cases of vacancy.

Sec. 6. Every description of revenue set apart for the use of this fund, except the portions necessary to carry on the governmental functions.

DELAWARE.
Surplus. The state of Delaware has a surplus of one million and a half of dollars.

MARYLAND.

Extra session. The legislature re-assembled on the 24th inst. in virtue of the governor's proclamation.

Congressional candidates. Mr. Jenifer's declaration. To the voters of the seventh congressional district of Maryland: My object in addressing you is to announce my intention of declining to be a candidate for re-election.

Having been honored by your confidence four terms in the house of representatives of the United States, I cannot permit the political relations which have so long existed between us to be severed without tendering my sincere acknowledgments for the kindness you have repeatedly bestowed, and the indulgence I have always received at your hands.

To my political friends I owe much, which can only be repaid by a deep sense of gratitude, which I shall ever entertain.

That my political course should have been approved, and the sentiments I have expressed should have met your approbation, is an ample reward for any sacrifices I may have made or difficulties encountered.

By your efforts, in common with those of the whigs generally, a great revolution has been effected, a new era commenced, which bids fair for the future honor and prosperity of the country.

Believing that the present condition of affairs is such as to require that congress should be convened before the usual period of its meeting, I have deemed it proper thus early to advise you of my intention, so that an opportunity may be afforded of selecting a successor.

In taking leave of you, as a representative, I should do injustice to my own feelings were I to omit this expression of my sincere thanks for the very many evidences of kind personal regard I have received from my political opponents generally.

March 10, 1841. DANIEL JENIFER.

To the voters of the 4th congressional district. The president of the United States having issued his proclamation, convening congress on the 4th of May next, an election of representatives from the state of Maryland must be held previous to that day. It is to be presumed, therefore, that your attention will be immediately directed to the selection of candidates for this district; and as many of my partial friends have expressed to me a desire for my continuance in congress, I feel it to be my duty publicly to announce that I have long since determined not to be a candidate for re-election.

With the most profound gratitude for the honor you have already conferred in electing me one of your representatives in the 26th congress, I remain your fellow citizen, JAMES CARROLL.

Baltimore, March 18, 1841.

VIRGINIA.

The Richmond Enquirer, has the following letter addressed to the editor, dated Tappanborough, March 16th.

I forward the enclosed letter from Mr. R. M. T. Hunter, with a request that it may be published in the Enquirer.

Mr. Hunter and Mr. Bixton were at our court yesterday, and both addressed the people at length. Mr. H. during his address, declined the contest, as he did at Caroline; but during the evening, he accepted a nomination tendered him by a meeting composed of both parties, so that he is again fairly in the field, and pledged, as I understand him, to go through the canvass.

"The nationals will scarcely carry for Cobin more than one-half of the whigs in this county, and Hunter will get all the balance, viz. the vote right portion, together with a decided majority of the republicans.

"After the nomination of Mr. H. by the meeting yesterday, it was insisted on by the republicans, that at the meeting held on the 14th inst. in the nomination of a candidate for congress, it was equally proper that they should all unite on principle for a candidate for the county; and accordingly, col. James Wright was selected, who has accepted the nomination. Col. Wright is fully and warmly with us, and it is thought will be very troublesome to his opponent, Mr. James Seemple, a national whig, who took the field in December last, and has been working over the course ever since."

Long's Enquirer, March 15th, 1841.
To Messrs. B. F. Telford, William A. Wright, L. Hines and R. M. Davis:

Gentlemen: I received your letter announcing the high honor which the convention at Croxton's springs had offered on a few days before the last Circuit court. I replied to it then in a public address at the Bowling Green, but to avoid misrepresentation, I beg leave also to respond to it also in writing.

My sole object in presenting myself to the district had been to endeavor to effect a union between those republicans of both parties who agree on principle with each other and with myself. I found upon seeing friends of both parties that an acceptance of the nomination which was tendered me would, under the circumstances, be considered by many as a departure from the position which I had taken in the letter announcing myself as a candidate. That I might not therefore produce division among friends of both parties, whom I had sought to unite, and also to prevent my name from producing further embarrassment amongst those who had generously nominated me, I felt bound to withdraw from the canvass. This determination I announced on that day, and while I felt bound to make no effort to obtain office at the expense of my friends of either party, I retired with the most grateful consideration of the high honor which you and those whom you represent had conferred. With warm thanks both to you and to them, I am most respectfully, your obedient servant, R. M. T. HUNTER.

TENNESSEE.

Congressional candidates. 2d district. Wm. T. Seaton, esq. has been nominated for congress by the whigs in convention.

3d district. Hon. Joseph L. Williams, the present representative, it is understood, will be the candidate of the whigs for re-election.

4th district. Col. Thomas J. Crenshaw, late whig elector, has been unanimously nominated by the whig convention to be the candidate for congress against the present incumbent, J. W. Blackwell.

6th district. The hon. Wm. B. Campbell is a candidate for re-election; so is also the hon. Meredith Gentry.

12th district. Milton Brown, esq. has received the unanimous vote of the whig convention for congress.

13th district. The hon. C. H. Williams is announced as a candidate for re-election.

Zebulon Payne, the murderer of Coltrant, arrived here day before yesterday, on the steamboat Rio, from New Orleans, in custody of the gentleman who had arrested him in Galveston, Texas, who immediately proceeded with him to Winchester, where he will remain in duress until trial. Too much praise cannot be awarded to the energy and perseverance of those who have thus succeeded in bringing this fugitive back where he will be made to answer the outraged laws for his crime hereafter. [Nashville Banner.]

ILLINOIS.

The Legislature adjourned sine die on the 1st inst. Among its acts was one, for legalizing the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus.

Another of the laws passed, was one authorizing a company to construct a rail road from Springfield, via Berlin to Alton. Another law, requires their completion of the rail road between Springfield and the Illinois river.

INDIANA.

The state debt is upwards of fourteen millions of dollars. It has been increased more than one million dollars by the payment of interest.

INVENTIONS—IMPROVEMENTS.

PEARSON'S CANNON. The Newburyport Herald says that Michael Pearson of that town, has recently invented a very ingenious cannon, capable of being discharged with three times the speed of the common cannon, and by half the number of men usually required. It is his intention to present it to the department at Washington.

GREAT IRON STEAMER. The great iron steam ship now being built at Bristol, will probably combine a greater number and variety of untired principles than ever before united in any one enterprise of the same magnitude and importance. The vessel herself—her enormous magnitude—(about 3,600 tons it is said)—her material—(plate iron)—her engines, nearly twelve hundred horse nominal power—cylinders one hundred and twenty inches in diameter!—no piston rods!—no beams!—the connecting rod lying bold immediately on the piston, and the piston being carried by a single shaft, and a stuffing box in top of the piston, to give play to the said connecting rod!—an unlimited application of the expansive principle!—and to crown all no paddle wheels, no paddle boxes projecting from the sides, no apparent propelling power, but an endless agent revolving under her keel and enabling her to move.

Walk the water like a thing of life. Verily, verily, we live in an age of wonders, and if the mechanical genius of the era give safe birth to the principles of its conception, and foster her vigorous maturity, it will be difficult hereafter to set any bounds to locomotion over the waters of the deep.

One and one only obvious improvement remains, to give grace and beauty as well as speed and power to the steam ship. Remove the funnel—annihilate the smoke. This is far from being impracticable. The chief use of the funnel is to produce the necessary draft in the furnaces. This draft may be produced by a fan and a variety of other expedients well known to engineers and the products of combustion may be blown into the sea.

Do this and you will restore to the ship that wondrous divinity and grace, all those picturesque qualities which have rendered her the favorite theme of the poet and the artist, and you will at the same time remove one of those parts of the machinery (if the classic can be so called) which is most vulnerable in war steamers. [Phil. Gaz.]

NEW PROCESS OF COPYING STONES. An ingenious instrument, ascribed to M. Collas, has been invented in France, which professes to copy, without the assistance of an artist, and with extreme correctness, any medal, bas-relief, or statue, whether of wax, plaster, wood, marble, or metal; to reduce or enlarge its dimensions without impairing the harmony of its proportions and to copy it on wood, stone, ivory or marble, with an accuracy such that the artist could not detect the difference from the original from the copy. All this the Collas process is stated to accomplish easily and at an inconsiderable cost. "We have already admired," says a Paris journal, "the bas-reliefs of the Parthenon, the originals of which are the most perfect that Greece still so beautiful, despite of her mutilation; and several other precious models, reduced to proportions of two-fifths or a half, with a truth scarcely conceivable. The Parthenon metopes, those venerable monuments which have been the study of the artist, with their parts worn by time and their mutilated projections. We have also remarked several large bas-reliefs reduced upon steatite the proportions of a cameo. Nothing is wanting in them. The most fugitive details of the most are seen with a lens in those charming copies."

RAILWAYS. The British parliaments has, in the session just commenced, taken the first steps towards bringing the great lines of railways in that country under legislative control. It is difficult, by any analogy supplied by our railways, for an American to estimate the magnitude of the system; the great arteries of British intercourse are formed and maintained in operation. The capital invested in the first construction, the floating capital necessary to work them, the quantity of traffic transported over them, and the speed with which the traffic is effected, are severally elements, so different from what we are accustomed to contemplate, that the mere statement of a few of them must excite both interest and surprise.

The railway connecting Liverpool and Manchester involved an outlay of capital amounting to about six millions of dollars. It is thirty-one miles in length, and cost therefore at the rate of above two hundred thousand dollars per mile. The current traffic on this line is very nearly as follows: Of passenger trains there are twenty daily, and from fifteen to twenty trains of merchandise. The average number of passengers carried daily from terminus to terminus, is 1,650, and the number of tons of merchandise daily is about 1,000. To afford space and time for the passenger trains, most of the merchandise is carried at night. The fastest passenger trains have recently made the trip in the average time of seventy minutes, including a stoppage of about four minutes half way. The rate was at one time on several of the line is generally about thirty miles an hour.

The railway between Liverpool and London is about 210 miles in length, and exclusive of the stoppage half way, at Birmingham, the trip is performed by the first class passenger trains in ten hours. This includes a vast number of stoppages at intermediate stations; not less probably than twenty five in the above journey. The speed when moving is generally about thirty miles an hour.

The railway connecting London and Birmingham is not yet completed, though the rails are all laid, and the line throughout has been for some time at work. It is computed that this line, when the depots have been completed, will cost about thirty millions of dollars, and its total length being 112 miles, the cost will be nearly $260,000 per mile! The daily receipts for traffic at present upon the line amount to about $10,000. The depot of this line at London is not yet completed, but its estimated cost was above a million of dollars.

The railway connecting London with Bristol is not yet completed. The expenditure of capital upon it already has been so lavish, and the methods of road structure have been subjected to such capricious changes, that it is difficult to say what will be its ultimate cost. Its length is about the same as that leading to Birmingham, and its cost per mile will probably be much more. The width of the rail on this line is seven feet, the common standard being four feet eight inches. This augmented gauge necessarily infers a proportionally increased scale in all the works, and a proportionally increased expense.

The numerous accidents and great loss of life which occur on the English railways, are owing to the vast amount of the traffic carried on upon them, and the enormous speed with which it is transported. These accidents do not arise from the explosion of engines, or from any other cause immediately connected with steam power, but are due, almost exclusively, to the collision of trains. The railways being all without exception, in the same direction, there is no contrary directions on the same rails, and consequently, collision never occurs from trains unexpectedly meeting each other. Such accidents always arise from one train overlooking and running into another. When this occurs, the most terrific consequences ensue, the carriages being generally smashed to pieces, and their unfortunate occupants maimed or killed.

One of the most curious and interesting results of the establishment of railways in Europe, is the enormous increase of intercourse they have produced, as compared with the intercourse which was previously maintained between the same places on common roads. This increase has been never less than three fold, and in some instances, four or eight fold. In some localities, the intercourse has attained an amount which borders on the incredible. Since the completion of the railway between Paris and St. Germain, the daily intercourse between these places is said to be equal to about the same quantity and it appears, by evidence given before the house of commons, that the intercourse between the city of Dublin (population under 30,000) and the town of Kingston, amounts to 3,500 daily.

REMARKS OF MR. EVERETT, OF VT.

In house of representatives, Saturday, Feb. 13, 1841, ON THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. PICKENS having moved that the report be laid on the table and printed—

Mr. EVERETT said that, as the report embraced the case of the Caroline as well as that of McLeod, (which alone had been submitted to the committee) to print all the documents relating to both cases—They had been heretofore published, from time to time, as communicated to the house. He desired to bring them together on this occasion, to enable the house and the country to judge of the merits of the report, and the measures taken by the executive to preserve our neutrality. He thought that, since the onset of the Caroline, every thing had been done which the means within the control of the executive enabled it to do. He then read a list of the documents, (house doc. 25th cong. 2d sess. Nos. 64, 73, 74, from page 23 to the end, 76, 302, and of 26th cong. 2d sess. No. 33, of 25th Dec. 1840, and 4th Jan. 1841; the neutrality act of March 10, 1838, and the president's proclamations of 5th Jan. and 21st Nov. 1839), which he moved to have printed with the report.

[Mr. GRANGER, Mr. PICKENS, and Mr. ADAMS, took part in the debate on the report.]

Mr. EVERETT said that, for the remarks of the hon. chairman of the committee on foreign affairs, he should not have taken part in the debate. He now felt it due to himself, as a dissenting member of that committee, to state, in part, the grounds of his dissent.

The report relates to matters of the gravest import, and which are now the subject of diplomatic discussion between the two governments—a discussion conducted by the constitution to the executive. He felt great embarrassment in debating subjects of this character and importance with open doors. It was difficult, if not impossible, to do full justice to the subject, or to ourselves, without danger of saying things that should not be heard beyond these walls. I yield, said he, to the restraints imposed by the time and the place. I shall endeavor to say nothing that should not be heard by all. In the committee room there was no restraint. I said things there that I shall not say here. Perhaps I might have tried to congratulate myself on being now thus restrained, than to complain of it, as in some of my views I stood alone in the committee.

Sir, in my judgment the report is unequalled for its boldness—and a more direct interference with the duties of the executive. The discussion is now pending between the two governments. The documents were communicated merely in answer to a call of the house. The executive has not asked opinion for its opinion or action. At this time, why should either be desired? And what is the true chosen to put forth the gratuitous opinions of the majority—and, as the honorable chairman has said, of a bare majority—of a political majority of the committee? One administration is about going out of power. In twenty days it will expire, and another succeed. Without intending any disparagement to the majority of the committee, I ask, is it proper, is it decorous, thus to attempt to embarrass the incoming administration—to compromise its course on subjects so delicate—so important? The report is little short of an official endorsement of one administration with things that belong to another.

But, sir, without regard to a change of administration, is this interference proper or useful? Our foreign relations are committed to the executive. No discussion can be conducted solely by the executive. When they are at the end, this house—both houses must act. Congress alone can dictate the ulterior measures. I do not mean to say there are not cases in which either house may, pending a negotiation, express its opinions. If the executive be remiss in his duty—if he pursue a course deemed wrong in principle, or dangerous in its consequences—or if the executive seek its opinion, with a view to give effect to its measures, it may be of some use to the country to express its views. But the report has none of these grounds for its support. It is entirely uncalled for, and its effect may be to compromise the executive to a course that its better judgment would decline; and to produce an executive policy that may be attended with the embarrassments, and new obstacles to the final adjustment of our controversies with Great Britain.

I pass the discursive character of the report—its references to subjects not referred—to (to me) the committee. I cannot say so largely of the matter referred, the case of Alexander McLeod. That case, and that alone, was referred to the committee, and to that alone should the report have been confined. That case, though connected with the destruction of the Caroline, rests on different principles. The case of Mr. McLeod, as presented in the documents, is entirely separate and distinct from the question, whether the destruction of the Caroline was or was not justifiable.

It is true that no report should be made while the negotiations were pending between the two countries. In my opinion, no opinion or action of this house, at this time required. I will now read to the house a statement of the negotiations to which I have alluded, and so far as respects the case of McLeod—and to show that his case as well as the Caroline are now the subjects of diplomatic discussion between the two governments. Before I sit down I will also submit to the house any other light that may be thrown upon the committee. I will here take leave to say that I have given this subject the most careful consideration, without party views or party feeling. It is above and beyond all party considerations: I have endeavored to state the facts material to the subject submitted to the committee are, that, on the night of the 25th December, 1837, a detachment of the British forces stationed at Chippewa, in the province of Upper Canada, crossed the Niagara to Schiester, in the state of New York, and there made a hostile attack on the steamboat Caroline, the property of an American citizen, killed and wounded a number of American citizens, captured the boat, towed her into the current, set her on fire, and sent her in flames over the falls.

"On the 5th January, 1838, the secretary of state communicated to Mr. Fox, the British minister, a copy of the evidence furnished to the department of the destruction of the steamboat Caroline, and British majesty's province of Upper Canada, on the person and property of citizens of the U. States within the jurisdiction of the state of New York; and stating that it would necessarily turn the subject of a demand for redress upon her majesty's government."

"On the 6th February, Mr. Fox communicated to the secretary of state a despatch from Sir Francis Head, lieutenant governor of Upper Canada, containing the details of the destruction of the Caroline, and stating that it was destroyed by order of Sir MacNab, commanding the militia in her majesty's service, and that Sir Francis Head approved the act."

"On the 22d May, Mr. Stevenson presented the subject to the consideration of her majesty's government. After referring to those accounts he said, that, 'under such circumstances, it was not to be expected that the whole proceeding could be regarded by the government of the United States in any other light than as an interference with the rights and wrong aggression upon its rights and sovereignty utterly inconsistent with all the principles of national law, and wholly irreconcilable with the friendly and peaceful relations of the two countries; that the case, then, is one of open, undenied and unavertable hostility.' He concludes by expressing the confident expectation of the president of the U. States that the whole proceeding will not only be disavowed and disapproved, but that such redress as the nature of the case obviously requires will be promptly made. To this opinion Sir MacNab was the final answer of the British government."

"On the 13th November last, Alexander McLeod, a British subject, was arrested and imprisoned by the authorities of the state of New York, on a charge of arson and murder, as having been engaged in the capture and destruction of the Caroline."

"On the 12th December, the British minister made a demand on the president for the release of Mr. McLeod, on the ground that the destruction of the Caroline was a public act, and that her majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities, and that the act, according to the usages of nations, can only be the subject of discussion between the two national governments."

"To this demand the secretary of state has replied that the president has no power under the constitution and laws of the union to interpose between Mr. McLeod and the constituted authorities of the state of New York—and that the president is not aware of any principle of international law, or indeed of reason or justice, which entitles such offenders to impunity before the legal tribunals, when coming voluntarily within their independent and undoubted jurisdiction, because they acted in obedience to their superior authorities, or because they have become the subject of diplomatic discussion between the two governments.' And that, 'if the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her majesty's service, obeying the orders of their superior authorities, it has not been before communicated to the government of the U. States, by a person authorized to make the admission; and it will be for the count which has cognizance of the offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged, to decide on its validity when legally established before it.'"

"The British minister, expressing his regret at the decision, had referred the subject to his government."

This statement, I repeat, is limited to the case of McLeod."

The points in difference, in this case, are—1. Whether McLeod, having, in the destruction of the Caroline, acted in obedience to the orders of the superior authorities of the government of Upper Canada, is or is not amenable to the laws of New York, as for the crimes of murder and arson; and, 2. If not, whether the executive has any power to interpose between him and the laws of New York.

On the first of these questions, I have given any opinion in accordance with the view that now is required for the justification of the ground I have taken, that these questions are now the subjects of diplomatic discussion between the two governments. The impropriety of the report is the more manifest from the consideration that the discussion is but just commenced. And it is not unreasonable to suppose that, on questions of such limited extent, the government in the wrong way may, by the further discussion, be convinced of its error. At least, we should wait the reply of the British government, to which the subject is referred, and the issue finally tendered by its executive."

The consequences of an error on either side may compromise the peace of the country. In case of reprisals, executed to the extreme point, the intervention of all the powers of Europe could not prevent a war. In view of these consequences it may be proper to suspend the correspondence, to ascertain the positions taken on both sides that bear on the case of McLeod."

Mr. Forsyth, in his note of the 5th January, carefully and properly avoids giving any national character to the destruction of the Caroline. He calls it an outrage "committed from her Britannic majesty's province of Upper Canada." He leaves it to Mr. Fox to determine whether it was a public or a private wrong, or to assume or disclaim for his government the responsibility. Mr. Fox, in his reply, (6th Feb.) gives a public character to the act, by communicating the fact that it was destroyed by the order of the commander of the militia in her majesty's service, and that the act was approved by the governor of the province."

And here I must express my surprise that Mr. Forsyth should deem the late note to Mr. Fox to be the first avowal of the fact by a person authorized to make it. In the note of the 6th February, 1838, the fact is fully and communicated by Mr. Fox. His late note is only the repeated re-statement of the fact. The fact then and now avowed is, that the Caroline was destroyed by persons obeying the order of their superior authorities; and Mr. Fox contends that those obeying were justified by the ORDER. It remains to be seen whether the British government will justify that order. McLeod's case is put on the first, and the case of the Caroline on the last.

[Mr. PRECKENS. Does the gentleman from Vermont intend to say that the British minister had ever before his late note, avowed that the Caroline was destroyed by the order of the constituted authorities of Canada?]

Mr. EVERETT. I do say that Mr. Fox, in his note of the 6th February, did so. In the despatch of Sir Francis Head, then communicated, it is expressly stated that col. Mac Nab commanded a body of militia stationed on the frontier; that in the night of the 29th, "he sent a party of militia in boats, with orders to take or destroy her. They proceeded to execute the order," &c. &c. It is not possible for himself with the mere communication of the fact, but even attempted to justify the destruction of the Caroline as an act of self-defence. Mr. Fox, in reference to the communication of Sir Francis Head, says:

"The piratical character of the steamboat Caroline, and the necessity of self-defence and self-preservation, under which her majesty's subjects acted in destroying that vessel, seems to be sufficiently established."

"At the time when the event happened, the ordinary laws of the United States were not enforced within the frontier district of the state of N. York. The authority of the law was overborne, publicly, by piratical violence. Through such violence, her majesty's subjects in Upper Canada had already severally suffered; and they were threatened with still further injury and outrage. This extraordinary state of things appears, naturally and necessarily, to have impelled the British government to security, by pursuing and destroying the vessel of their practical enemy, wheresoever they might find her."

Mr. Stevenson presents the act, in connexion with these avowals, as an act of "open, unqualified, unambiguous hostility," "wholly irreconcilable with the friendly and peaceful relations of the two countries." He calls upon the British government to disavow it. It is thus, by our minister, characterized as an act of war, and for participating in this act that McLeod is arrested; and on this act, thus avowed and thus characterised, the question is made by the two governments. Sir, I repeat, let negotiation be exhausted before congress is called upon to interfere. It is expedient to take a final ground, from which, when taken, there can be no retreat. Whether right or wrong, Great Britain may choose to put this controversy in advance of the others. Let us then be certain that it is not her strongest ground. If it much more is not right at first, then let her get right at last. We should also look to the possible consequences of even the errors of our adversary. Is it not among the possibilities that she may design herself bound to protect those who obeyed the orders of their superior authorities in her service, and that, under the spirit attributed to her in the report, she may resort to retaliation? And I repeat, if pushed to the extreme, war is inevitable. Is it not then, the safest course to leave the case in the hands of the executive, without, at least, adding to the excitement, which, from recent evidence, is sufficiently rife?

But, sir, the report also embraces the case of the Caroline, which was not submitted to the committee. To re-bill the point in controversy, only one addition to the statement I have read is necessary, viz: That the destruction of the Caroline is attempted to be justified in the dispatch of Sir Francis Head on the ground of self-defence. He alleges, in substance, that the force on Navy Island proceeded from the American shore, and was aggressive, through the agency of the Caroline, unrestricted by the authorities of the state of New York, or of the United States.

This is the only ground taken by the British government as a justification of the destruction of the Caroline; and, being taken, a report on the case of the Caroline should have met it directly, by a denial either of the fact or of the consequence.

I complain that the case is not met. No, sir, it is not met. It is evaded. Mr. Fox says, "the place where the vessel was destroyed was, nominally, it is true, within the territory of a friendly power; but the friendly power had been deprived, through overhearing piratical violence, of the use of its proper authority over that portion of territory." And what is the reply in the report? "Now, the inclination of the British minister that Schomberg was 'nominally' within the territory of the U. S.," may well be retorted, as we can, with equal truth, say that Navy Island was 'nominally' within the 'territory' of the British government; for, at the period to which we allude, the people collected there had as effectually defied Canadian authorities as any portion of our people had ours." What is this, sir, but an admission that Schomberg and Navy Island were equally in the power of the patriots, in equal defiance of the power of the government to which they respectively belonged? What but an admission, if not an admission of the ground taken by Mr. Fox? Is this the position on which we are willing to rest our cause—to place the issue of peace or war? No, sir, no. I hope we can make a better case. In order to make our case, I think the facts should be re-examined. I am not satisfied to rest the case on the evidence taken. We should be in the right—we should be certain we are right, before we take our final stand. In my judgment, the evidence should be retaken. I desire that a person of the highest respectability should be constituted to re-examine the whole case, with a view to arrive at the truth, whether for or against us. Perhaps, too, it might be advisable to ask the British minister to join in the investigation. Let the testimony be taken on both sides of the line. For our, I desire to know how far the proper authority of the United States was overthrown by the violence of the patriots. I desire further information of the character of the Caroline. In both respects, I think the evidence is defective. I repeat, that I desire the truth, and nothing but the truth. It is beneath the character of a nation to attempt evasion. I am not satisfied with the depositions that speak of the Caroline having landed certain passengers and certain freight. I desire to know the character of these passengers, and the nature and quantity of the quality of the freight—whether merchandise or military stores.

I do not desire to fault the present executive, or that it should be faulted by the next administration.

The executive should be left in the hands of whoever hands it is placed. What I desire is, that the evidence should be fully taken. If it sustain the course taken, as I hope it may, then that course will be sustained. If it do not sustain it, then the executive will be at liberty to pursue such course as the new case shall require, and that, without imputing any fault for the past. We must in the end deny the fact or its consequence. As the evidence now stands, I am not willing to make up the real issue. This controversy should be conducted as honest men conduct their controversies, with a mutual and earnest desire to ascertain what is true. I have fears that this report will encourage an excitement which should have received a severe rebuke. Whatever may be our result, let us be the men who live under a government less free than our own, we ought not to forget the duties imposed on us as a neutral nation. In the case of the attempts of our citizens in Upper Canada, there was but one cause for their sympathy, and one justification for their conduct. The people of Upper Canada were well satisfied with their government. They have shown no desire for revolution. But our citizens have volunteered to make a revolution for them. Their conduct cannot be too strongly reprobated.

At the present time, no useful purpose can be attained by the report. It proposes no action. Its effect will be only to excite on the one side, and irritate on the other. The report which I send to the chair is that which I proposed as a substitute:

"It appearing, that the reciprocal complaints referred to in the correspondence submitted are the subjects of diplomatic discussion between the governments of the two countries, the committee, having full confidence that the rights and honor of the United States will be sustained by the executive, and entertaining the hope that the controversy will be brought to a satisfactory termination, are of the opinion that no action of this house is, at this time, necessary. They, therefore, ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject."

REPORT OF THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. STATES.

In compliance with the "act to authorize the appointment of additional paymasters and for other purposes," passed July 4, 1836.

Office of the house of representatives, March 4, 1841. FOREIGN ARTICLES.

ENGLAND.

American manufactures. A correspondent of the London Courier alludes to the fact that the Birmingham and Gloucester railway company have "actually bought ten locomotive engines made in the United States." They cost upwards of £1,500 each; but it is "the stigma and reflection" cast upon the manufacturers of England that is complained of. The writer adds:

"It is a fact that iron, cotton, woolen and other manufactures are extending in America, France, Germany, Switzerland and other countries; still let us hope the day is far distant when our manufacturers shall feel the distillation of foreign demand for the immense quantity of goods manufactured to this country. It is to be hoped the introduction of foreign machinery will raise our mechanical men to greater application, which will tend to further and more important inventions and improvements in engines and other articles of machinery, so necessary to maintain our commercial supremacy and so indispensable for the support of our vast population."

Statistics of the London post office. We gather the following from a report recently made to our government by Mr. Pitt, who was sent out sometime ago to Europe, by the direction of Mr. Van Buren, for the purpose of collecting information relative to the post office and mail arrangement of the old world:

The average number of letters received daily, for delivery in the London post office, is 75,350.

The average number of newspapers received daily, for delivery in the London post office, is 11,460.

The average number of letters sent, daily posted in London, is 50,370.

The average number of letters daily distributed and forwarded, is 22,310.

The average number of newspapers daily posted in London, is 53,510.

The average number of newspapers daily distributed and forwarded, is 3,000.

In the London district post, the average number of letters received and delivered daily, is 65,000; number of newspapers, 3,500.

Besides the letter carriers there are also attached to the general post, ninety-five bellmen, who call at every house in their walk for letters to go by the evening despatch. They carry a locked bag, with an aperture large enough to drop in a letter, which can only be opened at the post office. Any person having letters to go by the mail may drop them into the bag himself, pay the bellman his fee of one penny for each letter, and then may rest assured that they will be despatched by the mail of the same evening.

The number of post towns in the United Kingdom, 2,585; the number of miles upon which the mail to the United Kingdom is annually carried, by mail coaches, horse and foot posts, is 7,461,250; by railways, 936,590. The annual cost of which, for the former, is £392,650; for the railway, is £19,940.

Each mail is accompanied with a guard, armed with a blunderbuss and pistols. The business has increased immensely, since the introduction of the penny post system.

FRANCE.

M. Guizot. The American in Paris has noticed in soliciting M. Guizot to sit for his portrait to an American artist, Mr. H. L. L. L., testifying liberally the high estimation in which they hold the distinguished French statesman, for an admirable essay on the character of Washington. The London Quarterly, we may add, speaks of this book of Guizot's, as the ablest of his works. The letter from the American committee concludes by saying:

"Our ulterior purpose is to transmit the portrait to the speaker of our congress, and to request for it a place in the library of that body, as a permanent memorial of the profound respect which we entertain for your personal character and intellectual trophies, and, in particular, of the gratitude which all Americans should feel, for your liberal agency in exhibiting anew to Europe the true nature of their revolution, and the distinctive pre-eminence of it there."

To this communication M. Guizot replied in the following manner:

"Department of foreign affairs, Paris, Feb. 12.
"Gentlemen—I am profoundly sensible to your proceeding. I accept with gratitude the honor you are pleased to confer. As soon as I shall be disposed from the imperious occupation which I have just quitted, leave no moment at my own disposal, I will cheerfully give to the American artist, whom you designate, the sittings requisite for my portrait. It gratifies me exceedingly that the United States of America, have found my homage to Washington worthy of the great man. I shall rejoice, if my place be assigned to be in the library of congress, and I thank you for the conception. I pray you, gentlemen, to receive the sincere assurance of my most distinguished consideration."
—GUIZOT.

PORTUGAL.

Portuguese legation to U. S. 18th March, 1841.
The Libon "Diario do Governo" of the 17th December, 1840, contains the official publication of the amnesty granted, on the preceding day, by H. M. the queen of Portugal, and of which the following is a translation:

"Desiring to give a public testimony of my royal clemency towards my subjects who deceived and led into crime, were the instruments of the attempts, and revolutionary movements which occurred in the month of August, 1834, on the night of the 1st to the 12th of August last, on 27th of the said month in the city of Caselle Branco, and on the 1st of September in Portoalegre, I am pleased, after consulting my council of ministers, and availing of the power the political constitution of the monarchy confers upon me, in its article 82d and 11th, to decree as follows:

"Those Portuguese, who, deceived and led into crime, were the instruments of the attempts and revolutionary movements on the night of the 1st to the 12th of August last, on the night of the 1st to the 12th of the said month in Caselle Branco, and on the 1st of September in Portoalegre, are pardoned; they shall no longer be molested, all proceedings against them shall cease, and remain in oblivion."

"The military officers, who, in contempt of their most sacred duties, of honor and fidelity of the army and navy, headed the aforementioned attempts and revolutionary movements, or took part in them, are excepted from the aforesaid amnesty; legal proceedings shall remain in force, and for the instigation of the crimes of insubordination, military addition, and desertion."

"The ministers and secretaries of state of all the departments shall so understand it, and cause it to be executed. PUBLISHED BY THE QUEEN, under the seal of the Legation, in the city of Rio Janeiro, on the 10th of February, 1841. Am. Rodrigo da Fonseca Magalhães, Antonio, Bernardo da Costa Cabral, Floriano Rodrigues Pereira Ferraz.

SOUTH AMERICA.

Latest from Rio Janeiro. The brig Mary, at this post, brings advices from Rio Janeiro to the 6th February. By her we have received files of papers of that city to the 6th of February, from which the following items are translated. We are also indebted to the kindness of a commercial friend for the annexed extract of a letter received by her:

Great disturbances had occurred at Bolivia at the election for members of the general legislature. Some lives were lost and much disorder prevailed. Mr. Pedro Rodriguez Fernandes Clavero, late Brazilian charge, in this country, had arrived a Rio in the Falmouth packet.

The confinement of Lavalle's defeat had been brought to Rio by the French steamer "Tonnerre." Even Lavalle's party gave his cause up as lost.

The rebels of Rio Grande had invaded the province of St. Catharines; fears were entertained that the province of St. Paul's might share the same fate, in consequence of which the government had called out the militia of the latter province to aid the regular force.

There were rumors of a revolution in Paraguay against the existing government, the object of which was to call a general congress.

General Hunter, the United States charge, had addressed a note to the imperial government, expressing his thanks for the ready and valuable exertions of the Brazilian navy in behalf of the United States ship Narciso. Mr. Hunter also requested that permission might be granted to captain Long to have the corvette Isodon, to erect a temporary observatory on Rat Island for astronomical observations, and correction of chronometers, which was granted.

The Montevideo government had convoked the legislature for the 15th February next, for the only purpose of taking into consideration the affairs which directly or indirectly concern "the defence and safety of the republic." This speaks volumes for the state of that country in its quarrels with general Rosas. This general had placed himself at the head of the Buenos Ayrenses and Philip Arana, the secretary of state, was acting as governor of the republic, and in that capacity had sent his message to the 28th legislature, which was in session.

Revolution in Vera Cruz. The New Orleans Bulletin of the 16th contains the following letter translated from a Yucatan paper, the Siglo XIX, of Merida, just received.

"Carmen, Feb. 8th, 1841.

"I beg to inform you of the arrival last night of the Texian war schooner St. Bernard, which left Galveston on the 24th of last month, bound to Vera Cruz for the purpose of delivering to the commander of the last British man of war he might fall in with, the despatches of Mr. Packenham, from the cabinet of St. James, respecting the recognition of the independence of Texas."

"The St. Bernard appeared off Vera Cruz on 27th of the said month, and its commander has informed us that on that day, about 6 P. M. he heard loud cannonading between the castle of San Juan de Ulloa and the city of Vera Cruz, and that there were also heavy discharges of musketry; that the firing lasted about two hours, and that there remained no doubt but that the firing from the city was made with balls, as some of them fell within half a mile of where the St. Bernard lay. After nightfall the St. Bernard left for this island for the purpose of replacing a mast she had carried away."

Her commander assures us, he will return again to Vera Cruz for the purpose of accomplishing the object above stated. It is also stated that the Texian steamship of war Zavalla, will arrive at this post in a few days. The preceding information was given by the commander of the St. Bernard to the military commandant of this island through the British vice council, Mr. George Sields.

Letters received at New Orleans from Matamoros and the city of Mexico, &c. state that general Arias has succeeded in two "pitched battles" in chasing the Camanche Indians beyond the frontiers, capturing all the horses, mules, &c. which they had robbed from the department of Coahuila, and releasing forty-two captives the savages had carried away prisoners. Anita arrived at Matamoros on the 14th February, and was received by the inhabitants with every demonstration of joy.

TEXAS.

The Courier and Enquirer publishes a letter from general James Hamilton, the Texian commissioner in Europe, dated Paris, 14th February, in which that gentleman announces that on "that day he had concluded a contract with the bank of J. Lafitte & Co. for the Texian loan."

It is not stated of what amount, nor on what terms, this loan was obtained.

We have received a Texan paper to the 17th inst. brought by the steam packet New York.

[New Orleans Bulletin.]

The papers contain very little news of interest. The report from the frontiers is, that every thing went down a pacific slope.

A dinner given to gen. Houston in Galveston, the French consul gave the following toast:

"May the ties of friendship which unite the republic of France, and which found their first germ on the illustrious field of San Jacinto, be strengthened by a commercial intercourse, and may France soon see the single star wave in her commercial ports."

An unknown correspondent writes to us from Galveston, that news had just come in of a great flood in the Colorado, which had carried away five or six miles of the raft above Matagorda. We should be pleased to have this report confirmed, as would be all others interested in the navigation of that noble river.

A rumor was also affixed that the Texian ship St. Bernard had been captured by the Mexicans. This report perhaps has some connexion with the cannonading at Vera Cruz.

CANADA.

The papers continue to give accounts of the riots attendant upon the elections in Canada. In Berber county, according to the Montreal Herald, the scenes of violence and bloodshed were unparalleled. That paper states that about a thousand Canadians, armed with bludgeons, attacked a body of Irishmen, estimated at forty or fifty; and that the encounter resulted in the death of one Canadian and six Irishmen, and the wounding of a great number on both sides.

The union party, which excludes the Tories, will have, it is said, a considerable majority in the parliament of Canada under the new administration. In several places very serious disturbances and riots have grown out of the elections.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

PRESIDENT HARRISON, as we learn from the Washington papers, was taken ill on Saturday evening last, of a severe pneumonia, which, for several days assumed such character as to create the most serious apprehensions. He was happy in being able to state that letters have been received here, dated at Washington, 5 o'clock, yesterday morning, which represent that the president passed a quiet night, and every hope was entertained of his recovery.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE, Mr. WENTZEL, left Washington on Sunday, 28th ult. for New York, in consequence of the dangerous illness of Mrs. Webster's father, HERMAN LE ROY, a gentleman of advanced age, long known as an eminent merchant of that city. He is expected to see the seat of government on Thursday evening last.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE U. S. Mr. CATTELLER, reached Washington on the 29th ult. from the western part of New York, to which he had been on official business.

APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTIONS BY THE PRESIDENT, by and with the advice and consent of the senate.

Jacob De La Motte, to be receiver of public money at Charleston, in the state of South Carolina.

George Loyall, to be navy agent for the port of Norfolk, Va. reappointed.

John P. Henry, to be navy agent for the port of Savannah, Ga. reappointed.

Thomas Hayes, to be navy agent for the port of Philadelphia, in place of Michael W. Ash, resigned.

Promotions.

Commander W. A. Spencer, to be a captain in the navy from the 22d January, 1841.

Lieutenant A. Blackton, to be a commander in the navy from the 22d January, 1841.

Passed midshipman William L. Manry, to be a lieutenant in the navy from the 26th February, 1841.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

Robert C. Wetmore, to be an agent for the port of New York, in place of John R. Livingston, jr. removed.

John Chambers, to be governor of the territory of Iowa.

Orville H. W. Still, to be secretary for said territory.

Thomas B. Johnson, to be marshal for said territory.

Corneilus Darragh, to be attorney for the western district of Pennsylvania, Walter Forward, who was appointed to said office, having declined its acceptance.

Return J. Meigs, to be attorney for the middle district of Tennessee.

Charles Hopkins, to be solicitor of the general land office.

John Hogan, to be register of the land office at Dixon, Illinois, vice Samuel Hackleton, removed.

James Watson Riley, register of the land office at Lima, Ohio.

Collectors of the customs.

Nathaniel F. Williams, Baltimore, Md. vice William Frick, removed.

Levi Litch, district of Boston and Charleston, vice George Bancroft, resigned.

Joseph Enoch, Alexandria, D. C. vice George Brent removed.

William P. Briggs, for the district of Vermont vice A. W. Hyde, removed.

William Coad, St. Mary's, Maryland, vice James W. Rhea, removed.

Robert W. Alston, St. Mark's, Florida, vice J. F. Kackler, removed.

Arnold Naudin, Delaware, vice Henry Whitely, removed.

Surgeon.

William Flynt, Town Creek, Maryland, vice James R. Thompson, removed.

Land office receiver.

Daniel G. Gurnsey, Dixon, Illinois, vice John Demest, removed.

Postmasters.

Ernest Smith, Racine, Racine county, Wisconsin territory.

Horace Hall, Pike, Allegheny county, N. Y.

Asa-El Burlington, Burke, Caledonia county, Vermont.

Isaac Corington, Berlin, Worcester county, Maryland.

John C. Rouse, Argyle, Washington county, N. York.

COL. JOHN CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, it will be perceived, is officially announced as being appointed by the president to be governor of the territory of Iowa. It is understood that the president tendered to him an office of greater emolument at the seat of the general government, but he preferred the station to which he is appointed. [Nat. Int.]

Our townsman, JOHN L. WILSON, esq. has declined the appointment of district attorney of the U. S. for the western district of Florida, recently conferred upon him by the government.

[Charleston Courier.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, MARCH 27, 1841. To Mr. St. Clair Clarke, William S. Murphy and Hudson G. Gales, esqs.

GENTLEMEN: It is the desire of the president to be fully acquainted with the state of progress in which the public works in this city now are, and with the degree of skill, fidelity and economy with which those works are carried on.

For this purpose he has appointed you a commission of examination and inquiry, and he wishes you to direct your attention to the following points:

1. What is the number of persons employed on the public buildings now in progress in the city, and the character of labor? This is the more necessary as many of these persons hold offices not created by specific provisions of law.

2. What is the respective duty of each of these persons?

3. What prices are paid to them for their services; and whether, in any case, the compensation is unreasonably large?

4. Whether there has been, or is, any just ground of complaint against those persons, or any of them, either in regard to their own diligence and skill, or in regard to their treatment of laborers employed by them?

If you have any reason to suppose that any one has been guilty of misconduct, you will state the charges in detail, and give him an opportunity to answer; and will report no evidence of which the party shall not have had notice.

You will inquire into no man's political opinions or preferences; but, if it be alleged that any person, having the power of employing and dismissing laborers, has used that power, either in employing or dismissing, with any reference to the political opinions of those who may have been employed or dismissed, or for any political or party object whatever, or in any other way violated his duty for party or election purposes, you will inquire into the truth of such suggestion; and if you find reason to think it well-founded, in any case you will state the particular facts and circumstances on which your opinion is formed.

It is intended that this commission shall be of long continuance, not be attended with any considerable expense. You will use as much despatch, therefore, as the nature of the case may allow, and make report to this department. A reasonable sum will be allowed to you for your time and service out of the appropriate fund.

By the president's order:

DANIEL WEBSTER, secretary of state.

TREASURY CIRCULAR. In pursuance of instructions from the secretary of the treasury, the following circular has been forwarded to all the disbursing officers and agents of the war, navy and Indian departments, whose accounts are subject to the revision of the second comptroller.

Circular. Treasury Department, second comptroller's office, March 22, 1841.

SIR: You are hereby requested to render your account of disbursements for the current quarter as soon after its close as practicable, and in so doing you will present and refer to in your account, current two abstracts, one referring to vouchers for payments made for demands which accrued prior to the 4th instant, the other to those subsequent thereto, unless you disbursements since that day have not exceeded in amount the funds then in hand. Should that be the fact, your account may be rendered as heretofore.

You will, however, in all cases, report the amount of funds in your hands on the 4th instant.

Subsequent quarterly accounts are to be rendered as required above, should they embrace payments for demands which accrued prior to the 4th instant. By direction of the secretary of the treasury:

ALBION K. PARRIS, comptroller.

THE EX-PRESIDENT. Mr. Van Buren has been received in New York, in the warmest and most cordial manner. The N. York Evening Post says: Though the day was unpropitious, the rain falling in torrents the greater part of the time, nothing could have exceeded the animation of the occasion. Not since the famous visit of gen. Jackson in 1835, have the people turned out in greater numbers or testified with more sincere and unequivocal expression their approbation of the services, and their esteem of the virtues, of a public servant.

When he landed a salute fired on him was sent by the shouts of the multitude who thronged to see him, and so great was the press of people, and so eager the desire of his friends to pay their respects to the distinguished statesman who had sustained their principles, under all circumstances, with a mainly steady and honest, that it was difficult a way was made for him to the coach designed to carry him in the procession.

The crowd preceded round the carriage, and hung upon its steps and wheels. Nothing less than a heavy shake of the hand, or personal recognition, seemed to satisfy their ardent wish to manifest their undiminished attachment to their intrepid leader, who had been so true to his and their convictions, during the great political struggles of the last twelve years, and their unwavering confidence in his patriotic and liberal intentions.

The procession, which was headed by captain Brown's corps of lanterns, beautifully dressed and equipped, and a numerous body of armed firemen, under the command of capt. Follen, moved in the direction of the city hall. But here the route was completely filled by the throngs of people, that the progress of the line towards the city hall was almost obstructed. The entire space of the vast thoroughfare seemed covered with carriages and men, while the public buildings, dwelling houses and stores on each side, from every balcony, window and door, were animated by a living mass of human heads. The waving of handkerchiefs and hats, and the prolonged and deafening cheers greeted this procession wherever it passed.

MR. WEBSTER AND SLAVERY. It will be recollecting (say the Boston Transcript) that on the day Mr. Webster resigned his seat in the senate of the United States, he was furiously assailed by Mr. Cuthbert, of Georgia, who, in addressing Mr. Webster's untimely obituary reply, and charged him with being inimical to the interests of the south; in other words, charged with being an abolitionist, and favoring the views and principles of the abolitionists. Mr. Cuthbert has, also, since, made a second attack upon him; in both cases he was ably and eloquently defended by Mr. Clay, Mr. Preston and others. As Mr. Webster now occupies the highest post under the gift of the president, it will not be uninteresting to know what his principles in relation to the slave question are. In answer to the grounds Mr. Cuthbert had for attacking him, we copy the following letter which he addressed to the hon. Mr. Bolton, of Georgia, in answer to a request which his opinion upon this exciting subject:

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your letter of last evening, requesting me to state my opinion of the powers of congress on the subject of slaves and slavery; and of the existence of any wish or design, on the part of the northern states, to interfere with the security or regulation of the species of property.

My sentiments on this subject, my dear sir, have been often publicly expressed; but I can have no reluctance to repeat the declaration of them. It is thought by you that such a declaration might, in the smallest degree, aid the friends of union and the constitution in the south in dispelling prejudices which are so industriously fostered, and in quieting agitations so unnecessarily kept alive.

In my opinion, the domestic slavery of the southern states is a subject within the exclusive control of the states themselves; and, this, I am sure, is the opinion of the whole north. Congress has no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or in the treatment of the slave. The question was so resolved by the house of representatives, when congress sat in this city in 1790; in the report of a committee consisting almost entirely of northern members, and I do not know an instance of any expression of a different opinion, either by the house of congress, since. I cannot say that particular individuals might not possibly be found, who suppose that congress may possess some power over the subject, but I do not know any such persons, and I am sure they are few. The servitude of so great a portion of the population of the south is undoubtedly regarded at the north as a great evil, moral and political; and the discussions upon it, which have recently taken place in the legislatures of several of the slaveholding states, have been read with very deep interest. But it is regarded, nevertheless, as an evil, the remedy for which lies with those legislatures themselves, to be provided and applied according to their own sense of policy and duty. The imputations which you may say truly are constantly made against the north, are, in my opinion, entirely destitute of any just foundation. I have endeavored to repel them, so far as has been in my power, on all proper occasions; and for a fuller expression of my own opinion on this point, I refer you to the groundless charges against northern men. I beg leave to refer you to my remarks in the debate on Mr. Foot's resolution in 1830. I am, my dear sir, with much true regard, your obedient servant,

DANIEL WEBSTER

To John Bolton, esq.

UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN. The Madisonian states that the despatches received by our government, by the Catadonia, from Great Britain, are of entirely a pacific character, and although there had been some excitement in England on account of the arrest of McLeod, yet the public mind was becoming more quiet.

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND PORTUGAL. The following remarks from a London paper refer to the commercial treaty recently made between the United States and Portugal. The principle of reciprocity is one which our government long since recognized, although of late years it has been overlooked in our great disadvantages.

"The ratification of a treaty of reciprocity between Portugal and the United States, imposes on the British government the necessity of strongly urging on the constitutional advisers of queen Maria the conclusion of a commercial treaty with England, on principles equally liberal. The treaty just ratified will give to the commerce of the United States with Portugal, advantages over that of every other nation. By it the admission into Portuguese ports of American shipping is placed on the same footing as, Portuguese, the discriminating duties being revoked, and the Portuguese colonies are thrown open to United States' commerce. The republic in return abolishes the discriminative duties on Portuguese produce.

One effect of this treaty may be seriously felt in parts of the British North American colonies. The people of the United States have already deeply injured the prosperity of Newfoundland, by almost driving the British colonists out of their own fishing waters. Now, unless British vessels in Portuguese ports be placed on the same footing as United States' vessels, this treaty will give to the latter country a monopoly in supplying Portugal with salt fish, and thus afford to the crocheting fishermen of the republic the strongest motive for completing the conquest of the British fishing waters. The coarse and heavy articles of cotton manufacture, known as domestics, the treaty will also give to the Americans a superiority in the Portuguese market."

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

Trade between England and the United States. The following resolutions, passed unanimously by the American chamber of commerce in Liverpool, relate to a subject of great interest. It will be seen that the application of inclosure duties to the country on British manufactures is one of the reasons urged for a reduction of British imports upon our important staples. We take the resolutions from the Liverpool Mail of the 4th ult.

At a general meeting of the American chamber of commerce, held on the 2d March, 1841, Nicholas Roskett, esq. president, &c. &c. the following resolutions were unanimously passed on the subject of the duties on imports:

First—Resolved, That the evidence taken before a committee of the house of commons, during the last session of parliament, which was appointed "to inquire into the several duties levied on imports into the United Kingdom," has clearly established the necessity of a thorough revision of the whole of the present system of custom duties, and a view to the removal of injurious restrictions, and the reduction of imports which bear most grievously on the industry and success of the community, this chamber being convinced that such reduction, judiciously applied, will materially improve rather than diminish the revenue.

Secondly—That this chamber, being composed of members deeply interested in furthering the commercial relations between this country and the U. States of America, feels it incumbent on them to express their strongest conviction, that, unless some important modification of the existing duties takes place in respect to flour, rice, lumber, tobacco, cotton and other articles, the growth of that country, changes in the tariff of the United States will be introduced, in the course of this year, highly injurious to the British interests, and especially detrimental to its principal manufactures.

Thirdly—That the impolicy of taxing raw materials introduced into a country so dependent on its manufactures for its prosperity, has been so abundantly established, that it is incumbent on them to endeavor to induce the removal or lessening of the duty on cotton. That the enormous extent of the degrading practice of smuggling in tobacco, and the certainty that lowering the duty would lead to such an increase of consumption as to result in a loss to our government of more than the revenue, are convincing arguments in favor of such reduction. That sound policy calls for the admission of American grain, flour and rice, at a moderate fixed duty. And that the practical exclusion of American shipping interest, the manufacturer, and the community at large. (Signed)

N. ROSKETT, president.

Our trade with France. In 1830, says the Baltimore Sun, our exports to France amounted to $18,336,851. The principal article which we send to France is cotton. Of the aggregate exports just named, $13,323,112 was in cotton, $500,036 in tobacco, and $320,711 in rice. Our imports from France, during the same year, reached the sum of $32,341,324, of which $15,009,478 were in silk, $1,376,976 in wine; worsted and worsted stuffs, $1,500,000; linen, $500,000; and manufactured cotton goods, less than one million of dollars. This statement, which we believe to be authentic, shows an excess of imports over exports of $14,191,467 for the year above named. In a comparison of the imports from France, of 1839, with those of the previous year, it appears that they were nearly doubled—the difference in silk alone being nearly $10,000,000 in 1839, over the import of 1838, while the increase of exports, during the same period, was only $2,414,449. The only favorable view to be taken of this excess of imports over exports, is in the fact that the trade with France is carried on principally in American bottoms. Of the imports in 1839, $30,000,000 were in our own vessels; and of the exports, $18,336,851.

DUTIES UPON ARTICLES OF LUXURY. One of the first duties of the new congress at its extra session will be to establish a moderate tariff of duties upon articles of luxury and upon other articles now admitted duty free. The necessities of the treasury require this.

The amount of the government debt now existing is not fully known. It consists of treasury notes outstanding, interest accruing on them, debts of the District cities, and of the government, and of the sum payable to Indian tribes—disbursements in the navy pension fund, deferred claims growing out of the Florida war, the fourth instalment under the deposit act of 1836 claimed by the states, and other claims, estimated to amount in the total aggregate to a sum between one and a half million of dollars. Mr. Bernard, of New York, in his able speech in the house of representatives, estimated the whole amount of government indebtedness and liabilities, on account of past transactions, at about thirty-six millions on the first of January, 1841.

If no debt existed on account of past transactions, there would yet be a necessity for an increase of revenue to meet the current expenses of the government and to provide the means of national defence adequate to the present exigencies of the country. The system of decreasing duties established by the compromise act is now operating to lessen the public revenues, while the growing responsibilities of the government demand an enlargement of supplies.

It appears from statements exhibiting the importations of 1840 that there were imported into the United States for the year ending September 30, 1840, silks, laces, worsted stuff goods, linens and various miscellaneous articles, all free of duty, to the amount of $24,596,781.

For the same year tea and coffee were imported, free of duty, to the amount of $12,945,633.

Wines bearing low duties, none higher than 12½ cents per gallon, and the wines of France only from one and a half to two and a half cents per gallon, were imported to the amount of $1,000,000. The existing rates of duties the wines imported in 1840 yielded revenue to the amount of $196,065 81; at the rate of 20 per cent. nearly three hundred thousand dollars would have accrued, without including the wines of France, which, if they were admitted at 20 per cent., cannot be taxed above present rates until July 1841. The largest importations of wines from any country into the United States are from France.

All articles here referred to, amounting for one year's importation to more than forty millions of dollars, are entirely free of duty except wines, upon which the duties are slight. Very few other articles there are bearing a less duty than 20 per cent. We have not now at hand the means of ascertaining.

Upon the policy of giving a twenty per cent. duty on articles now free, and of increasing the duties upon articles now admitted at a less rate than twenty per cent. there would seem to be no room for a difference of opinion. There is no denying that an increase of revenue is necessary, and it is equally plain that direct taxation should not be resorted to without the most solemn and careful consideration, with difficulty from import duties, which falling upon articles of luxury, will be paid mostly by the wealthiest portion of the community. Nor will the duties be so high as to cause oppression to any class.

The following passage from a report of the late secretary of the treasury, Mr. Woodbury, addressed to the house in compliance with a resolution of that body, and which we believe is the last official communication of that officer to congress, expresses views which will commend themselves to the consideration of all parties:

"In raising the sum needed, if it does not become necessary to subject all free articles to a duty, or to one as high as twenty per cent. and as a discrimination can therefore be indulged within the restriction of the compromise act, it is doubtless a sound axiom to subject the highest tax-paying articles of luxury, rather than of necessity. Under similar circumstances, it is also not only competent, but expedient to select such of the former as compete most with similar articles of American growth or manufacture. The excess of imports over exports above the limitation of twenty per cent. And another discrimination, sometimes useful, might be to select those articles, in certain cases, for an increased import, not usually exceeding the same limitation, which may be proper for countervailing injurious imports, placed on our own productions by any foreign power. The broad and well settled ground on which these distinctions rest, cannot require on this occasion, much detailed illustration.—For the luxuries of life are enjoyed by the few, rather than the many—the rich instead of the poor—and their use tends rather to efficiency and pleasure, than to what is covetous or envious only.

This last congress adjourned without legislating on this important subject. That omission constitutes one of the chief reasons for the call of an extra session. The country will expect from those now in power a faithful exhibit of the real state of the national finances at the meeting of congress, and a well digested system to provide for the exigencies that all acknowledge to exist. (Balt. Amer.)

DISCHARGE OF TROOPS. The National Intelligencer says: "We learn that instructions have been promptly despatched (on the 11th ultimo), by the secretary of war, to discharge the brigade of Florida militia, ('sedentary') under gen. Kaul, although to be called into service by the U. S. States during the past summer. We are somewhat curious to learn what this force will have cost the country; and whether it is likely that the services of such a 'sedentary' mounted corps have been commensurate with the enormous expense for its maintenance."

INDIAN TROUBLES. The St. Louis papers of the 18th ult., contained a letter from Fort Leavenworth, giving an account of most cowardly and bloody massacre committed by some Kansas upon some Pawnees. The Kansas, 65 in number, took advantage of the absence of the Pawnee warriors from their encampment, and massacred all but eleven of the women and children found in it. One woman sold her life dearly. She sprang upon one of the Kansas warriors, like a tigress—clashed his throat and would have strangled him, if her arms had not been hewn from her body. The Pawnee prisoners were arrested by a detachment from the American force stationed at Fort Leavenworth, and had been brought into Bellevue.

ARMY.

General Scott, attended by captain Arnold, arrived at Rochester on Friday evening, and on Tuesday morning set off for the Niagara frontier.—Although recovered from its painful effects, the general bore upon his face the tokens of his severe fall upon the ice at Albany. [N. Y. Com. Ad.]

Adam B. Stewart, re-appointed paymaster in the army, from the 14th January, 1841, when his former commission expired.

Court of inquiry. A court of inquiry, lieut. Col. Riley, president, convened at Fort Mifflin, E. F. on the 15th of February, 1841, at the request of lieut. N. Hopper, 7th infantry, for the purpose of investigating his conduct as connected with the attack on the party commanded by the late lieutenant Slosswood, on the 25th of December, 1840.

The court, after duly examining all the testimony offered in the case, pronounced the following opinion:

"The court after a mature deliberation of the testimony adduced, is of the opinion that no censure or blame is to be attached to the conduct of lieut. Hopper as connected with the attack by the Indians on the party commanded by the late lieut. Slosswood, on the 25th of December, 1840, except neglecting to report the circumstances of the affair to the commanding officer of this post, when ordered here for assistance; but from his finding on his arrival here, that the troops were parading, preparing to march to the assistance of lieut. Slosswood, the court believes that the necessity of reporting to the commanding officer did not occur to lieut. Hopper."

THE NAVY.

Pensacola. We learn by the Gazette, that the French corvette Sabine, command'd by M. Cosmae Dumandiz, arrived there on the 4th instant from Havana.

The U. S. frigate Macedonian, bearing the broad pennant of commodore Wilkinson, and ship of war Levant, captain Fitzhugh, sailed thence on the 1st instant, on a cruise.

There was no ships of war left in the port of Pensacola. [N. O. Bulletin.]

The U. S. ship Warren was at Santa Martha on the 15th February, all well.

The Rio correspondent of the Exchange, under date of the 4th February, says:—In post U. S. ship Polmate, capt. Storck, bearing the broad pennant of the Rio; Constellation, bearing the broad pennant of com. Keayne; Boston, capt. Long; Decatur, capt. Ogden; Marion, capt. Bell, and U. S. schooner Enterprise, capt. Goldborough. The U. S. ships Yorktown, Dall and Relief, sailed for their separate destinations on the 5th instant.

Sparsity of English ships of war to America.—The officers of the United States ship Decatur, and the British brig of war Grecian, recently exchanged views in Rio Janeiro. These vessels are of the same size, the Decatur mounting fourteen thirty-two pounders, and the Grecian, nine twenty-four pounders, and two long eighteen.

Commodore Ridgely acknowledged the Grecian to be superior to the Decatur, in the building of her masts, greater height, and more beam between decks; and in every way more commodious; together with the advantage of being able to sail round the Decatur at least once in every two miles distance. It will be recollected the Decatur is one of the new steam powered ships, and would have been of the same arrangement of the Grecian, except for the general adoption of the bomb-cannon in the British navy: which, shame to our government, is not more in use in our own.—The Grecian is one of the new steam powered ships, and has been sent to slavers on the coast of Africa.

Our naval defenses. The Norfolk Beacon cites from a report of the board of army officers the following instances, showing the great advantage which guns on land, even within slight embankments, have over ships, whether in ships of war or on floating batteries:

Gibraltar in 1782 is cited as an eminent instance of the inefficiency of floating battery, comprehending ships under this term, also, Algerais in 1801; and it is thus attempted to be proved that guns on shore are superior to guns afloat.

In the attack on Algerais, although the disparity was greatly in favor of the assaulting fleet, that a few guns in battery on shore, well located, and well manned, repulsed the enemy's fleet, and caused it a total failure.

The attack on Fort Moultrie, during our revolutionary war, is also cited, where thirty guns behind a palmetto rampart defeated vessels carrying more than thirty times as many guns.

Lord Nelson's famous attack on Copenhagen, which has been quoted as furnishing striking and conspicuous proof of the superiority of a fleet in operating against a strongly fortified place, is reversed, and it is maintained that the coup up to the time when Lord Nelson grounded the party, was between vessels and vessels, the struggle being altogether naval, and the victory being over the floating force, and that the batteries were unable to interfere, from remoteness or relative position, the British fleet being between the most important points, and the enemy until almost the last hour of combat, and that it therefore furnishes no argument either way.

Lord Exmouth's attack on Algiers is also reviewed, where English and Dutch fleets mounted about one thousand guns, and there was only a little upwards of three hundred guns on shore, and the whole of them could not be brought to operate in the action. The loss of killed and wounded by the combined fleets being between the most important points, and the struggle being between the most important points, and the victory being over the floating force, and that the batteries were unable to interfere, from remoteness or relative position, the British fleet being between the most important points, and the enemy until almost the last hour of combat, and that it therefore furnishes no argument either way.

The board este, as further evidence of the greater power of annoyance of guns on shore than in guns afloat, the account given by the British military writers of the attack made by sir Sidney Smith with an eighty gun ship and two frigates by firing successive broadsides at a two gun battery on cape Laena, until his ammunition was nearly expended; and when it turned him being unbalanced and d-structive, he had to land with a party; and when the commanding officer capitulated, it appeared that one of his two guns had been dismantled for some time. Another case is cited, where a single heavy gun, mounted on a martello tower, beat off one or two British ships.

STATES OF THE UNION.

NEW YORK AND VIRGINIA. On page 55 of the Register will be found the substance of the proceedings in this case up to Friday evening. The following is the order of the governor declining the surrender and the subsistence of the proceedings in the case.

Executive department, March 15, 1841.
A demand from the governor of New York, for the surrender of Robert F. Curry, charged with the crime of forgery under the laws of that state, was this day presented by John D. Dix, the accredited agent of the executive of New York, together with a duly certified copy of the indictment returned by the grand jury of Thompson county, in the state of New York, against the said Curry; and it being stated that the said Curry has been arrested, and is now in custody within the jurisdiction of this commonwealth, it is ordered, that the governor do send the said Robert F. Curry, in proper form, and will be complied with whenever a similar demand for the surrender of Peter Johnson, Edward Smith and Isaac Gansey, heretofore charged with felony under the laws of this state, shall be complied with by the governor or other authorities of the state of New York.

It is, further, ordered, to be certified to the governor of New York, that measures will be taken for the detention of the said Curry for six months from the time of his arrest, a period sufficient, it is hoped, to enable the authorities of that state to determine whether the constitution and laws under which this demand is made are of as binding force on the state of New York as in the state of Virginia. By order of the governor.

WM. H. RICHARD, secretary of the com.
Friday, evening session. Mr. May submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, it appears that the governor of New York hath demanded of the governor of Virginia a fugitive from justice, legally charged with crime in that state, and now confined in this, and that such detention hath been made in conformity with the constitution and laws of the United States, but that the governor of this state, considering that the governor of New York has very recently refused to comply with a similar demand herein made by this state, has decided to proper refuse for the present to surrender the said fugitives; and while the general assembly hath full confidence that the course adopted by our governor hath proceeded from an anxious and patriotic desire to induce the state of New York to comply with her constitutional obligations to this state; yet, as the general assembly hath solemnly protested against the conduct of that state on the occasion alluded to, as a palpable violation of said obligation, and has maintained and still maintains, that the duty of the executive of each state to surrender fugitives legally charged with crime, when properly demanded by any other state, is an imperiously enjoined by the constitution and laws:

"Resolved therefore by the general assembly. That in its opinion the executive of this state, charged with crime, and demanded by the governor of New York according to the constitution and laws of the United States, ought to be surrendered, notwithstanding the refusal of the governor of that state so to act in a similar case."

After some discussion Mr. Holladay moved the following as a substitute:

"Resolved by the general assembly. That in their opinion the refusal of the governor of New York to surrender fugitives from justice legally charged with crime, and demanded by the governor of Virginia according to the constitution and laws of the United States, (though a palpable violation of that instrument, and highly injurious to the rights and interests of Virginia), does not suspend or release the constitutional obligation to make such surrenders, and that of a similar demand by the governor of New York on the governor of Virginia."

After considerable discussion upon these resolutions, the house adjourned, on order to decide couly upon the affair to-morrow.

Saturday, March 29. The resolution and the amendment which was under consideration when the house adjourned yesterday, was taken up, and Mr. Holladay having withdrawn his amendment, Mr. May submitted the following as the resolution to be passed.

"Resolved, therefore, by the general assembly. That in its opinion the said fugitive, if legally charged with crime committed in New York, and demanded by the governor of that state according to the constitution and laws of the United States, ought to be surrendered, notwithstanding the refusal of the governor of New York so to act in a similar case."

All the members present voted for this resolution, except Messrs. Cropper, Smith, of I. W. Worth, Babur, Taylor, of King George, Smith, of Gloucester and Mullin.

Some time after which, the speaker submitted the following communication from the governor:

Executive department, March 30, 1841.

To the general assembly of Virginia:
I have received and most respectfully considered the proceedings of the general assembly in reference to an order of this department, declining for the present to surrender a fugitive from justice on the demand of the governor of New York. While I have no modified regret to me that any difference of opinion should exist between the departments of our government on subjects of so much delicacy and importance as those involved in the present unfortunate relations between our own state and the state of New York, I am anxious to believe that the agents of the people of Virginia differ only as to the means of protecting rights which are, or ought to be, equally dear to all. Though the duties of the states, with regard to the surrender of fugitives from justice, have devolved, under the constitution and laws of the nation, on the executive departments of their government, and though, in the language of our state constitution, "the legislative, executive and judiciary departments, shall be separate and distinct, so that neither exercise the powers properly belonging to either of the others," still the opinion of the general assembly of Virginia is entitled to the utmost respect and consideration by the executive, because the executive agents are here appointed by the legislature. Concerning thus much, it is maintained that, with the exceptions recited in our constitution, each department of our government is responsible within the sphere of its powers only to the people.

As I am unable to concur with the general assembly in their opinion as to the duties of this department in the present occasion, I may be excused, I trust, for assigning some of the reasons which have seemed to me to indicate the course of executive action. Before I had the honor to hold my present station, a resolution was adopted by the general assembly, in the following words:

"That the course pursued by the executive of New York (in reference to a demand for the surrender of three fugitives from justice) cannot be acquiesced in, and, if sanctioned by that state and persisted in, it will be deemed a gross duty of Virginia to adopt the most decisive and efficient measures for the protection of the property of her citizens, and the maintenance of rights which she cannot, and will not, under any circumstances, surrender or abandon."

"That the resolution I was requested to renew a correspondence with the governor of New York on the subject of a demand by my predecessor, with which the governor of New York had refused to comply, for the surrender of three persons charged with crime, and who were considered by the governor of a citizen of this commonwealth. I was further requested to invite the attention of the other slaveholding states to the subject, and to invoke their co-operation in redressing the wrongs to which our state is exposed by the refusal of the governor of the state of New York to surrender these fugitives from justice. The correspondence which ensued with the governor of New York and with the slaveholding states, and its results, have been communicated to the general assembly. The whole agency of this department in connection with this controversy since I have been charged with its high and honorable trust, has consisted in executing the request and pursuing the line of policy marked out by the legislature.

The executive of New York has persisted in that course of utter and wanton disregard of the obligations of the constitution, which the last legislature declared would not only justify but demand from this state the most decisive and efficient measures of self defence. While the governor of New York alone could be considered as responsible for this course, and while a hope remained that it would be repudiated by his state, I urged on your consideration the most pacific and conciliatory measures. But when it became apparent that the course which the governor of New York had thus persisted in, had been, in the language of the last general assembly, "sanctioned" by the legislature of his state at its present session, I concurred in the conclusion which had been anticipated and declared by our own legislature, that it became "the solemn duty of Virginia to adopt the most decisive and efficient measures for the protection of the property of her citizens, and the maintenance of rights which could not and would not, under any circumstances be surrendered or abandoned."

The executive of Virginia had been committed as to his course in this controversy, and by legislative authority, before I had the honor to be connected with the executive department. Events have occurred which, in the estimation of the general assembly, justified them in denying to the citizens of Virginia the privilege which they have claimed, and which are enjoyed by the citizens of every other state, and in imposing restrictions on the citizens of New York in their intercourse with Virginia which are imposed on the citizens of no other state. By the very course which you have undertaken, as one of the co-ordinate departments of this government, to interdict the commerce and intercourse of citizens of New York with this state, except under severe restrictions. You have applied these terms indiscriminately to the innocent and guilty, and proclaimed that every citizen of New York who persisted in his course, was held responsible to a certain extent for the refusal of the governor of that state to surrender fugitives from justice who had been constitutionally and legally demanded. The act of the present session, to prevent citizens of New York from carrying slaves out of this commonwealth, and to prevent the escape of persons charged with the commission of any crime," has been deemed, on your part, a measure of necessary defence or precaution warranted by the refusal of the governor of New York to acknowledge and perform his constitutional obligations to this state. You have thereby attempted to control the action of the legislative department of the government of that state. Your authority as one of the co-ordinate departments of this government, and your duty to protect the commonwealth by all legitimate means, has not been questioned; and unless it is conceived that all the powers and all the responsibilities of our state governments have been entirely transferred to the legislative branch, it will not be denied that the executive also has duties to perform and responsibilities to meet with in the sphere of its powers, and that these may be employed for the public safety by this department, with as much propriety as they may be directed to the safety of which you are invested can be employed by yourselves. The act of congress of 1788 requires that a demand for fugitives from justice shall be made on the governor of a state. Our own constitution requires the government to request to conduct all intercourse with other and foreign states. The question then arises whether the executive of this state, in its intercourse with other states, has any discretion within the acknowledged sphere of its powers, or whether it is a mere passive instrument, bound absolutely and unconditionally to regard a mutual and reciprocal control, the total disregard of which, on the part of another state, has rendered such extreme measures of precaution necessary in your own estimation. Are the citizens of New York more entitled to the protection of the legislature of this state any more authority to retaliate on them for his delinquencies than this department has to require that he shall do justice before he exact it; that he shall obey the constitution and laws which he is bound to regard as his own? The course, before he insists on their fulfillment by this state? The federal constitution prescribes certain plain rules, which were intended to apply to all the states. New York has denied that these rules or remedies are applicable to the state of Virginia, that Virginia shall extend them to her. Her demand is made on the executive of Virginia, and on this department devolves the responsibility of deciding whether the burdens only of the federal compact as to this question are to be borne by Virginia, while the benefits are to be enjoyed exclusively by New York. The constitutional obligations of Virginia have not been denied. It has been assumed, however, that they are imposed by an authority as binding on New York as on Virginia; and that the executive of Virginia is bound to comply with on our part when they are acknowledged on hers. Is the executive department of Virginia alone to "acquiesce" where the legislature of the state has denounced acquiescence as treason?

The federal constitution is the only standard by which the rights of the states are to be controlled of that constitution, while its remedies are designed to be, and must of necessity be, mutual or unavailing. If the obligations of the constitution are set at defiance by one state to another, the injured state must either submit to the wrong, appeal to the constitutional arbiter, or seek, by its own independent power, to obtain redress. It is apprehended that few persons will be found in Virginia who will advocate submission to the wrong which has been perpetrated on this state by the governor of New York. This department has already communicated to the general assembly its views on the propriety of the federal government in reference to this controversy, but it is not within the scope of executive authority to appeal to that government, and the representatives of the people have not thought proper to do so. I have preferred to rely on the resources within the reach of your department; you have brought those resources into view, the whole state of New York, and this department has suspended its compliance with a demand of the governor of New York, acknowledging its validity, until that other shall think proper to comply with a precisely similar demand long since made on behalf of Virginia.

Are the representatives of the people of Virginia alone to complain of this? The governor of New York cannot complain, because he is informed that the rights of his state will be protected when he respects those of Virginia. The people of Virginia, to whom their governor is responsible, may ask how long justice shall be withheld from them, since it is in his power at any moment to entitle them to that which he has withheld from the people of Virginia. In all the relations of life, the rights of the people are mutual—and it is only in the intercourse of states that this rule is to be disregarded? If the aggression of one state on the rights of another are not to affect the claims of the offending state in precisely similar cases, and if the rights of the people of the state which has been injured, are to be enforced on our part will only encourage the perpetration of wrong and oppression on the part of others. If the instances of flagrant disregard of constitution, and obligations of the states which have occurred on the part of New York does not affect her demands on Virginia, it may be inquired how often the office is to be repeated before we can be permitted to hesitate in our submission?

It is not the fault of Virginia that our relations with New York have been subjected to these embarrassments. Every expedient has been resorted to, in vain, by different departments of our government to avert this state of things. The state of New York has placed itself beyond the pale of the constitution, and it is compelled to have recourse to restore the relations which once existed, and which we desire to exist again, at its pleasure. As the chief magistrate of Virginia, I have not been willing to acknowledge any superiority in the demands of New York over those of this state, and, when I took this station, no demand of the governor of New York will be respected until it is covered by Virginia. I am entitled to at least an equal measure of justice and respect with New York. It would have been to me a source of inexorable satisfaction if, in this view of my official duty, I had been sustained by the legislature. I am very sensible of the ill consequences resulting from dissensions in the councils of our state on such subjects. It cannot be longer disguised that interests are involved in this controversy which have placed us in danger while Virginians are united in their defence, which, on the contrary, has exposed to extreme peril by our divisions. I may have formed an erroneous estimate of those interests, or entertained mistaken views as to the high responsibilities of my station. On questions of this kind, I am not willing to obstruct the action of the general assembly by my individual judgment. It is now apparent that, whatever of force the position of this department may have possessed, has been impaired, if not destroyed. The general assembly have done me no more than justice in believing that my course has been prompted by proper motives. I shall rejoice if the course which you have indicated will attain the ends which we mutually desire; and, while my own conscientious convictions of duty to the state will not allow me to conform the action of this department to the views you have expressed, I beg leave to resign to the general assembly, as I now do most respectfully, the office of governor or chief magistrate of Virginia, in order to afford you an opportunity of selecting an individual who will concur as the measure which you have recommended. In thus dissolving the official ties which have connected us, I cannot forbear to express to the general assembly, and through them to the people of Virginia, the profound sense of gratitude which I always cherish in remembrance of the unmarked distinction which their confidence bestowed on me. I am your fellow citizen,

THOMAS W. GILMER.

At the afternoon session, beginning at 4 o'clock this day, Mr. Crutcher submitted the following:

Resolved, That the message of the governor on this commonwealth of this day be respectfully referred to that officer, and that he be hereby informed of the wishes of the present general assembly that he would withdraw so much thereof as embraces the resignation of his said office.

After considerable debate, Mr. May moved the following:

That leave be given to bring in a bill to fix the time when the term of the governor of this state shall commence—and that the committee have leave to sit during the session of the house.

This proposition was agreed to, and Messrs. May, Goode, Holladay, Crutcher, Worthington, Fulton and Broderick, were appointed the committee.

Mr. May, after a short time, presented a bill fixing the commencement of the term of service of the governor of Virginia from the 1st day of April.

The bill was immediately read a third time, and after a few remarks, passed, and sent to the senate. In a short time a message was received from that body that it had passed there also.

Mr. May thereupon offered a resolution that the legislature proceed on the 25th (Monday) to the election of a governor.

Before the question on the adoption of the resolution was taken, on motion, the house adjourned; Mr. Crutcher having, however, first obtained leave to withdraw the resolution offered by him. On Monday having been previously adjourned upon as the day for the adjournment of the legislature of Virginia, a great number of members having departed for home before the resignation of the governor, and a few only having returned in consequence of hearing of it, the proposition to go into the election of a governor with so thin an attendance of members, under the act which passed on Saturday, gave rise to a debate so protracted as to make it certain that the time for adjournment would arrive without coming to a decision, if the disturbance persisted in. As the state is thus left without a governor, either actual or acting. Under these circumstances, a motion was made and carried to lay the whole subject on the table. A bill was then introduced to repeat the act passed on Saturday; and the bill was forthwith passed into a law, nem. con. and the two houses adjourned without further action in the premises. The effect of this proceeding is, as we understand from the Legislature, that this district of the governor will now devolve upon John M. Patton, ex. off. until the 31st March and from that time upon the succeeding senior councillor, Col. John Rutherford, until the next legislature shall pass the necessary law, and elect a governor.

[Nat. Int. March 25.]

We understand that on Monday last, after the duties of governor devolved on him as lieutenant governor Mr. Patton issued his warrant for the surrender of Robert F. Curry, the fugitive from justice from New York; in compliance with the demand made by the governor of New York. He had previously, in his capacity of councillor, advised the surrender of the fugitive when the subject was submitted to the council for their advice by gov. Gilmer. His own sense of duty, therefore, required of him to pursue the course he has so promptly taken. He has, we understand, enclosed the warrant to gov. Seward in a brief letter, containing a strong and decided remonstrance against the conduct of the governor and legislature of New York as to fugitives from justice and fugitive slaves, with an earnest but respectful appeal to them to arrest the untoward and dangerous collisions which must ensue from a perseverance in their assaults upon the rights of the state of Virginia and the other southern states.

[Richmond Whig.]

MAINE.

David Bronson, the whig candidate for congress in the Kennebec district, (Me.) venerated by the election of the hon. G. Evans to the United States senate, has succeeded by a large majority.

Mr. Kent had been unanimously nominated as the whig candidate for governor of Maine.

MASSACHUSETTS.

The hon. Levi Lincoln, resigned on Tuesday last his trust of representative in congress from the Worcester district, to which he was re-elected some months ago.

By a minority report made to the house of representatives upon the finances of this state, it appears that the expenditures have for several successive years exceeded the income, and the committee have reported thereon with the following ex. v. slogan:

"We spend more money than we have income or resources; we employ more people in public offices than we have means to pay, without raising in debt; we must therefore either spend less, or reduce the pay of some of our public servants, and dismiss others, or without taxation the state treasury can never make the two ends meet."

It is supposed that it will be necessary to lay a direct tax of at least $100,000 to cover the deficiency of this year.

NEW YORK.

McLeod's case. The Albany Argus of Monday contains a letter from Locustport, communicating intelligence that at the court of oyer and terminer at Locustport, on the 21st March, after the judge had given the judgment in announcing the verdict, that McLeod was arraigned and pleaded guilty. His counsel then applied for, and obtained two commissions; one for the examination of Mr. Webster, secretary of state, and Mr. Fox, British minister; another for the examination of the other officers in the department. The people of the state, as of course, joined in the commission.

The correspondent of the Argus thus proceeds:

An application was then made to the circuit judge, to allow a warrant to remove the case from Locustport to the supreme court, on an affidavit setting forth some of the circumstances of the offence charged to have been committed, and that difficult and complicated questions of law would arise on the trial. The petition was granted, allowing the petition upon that ground, but might be overruled by the county judges, and that it was proper in this case for that reason, that this cause should be tried in the circuit court rather than in the oyer and terminer. The circuit judge declined allowing the petition upon that ground, as there was no allegation of impropriety bias on the part of the county judges, and our statute has provided the means of correcting any error in the proceedings of the oyer and terminer by a bill of exception.

The counsel asked for time to add an affidavit in relation to the excitement which had existed in the county upon the subject and the reasons why it was believed a fair trial could not be had. This was granted, and the court adjourned over to the afternoon, to give an opportunity to serve the writ if allowed.

During the intermission the affidavits were prepared, the court was allowed, and adjourned on the court on the going in, in the afternoon. Thus gives McLeod's counsel an opportunity to move the supreme court to change the venue to some other county.

Nomination. Ex-receiver Morris, of N. York, has been nominated by the N. York party of that city as a candidate for the mayoralty and has accepted the nomination.

The most important document which has made its appearance since the annual message of governor Seward, is a report from Mr. Verplanck in reference to the financial interests of New York. The report gives a picture of things based upon facts, and most favorable to the prospects of this great and growing state. Notwithstanding the heavy debt New York owes, she has abundant means to meet it. Any future deficiency is considered highly improbable in the report, even in the completion of all the important internal improvements which have been contemplated. The encouragement given Erie canal is spoken of as a work which may increase the revenue, upon the ground that it will diminish the rates of transportation very materially, and add much to the funds of the state to be derived from tolls. The report shows that ten millions of our dollars have been expended upon works of this character, but that the results are small. These works finished, and a cautious movement made in reference to others, of course we shall have clear and good sledding.

Internal improvements and state debts. Several bills in the legislature, appropriating money to works of internal improvement in this state, have been rejected. On one bill only thirty-nine members of the house voted affirmatively out of a total of one hundred and twenty-eight.

The situation of the finances of the state is reported as follows: The expenses for the coming year are estimated at $82,700. The revenue at $53,923 38; leaving about $30,000 to be provided for by taxation or otherwise. The legislative expenditures are put down at $23,000, the salaries of state officers at $14,000. The cash on hand $9,633 39. The amount of the school fund on the 1st of April will be $30,500 35.

The New Bank. According to the Newark Daily Advertiser, the work of enlarging the locks on this canal, undertaken last winter, and then suspended, is to be immediately resumed and perfected, so that the navigation will be opened by 1st July.

The work is to be paid for in post notes, which, by a resolution of the directors of the bank, are to be receivable par in all debts due to the bank for the purchase of coal transported on the canal.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Bank bill. The bill for the relief of the banks has finally passed the legislature, the senate on Saturday having concurred in the amendments made in the house. It was to be presented to the governor yesterday, but whether he would approve or veto it was not known. The bill is in substance as follows:

Sec. 1. Provides that the banks of the commonwealth shall be liable for the payment of their debts as individuals are now by law liable, and that the extraordinary penalties shall be repealed.

Sec. 2. Gives the banks the privilege of issuing small bank notes, under the authority of the act upon their capital stocks, for a period of five years.

Sec. 3. The total amount of debts and liabilities, exclusive of deposits, not to exceed double the amount of the capital stock.

Sec. 4. That the stocks owned by the banks, (except of the commonwealth), not to exceed 10 per cent. of the amount of their capitals respectively; provided, that no investments already made shall be compelled to be reduced more rapidly than 12½ per cent. every six months.

Sec. 5. No stockholder, cashier or other officer of a bank to be permitted to loan its funds. Also, fixes a limit to the loans of directors, proportioned to the capitals of the banks.

Sec. 6. No loan to be made to the cashiers, tellers, clerks, &c. of the banks respectively.

Sec. 7. Abolishes the proxy system of voting for officers.

Sec. 8. Persons to be eligible as directors to own amounts of stock proportioned to the capitals of the banks respectively. No person to be a director in more than one bank at the same time.

Sec. 9. Frauds by directors and officers provided against.

Sec. 10. No dividend allowed greater than seven per cent. and no interest or loan contingent fund, one half of which is to be paid into the treasury.

Sec. 12. Dividend of five percent. allowed during a suspension.

Sec. 13. Returns of the condition of the banks provided for.

Sec. 14. Provides penalties in case said reports be not properly made.

Sec. 15. Makes it the duty of the secretary to forward a copy of the act to the banks for their acceptance, and the governor to issue a proclamation upon receiving the assent.

Sec. 16. Repeals former acts inconsistent with this one.

Sec. 17. Authorizes the capital of the U. States bank, if the stockholders desire it, to be reduced to 14 millions, and the bank to be released from part of her bonus.

DELAWARE.

Appointments. The Georgetown, (Del.) Republican state, that James Booth, esq. of New Castle county, has been appointed, by the governor, chief justice of the state of Delaware, in lieu of the hon. Richard H. Bayard resigned. In compliance with the requisitions of a law, passed at the late session of the legislature of the state, the governor has appointed ex-L. L. Lyons commissioner of wrecks, or wreck master for buncost county.

VIRGINIA.

Bank law. The Richmond Compiler furnishes the following abstract of the provisions of the law which was passed at the late session of the legislature in reference to the banks of Virginia:

It renials the forfeitures incurred by the banks for the non-payment of specie and restores their charters; suspends until the first of January next the provision which authorizes any person to recover the amount of notes or debts from the banks by action on two days collection so much as any act as subjects the banks to forfeiture of charter for failing to pay specie, reserving to the legislature the right to modify or repeal their charters at pleasure.

Suspends, until the first of April, 1842, such acts as subjects the banks to a ten per cent. damages, and fifteen per cent. interest for failing to pay specie, and subjects the banks, after the 1st of January next, to the payment of twelve per cent. interest for such failure; suspends until the 1st of April aforesaid, such acts as subjects the banks for issuing notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars, and from receiving in payment or on deposits the notes of banks out of the state below ten dollars; no bank however to issue or put in circulation any note of less denomination than five dollars, except as provided by the act of the present session.

Prohibits the banks whenever, after the 1st January next, the proportion of coin held by them shall, to the paper circulation, be less than as one to five, and shall so continue or ely, if any bank, from making any new loan or discount until, by amendment, or otherwise the said proportion shall be re-established. Authorizes the holders of notes, after suspension of specie payments by the banks, to present the notes for payment, and if payment be refused, requires the officer of the bank to endorse thereon the fact and date of such presentation, and declares that such note shall thereafter bear an interest of six per cent. per annum until paid; and upon refusal of the officer to make such endorsement, the holder or bearer of any note so presented shall be liable judgment for the same with twelve per cent. interest from the time of presentation; makes it felony, punishable by confinement in the penitentiary for a term not less than two nor more than ten years, for any officer or clerk of any bank, wilfully to make, or suffer to be made, any false entry, or to omit making any proper entry, or to alter any proper entry in any account kept in the bank, with intent to conceal the true state of the account; or to defraud the bank, or to enable any one to obtain money to which he is not entitled; makes the annual meetings of stockholders of the Bank of the Valley on the third Wednesday in May. Gives the legislature the right to alter or modify the charter of any bank accepting the benefit of the act or any part of it. Requires the banks to redeem their notes hereafter issued under the denomination of five dollars, whenever presented at such banks, or their branches, and whether omitted or issued by such bank or agency, where payment is demanded or not, and for failure to be subject to all the remedies and penalties prescribed by the act passed during the present session to allow the issue of small notes.

Divorce. The house of delegates, moved by the extraordinary number of applications for divorce brought before it, have passed a bill on the subject, giving to the circuit superior court jurisdiction in such cases, under the provisions of the bill of which the following is a part:

"And be it further enacted, That, after the lapse of seven years from the rendition of any decree of divorce a mensa et thoro, the same shall operate for every purpose for and may next, as a decree of divorce a vinculo matrimonii, and it shall be lawful for such party to marry again."

NORTH CAROLINA.

The governor of the state of North Carolina has, in pursuance of authority vested in him, fixed upon Thursday, the 13th day of May next, as a day of election, throughout that state, of representatives to congress.

ALABAMA.

State bank. The bad debts due to the bank of the state of Alabama and its branches, are officially reported by a committee of the legislature to amount to the very enormous sum of $5,640,761 59! This bank belongs to the state, and has been governed by officers elected by the legislature. The loss will, of course, be suffered by the state.

Bank exhibit. The Planters' bank of Tennessee and its branches exhibited on the 1st of March, the following state of affairs:

Discounts 2,000,000; home bills 800,000; suspended debt $40,000; property bought in 165,000; amount of other banks 200,000; specie 225,000; circulation 1,151,000; deposits 3,351,000. This she owes five dollars for every one she has in gold and silver. This is too great a disproportion.

The directors for the present year are M. Watson, H. E. Wheeler, J. W. Saunders, S. V. D. Stout, A. Hynes, J. Vaulx, H. Kirkham, R. H. McEwen, H. Petway, W. G. Dickinson.

OHIO.

Legislature. In the house of representatives, on Friday last, an important proposition, after a long debate, was adopted by a decisive vote, as stated in the journal, it was contained in an amendment to the appropriation bill for the public works, and provides in effect for an authorized suspension of the banks, for one or two years, as the suspension of specie payments may be deemed proper by the legislature, on condition that the banks shall make a temporary loan to the state of one and a half millions of dollars.

The bill to protect bank meetings passed a reading, in the senate, on Saturday, by a vote of 30 to 6. About the same time the representatives, on the bill making appropriations for the public works and repealing the 12 per cent. penalty upon banks suspending specie payments, was finally passed by the close vote of 33 to 32.

The senate had adopted a resolution to admit J. C. Wright esq. upon the day of that body, so as to make one speech, in support of his claims to the seat occupied by Mr. Holmes.

In the senate, the bank committee made their majority and minority reports, on Thursday. Mr. Austin, the majority, recommended a bill to re-incorporate the banks on the so called safety fund principle, adopting as the basis of his scheme, the bill some time since introduced by Mr. Russell, Mr. Vance, from the minority of the committee, submitted an able and interesting report upon the subject of banking generally, with reference to the present wants of the state, accompanied by the house bill with amendments. Both reports were ordered to be printed. (Half Pat.)

INDIANA.

Caleb B. Smith has been nominated by a county convention, as a candidate for congress in the district late represented by Mr. Burdett, who declines a re-election.

Fire. A new and extensive bagging factory in New Albany, was destroyed by fire on the 23rd inst. Loss about $45,000.

MISSOURI.

California. An expedition is expected to leave Missouri in the course of a few months for Upper California. At a meeting held at Independence, on the 1st of May, fifty individuals volunteered for the expedition, nineteen of whom will take their families with them. A place of rendezvous is named which it is requested that all who wish to join in the expedition will assemble by the 10th of May. Among the resolutions adopted by the meeting was one to the following words:

Resolved, That our object in going there is that of peace and good will towards the people and government of California, and our principal inducement for emigrating to that country is, that we be able to procure, to be more comfortable in our travels and enjoyments than that of our present location.

State bank. This institution has resinded its order of the 13th of November, 1839, and resolved to receive the notes of the Illinois, Indiana and Kentucky banks.

The house of representatives passed a bill at its session making it an indictable offence to pass or receive a $5 or $10 note after January, 1842. It provides that all contracts the consideration of which, or any part thereof, should be in the prohibited bank notes, should be void, and that all payments made in that currency should be void; and that after a debt had been paid in such currency, the person to whom the payment was made might sue and make the debtor pay it over again! Fortunately, this oppressive bill failed in the senate.

WISCONSIN.

Bankrupt law. The legislative power of Wisconsin is a part of the legislative power of congress over the U. States. It extends "to all rightful subjects of legislation," and its exercise is to be respected and sustained in all courts and places as the action of the government of the United States.

An act of the territorial legislature takes effect from its date. On the first Monday of December, after its passage, it is submitted to congress, and if it is not disapproved by that body, it continues in force. By this silent action of congress, it becomes an act of congress. It may be repealed at any time by congress or the territorial legislature. But until it is so repealed it is in force with the assent of congress.

There is a single exception to this rule. By a special act of congress, all charters containing banking privileges granted by the legislatures of either of the territories must be actually approved of by congress before they can take effect. This is the only instance in which the territorial legislature is positively required to give effect to a territorial act. In every other, the combined power of the general and state government is fully delegated to the assembly of Wisconsin.

A bankrupt law passed by the legislature of Wisconsin is now pending in all courts, in every part of the United States, as a law of the territorial legislature of Florida was declared to be by the supreme court of the United States, establishing courts of admiralty in Florida. A decree of that court was effectual in every part of the United States, and so is a discharge under the bankrupt law of Wisconsin, a discharge under the bankrupt law of Wisconsin.

FLORIDA.

Indians captured. The correspondent of the Savannah Republican under date of Pishtia, March 14, says:

"Captain Ker, 2d dragoons, a day or two since took twenty-one Indians with their chief, Koxa Tuskenogee."

Twenty old Indians came in a few days ago at Fort Fanning, and gave themselves up.

Wild Cat has been in at Tampa and gone out to bring in his people, and letters to night say that ninety men were sent out on the 11th to escort ninety old warriors on their way in.

About four hundred Indians are already at Tampa waiting to be shipped—so fact every one writes that the war is over.

Hallock Tuskenogee, with about 100 warriors, having been twice whipped by an lieutenant Alberts, of which I gave you an account, was trailed to his camp on the Ochlockonee, eight miles south of Fort Mieray, by captain Barnham, and again whipped and routed with considerable loss.

Private Bowser, was severely, the latter, fear, mortally wounded. Soon after the engagement he was followed by captain Smith, 2d infantry, and lieutenant Sibley, 2d dragoons, each with a company, and Indian Billy, a guide, and they all set off in pursuit. In the meantime, the Indians, who were in the company of dragoons, has taken the opposite side of the river, hoping to have the game flushed and driven into his hands.

Friendly memorials. In an Indian camp, in Florida, from which the savages were driven by captain Barnham, there were found no undress uniform coats, belonging to the late lieutenant Sherwood, and a lace collar which was the property of a fortunate Mrs. Montgomery. A quantity of clothing taken from the body of slain soldiers, was also discovered, and much plunder.

Second expedition of col. Harney in the everglades, Florida. The following letter, says the Charleston Courier, from a gentleman in Florida, to his friend in this city, dated Tampa Bay, March 10, comprises a journal of col. Harney's latest expedition to the everglades, in pursuit of Sam Jones, and is furnished by an officer who accompanied col. Harney. It will show the great enterprise and the difficulties are requisite on the part of those who exert themselves in the protracted and extraordinary contest with the savages of Florida.

On the 1st of January, 1841, lieutenant col. W. S. Harney started a second time for the everglades.

With a force of 20 dragoons, 70 of 34 artillery, with four officers of the line, and 140 mariners and sailors under the command of capt. McLaughlin and the officers of the Flirt, Wave and Otsego, U. States Schooners, and the gunboat, "Hull," the force could not, carrying from six to ten men each, the force was distributed in small canoes made expressly for the purpose, and carrying five men each. The orders of the day directed that each man should be armed with a musket, a cut-throat razor, a flint ball cartridge, and the necessary blankets, &c. The most perfect silence to be preserved by every one, orders to be communicated by signal whistles, with which the officers were supplied; the boats when moving to be kept in single file, and at regular paces apart, and every man ready to drop his paddle and seize his musket at a moment's notice.—The dragoons were armed with Colt's repeating rifle, and, being under the command of Col. H. Forman, they were kept in the rear, and were ready to move at half an hour after sunset, and during a shower of rain, the command left Fort Dallas, which is situated in the bay at the mouth of the Indian river, eight miles above Key Biscayne; Col. H. in advance, followed by the gunboat, the marines, the sailors, the army next, and the navy in the rear. After passing up the bay seven miles, we entered the mouth of Little river, a tortuous and extremely rapid outlet from the everglades, and struggled against the current until after midnight, when we arrived at the mouth of the river, and made a rapid ascent, landed, and landed. — January 2d. The guide says that by not stirring from here until towards evening, we will reach Claito, Tustenuggee's island, an hour or two before daybreak, to-morrow; we were then ordered to dig up the muskets, and to be concealed in the grass and thickets, until four P. M. when we again started, but in reverse order, the colonel in advance, the navy next, and the army in the rear. It may be as well to mention here, that the army and navy were ordered to be in the rear, as a matter of order of precedence, the colonel, however, always at the head of the column. After passing up a few miles of very swift rapids, we entered the everglades at sunset, and skirting along a very narrow channel, we proceeded until midnight, when we lay concealed behind the point of it until it was quite dark. We then moved forward swiftly and noiselessly, at one time following the course of serpentine channels, opening out occasionally into a very small bay, and at other times following the shore through barriers of tall saw grass. After several hours hard paddling, we came in sight of Claito's island, and the signal was passed "to close up." Approaching cautiously, we took our position in the saw grass, and when the signal was given, in obedience to the signal, "move up and effect a landing." An advance guard having been sent in to reconnoitre, after some time reported that the enemy had left the island, and, in a tone of bitter disappointment, the signal was given, "move up and land, the Indians have escaped."

January 34. Chitto Tustenuggee's or Snake Warrior's island is a most beautiful spot, containing from 18 to 20 acres; the soil is extremely rich—about two feet deep, lying on rotten lime stone.—The centre is cleared, but the circumference is well protected by immense live oak and wild fig trees, and an almost impenetrable thicket of mangroves. There are two towns, two dancing grounds and one council lodge, on this island; with a few expeditions to the neighboring grounds, the principal articles of commerce, such as tobacco, are grown in this place. The clearing is over-run with pumpkins, squash and melon vines, with occasionally Lima beans in great luxuriance and of a most excellent quality.

the beans in great abundance and of a most excellent quality. The Indians have been gone for at least two weeks, and have left behind them all useless articles, such as war dance masks, supernumerary baskets, kettles, fishing spears, bows, &c. At 11 A. M. the colonel dispatched a small force to reconnoitre Tusconee's island, which lies about three miles west of us; they returned at 4 P. M. and reported recent signs of a man, woman and child.—The only trophies they had obtained, were some ears of green corn and a few stalks of sugar cane.

January 4th. Started at 9 A. M. for Sam Jones' island. He is said to have 70 warriors with him, and to hold a strong position; the only fear, however, entertained either by the officers or men, is that he too may have seen fit to desert his island, and betake himself to the Big Cypress. After paddling until 3 P. M. we reached a small cluster of trees, from the tops of which the guide said that Sam's camp was visible; he was accordingly sent up aloft to make an observation, and soon pronounced the place deserted.

This information altered the colonel's plans, and instead of waiting until night should conceal his movements, he advanced immediately towards the island; at the same time, however, not omitting the precaution of sending off flanking parties, and an advance guard to reconnoitre. Before sunset we had all landed, and were enjoying our bacon and biscuit in the midst of an Indian village. January 30th. Sam Jones's possessions consist of a group of islands, including in size, an area equal to a narrow sluice. Upon the largest of these, which is about one hundred and fifty yards in width and half a mile in length, are three villages and dancing grounds; the general features the same as those of the other islands, the only difference being that the village in the centre is planted with pumpkins, melons and corn, which were of course destroyed. Our greatest annoyance at this place, was the immense number of flies, cockroaches and insects, which were everywhere. The island which was alive with the former, which with the musquitos, attacked us, while the moches luxuriated on our provisions. The whole group of islands, (called the Army and Navy group), is nearly a mile and a half in length, and the only examination presented no recent Indian signs.

January 6th. A I. S. A. M. passed over three miles to the Pine Keys, and secured their whole extent; returned at night, hungry and fatigued, to Sam Jones' camp. January 6th. Started early for the "Prophet's island," which, according to him, is "two miles" from "A. I." At 11 o'clock, a "small boat" landed, and destroyed a flourishing crop of corn. A I. S. P. M. came to another island of small extent and uncleared; upon sending negro John up a tree to look out, he reported two Indians in canoes, two miles off, coming toward us. Orders were immediately given by Col. H. to lie close, as they were "about to be discovered." The boats were seen by John reported that they had seen us and were going back. The colonel gave chase, but finding there was not water enough for his large canoe, transferred the guide to captain McLaughlin's boat, and directed him to move on in pursuit—the light boats were ordered to follow. The boats were seen by the command. The colonel, with the large canoe, returned to the island, and sent up a look-out, who reported the Indians as out of sight, but our boats still going at speed, and rapidly nearing a small island about three miles off. Col. H. becoming impatient, ordered the boats to be sent on, and the passage across without any guide, started for the other island, and reached it just as some of the advance boats flushed a party consisting of four warriors, five squaws and two children; each warrior had a separate canoe, containing his family and himself. The women were in the rear, and the warriors and the women, and took to the grass water landing and firing as they ran; three of the warriors were soon shot, three squaws and one child taken; the other child was drowned by its mother to prevent its cries leading to her detection. Night coming on, one warrior and two squaws, favored by the darkness, escaped, and were not seen.

darkness, escaped. Only one soldier was slightly injured, and the rest of the party were safe. At 6 o'clock in the morning, Col. H. sent out a small force to follow the trail of the other warrior and endeavor, if possible, to take him alive, as he had learned from the squaw that he was Chin, one of the best guides in the whole Territory. The party consisted of three men, who came up with a squaw (Chin's wife) and took her; a few yards further on, upon hearing a rustling in the grass, several of the men leaped into the water, and the Chin, who was swimming, was captured from the boat, was shot by the Indian in the back. He then ran a few paces reloading his rifle, and as sergeant Sennels, of 3d artillery, rushed toward him, he turned and fired, only a few paces, wounding the sergeant in the arm. Chin then turned and shot him; Chin then struck at him with his rifle—poor Sennels sank for an instant under the blow, but blinced and twining as he was from loss of blood, he sprang up and shot Chin in the back, killing himself upon the Indian's neck crying, "I have him." Chin then drew his knife and was about to stab his captor, when a soldier arrested his murderous hand. Chin was then taken to the fort, and the sergeant was taken into a canoe and brought back to the fort, where his wounds were examined and dressed by the military surgeon.

deal officer. The bill was found to have passed through the right arm, entered the right side, breaking a rib, opening the right lung, and passing into the liver. The marine was not much hurt, the ball having only made a flesh wound. January 8th—The morning was calm, and the wind light. In addition to this discomfort, it rained hard, with a cold south wind, all last night. Chia says, that Sam Jones, immediately on hearing of Col. Harney's first expedition, had sent over to the Seminolas for powder and lead, and said that he would go into the Big Cypress, where, if he was pursued, he would fight. Chia says, that Col. Harney and his party were going to join him, and that he (with a pessimistic, should he prove false), promises to guide us faithfully to him. In consequence of this information, we returned to Sam Jones' island which we reached at noon.

January 10th. The description given by Chis of Sam Jones' probable position, is such as would intimidate almost any one except Col. H. from attempting to dislodge him. At 8 A. M. we started for the head waters of New river, which we reached at sundown, and passed down the stream to Fort Landerdsale, where we arrived at midnight.

January 11th. Having disposed of our wounded men and the female prisoners, we left Lauderdale at sundown and ascended the New river, entering it by the right hand branch, an hour or two before the sun set. After a short rest of two hours rest, we moved on to a group of key, lying between the expanse of the everglades and the edge of the big Cypress. It was here that Chia-kei was killed by the deadly bite of the enemy; but upon examination of the signs of the attack, I found that his leg had gone on to the O kee-cho-be. With a heart swelling with disappointment, Col. Harney and his men, who were weary from the march, saw his schemes thwarted by the cowardice of the Chinese. Chia-kei's fate, and deserted their bitter and inaccessible retreats. At noon the navy left, taking with them Mico and negro John as guides to the island, in the direction taken by the first expedition. After a short rest, we moved on for Lauderdale, and aided by the swift current of the New river, reached our destination at 8 P. M. Jan. 13th. Col. Harney, this morning, started for the mouth of the river, to examine the passage from the New river into the Hillsborough inlet, the low state of the water proved an insurmountable obstacle, he returned at sundown, and orders were prepared to move homeward to Morrow.

Jan. 14th. Passing down the New river to its mouth, we coasted along the shore, until we reached the Haut-over and encamped for the night.

Jan. 15th. At early dawn the canoes were hauled over from the beach into the bay; and passing down to it, we reached Fort Dallas at noon.

The Payson-o-ke, grass-water or etregledges, comprises a large portion of southern Florida, lying south of the twenty-seventh degree of latitude, and separated from the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico, by a narrow strip of land, not more than twenty miles. There are a number of outlets on the eastern or Atlantic coast, while on the western or gulf coast there is only one, now named, after its first navigator, Hatney river. The appearance presents a very singular aspect, the water being a vast immense prairie, stretching out farther than the eye can reach, covered by thick saw grass rising 6 feet above the surface of the water, which it conceals, the monotony varied by numerous snake-like channels, and small islands, some of which are from twelve; the average depth of water over the whole extent, is from 2 to 4 feet. The channels differ in width from ten to twenty feet, and in some places are so narrow, that a boat could not pass. The grass, the larger islands are about 200 feet above the usual water level, though no doubt, in very wet seasons occasionally overflowed. The water was clear and wholesome, and even where no current was perceptible, there was no appearance of stagnation.

The results of this expedition, although apparently not very brilliant, have only been surpassed in usefulness, by those of the first everglade expedition, undertaken and presented with such untiring energy and eminent success by col. Harvey. The knowledge acquired of the nature of the country, the facilities of the islands, and the strength of the various tribes, are of the most valuable character, and it is itself ample reward for the suffering and privations necessarily encountered during a movement in open boats, with no tents, a limited supply of blankets and provisions, exposed to the sun by day, and the dew by night, to the dreariest and most monotonous life, and rarely above the luxury of a fire, and living upon a fare which requires a strong appetite to relish.

DEBATE ON THE PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL

In senate. January, 15 and 16, 1841.
January 15. Mr. SOUTHWARD said that he wished to express the views which he entertained of the subject of the present bill. And though he could not but regret the late hour at which he was enabled to commence, yet, as he desired that no delay should be occasioned on his account, he would proceed.

I understand (said Mr. S.) the questions before the senate to be, first, on the amendment moved by the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN) which proposes a cession of all the public lands to the states in which they lie, with a partial grad-tion of their price when in the hands of the states. This was offered in the form of an amendment to a previous amendment proposed by the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CHITTENDEN), which provided for a distribution of the proceeds of the public domain among all the states in the Union, in a ratio of equal pre-emption granting to the settler, if his property was not worth over a thousand dollars, three hundred and twenty acres of land at the government price. It is possible that I might bring my consent to consent to this amendment in a modified form, might vote for something in the shape of pre-emption and graduation, provided they should be strictly limited and placed on safe principles—but for nothing, unless limited with a plan of distribution.

In approaching this question, permit me to remark, in the first place, that I cannot consent to let here under what I regard only as a threat, founded on the power which may in future be exerted, if we do not consent to yield up these lands now. The senator from Arkansas (Mr. SEVIER) was pleased to commence and to close his remarks, addressed as they were, or should have been, to the intelligence and judgment of the senate, with a distinct intimation that we must now do what was required of us, or, when there should be power in my vote to let us enforce their will on this subject, we should be compelled to yield to necessity. I do not understand that kind of argument as addressed to the intellect, and much less to the conscience of a senator. The discharge of his high duty. When a great question is to be discussed, I do not comprehend how my judgment is to be made to yield by having it said to me, give these lands now, or hereafter we will take them as soon as we shall have power to do so. I am to be convinced by an argument of that character. If the dictates of my judgment and a solemn sense of public duty lead me to refuse my assent to measures proposed here, no appeal to future power, no threat of future vengeance, will induce me to vote in any other way. Such questions should be decided without reference to threats of any kind, and, in my apprehension, they are very ill-applied to a body like this, consisting of the high representatives of states, and standing here under the shield of the constitution, for the protection of the rights of the people and the states which sent them.

Again. There has been introduced in the present argument much which relates to the catchword of party and the question of the majority employed in the time of the election, to obtain the benefit of the impression they might make amidst the excitement of such a scene. I ask, what have these to do with the grave questions, to whom belong the public lands and what is the duty of government in their management? These questions are very little connected with log cabins. What have they or other political emblems to do with the inquiry, what is now our duty? Was the word log cabin introduced both into the bill and the title, as reported from the land committee, by way of sneer? And can a sneer conquer the judgment or convince the conscience? Or are these things intended to forward electioneering and party purposes? The question before us is far higher than those connected with the temporary occupancy of the executive chair. It connects itself with the origin and foundation of our institutions—with all that has followed from that eventful moment to the present—and it presses on all that is hereafter to affect our children and our children's children. Such a question has no appropriate connexion with the electioneering emblems.

It is proper that I should thus notice these things, because I intend, as far as I can control my feelings, and speak entirely in the calmness of reflection. I find myself approaching, in the course of my argument, any point to which they have been directed, I will endeavor to prevent myself from turning aside to reply to the arguments derived from them. This is said to be a question of great excitement. It is so; but it ought to be so only because of the magnificent and profound interest which is inherent in the subject itself. It should not be a question of that species of excitement referred to in the debate, and which is found here, and in the state legislatures, and among politicians to a far greater degree than among the plain, laborious, unsophisticated portion of the community, either in the west or the east. It is easy to see why it is here made a question of great excitement, and the motives which excite the trouble-makers to make it so. It is exciting in the legislatures of some of the states because it is a question which addresses itself to the removal of the most painful of all the duties which the members of those bodies have to discharge. If a system of pre-emption and graduation and cession could be fully accomplished upon terms which they desire, they would be relieved from many onerous duties. Taxation would give them no trouble, in-limited improvements become a light burden, our joint property be the easy remedy for such difficulties. There is no mystery in the reason why politicians and legislatures make this a question of excitement, and should be free from all considerations and influences. Here is an immense domain, the common property of the United States. It is admitted even now, and has been in this debate, to be the common property of the whole Union, and the property of the whole people, and the history of the revolution, the terms of cession, and the principles of the union, rests upon the management and disposal of this great common property.

The first plan is offered to us by the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN), and proposes a distribution of the whole domain, lying within nine of the states, to those states. It gives it to them, and they either take it, by cession, and obtain the legal title to it, and perfect control over it, or they are to be the agents for this government for its management. From the argument of the senator, I could not distinctly understand whether his amendment was intended to secure an absolute cession to those states, so that congress can no longer have any control over the states, or whether the states were to be regarded as the agents of the general government, to carry out its purposes, and to make return to it of the results of their agency. In the first case, that of an actual cession of the whole territory to the states, and the United States lose their title to the land, if they have one, and the states acquire it, and have the land as their own, absolute, indefeasible inheritance. When this shall be the case, if the doctrines which have been advanced by gentlemen from the United States, and all the calculations which those states may assume will be not parchment, but pack-thread, broken by the slightest effort of the weakest among them. If the principles which have been asserted here be sound, that must be the result. I understand the senator to say, that if he will let us who do, I point them and others to the consequence which I think must ensue when the states shall possess the lands in fee simple, and have the absolute control over them. They will take them—they will have the right of interference, and they will have any interest in them. Their state sovereignty over all lands within their limits will be the ready answer to all your claims and rights.

But suppose the states to be mere agents of the United States, and their duty with reference to the government has entrusted to them in discharge of its own high trust under the instrument of cession. Put them in that position, and then how stand we? With our present land system still to control them. If we do not officers to receive our portion of the money, we must keep up our registers and receivers, our land districts in the states, and our land department here. I mean that, so far as these states are concerned, all the characteristics and all the expense of the existing land system must still continue. We gain nothing, or so little, that it is not worth consideration in relieving ourselves from responsibility and expense. They are our agents, and as such, they must appoint agents of their own to sell the land. A citizen comes to pay for the land he has entered, and he offers to pay a part to the receiver of the general government and a part to the receiving officer of the state. Suppose the state, or its agent, shall say no. Or suppose an arrangement is made that the officer of the state shall receive the money, and the citizen pay the price of the land to the United States, and he is to do so, what is your remedy? He is not your officer, and where is your power to punish him? He is an officer of the state, and we have heard much of this government having no power to punish him, and the consequence is, that such. I ask, how will you enforce the payment of your money?

Look at it, then, in either aspect. You give the lands to the state in absolute inheritance, without retaining any efficient lien, or the states are your agents, and you are to enforce the obligation of the contract. It is wise—it is discreet to meet either alternative. Does either arrangement come within the faithful discharge of our trust over this property?

But suppose, that the states be not to be made to receive the land on the conditions proposed. It has already been announced to us by a senator that his own state is not likely to agree to such an arrangement, and that, if he be asked his opinion, he will advise us not to agree to it. Will the states admit that Ohio shall refuse, that Indiana shall refuse, and some two or three other states in nearly the same situation of these shall also refuse—in what condition shall we stand? In this we shall be reduced to the state of three or four states, with an immense amount of land, and they will take all the benefits of it, while the other states, with our lands still within their limits, reject the proffered boon—demand of us the continuance of our obligations in regard to the whole territory, ceded and unceded, and their portion of the proceeds from the whole—Three or four states take a rich inheritance for themselves, and other people have their pride, I had almost said passions, gratified, by the exercise of their authority as to your own property, and still claim a participation of all the benefits of all the lands beyond their limits. The other states, in these respects, stand in inferior position. Is this right? Are we prepared to stand in the background?

The bill says that the cession shall not be operative unless the states receiving the cession shall pass "irrevocable laws" in conformity with it. What is the meaning of that? I admit, to my own judgment, and, in my opinion, utterly false; that a legislature can pass no irrevocable act—and has no power to bind its successors? Suppose such a doctrine shall prevail—the state legislature pass laws, which they declare to be irrevocable, giving the rate of allowance to the general government for the public land sold, and the very next legislature shall repeal the law, and declare it of no effect. Where are you then? Have they not power to revoke, according to this doctrine? That all I bargain, and they consent to the terms of it; but then there is a change of circumstances, and a change of public men, and a change of public opinion, and the legislature may say, take back your land—we revoke the bargain, and you are to be the agents of the government to obtain a right to break our promise. How then? I believe I have as much faith in the integrity and honor of the states, and in their devotion to constitutional principles, as any senator can have; but when I am called to do so, I am not a legislator, but a foreman, that great principles and interests are to interfere, and especially when I look at the ground some of these principles rest upon, I pause and wait before I yield my assent to the agreement proposed.

But suppose we agree that the nine western states shall assent to the offer of cession, what then? You have given them the entire public domain within their limits; you have distributed one hundred and sixty millions of acres among nine state of the union. Do you intend that this shall be equal among them? Are the benefits to Arkansas equal to those of Tennessee? Are the shares of Missouri and Ohio less? No man can look at the documents and not perceive that there is a high degree of benefit conferred on some states and a very moderate one on others.

Where do you rest your authority for this wide discrimination between state and state? Show me where, in the terms of union of these twenty six states, and in the terms of the constitution, you get your authority to make any such distinction. I have not read the constitution right, or you have not such power; and I hope you have not. If you commence to exercise it, where is to be the end? Your laws, I thought, were to be equal. The states are not to regard each other as inferiors or superiors—as favorites or exiles from favor. You have no right to make any such distinction, and the moment you do, the seeds of discord and dissolution are sown, and they will grow. If part of the states shall concur in the proposed arrangement, you will be in a condition to be launched. If all shall concur, you will have made a distinction which you have no right to make. I do not speak now of the distinction between these nine states collectively, and the remaining seventeen other states of the union, but of the distinction between the states themselves, with whom you deal, and with regard to whom you propose to take a step which is a violation of all equal justice and of the constitution.

If I comprehend the effect of this amendment, and especially its effect to land to the states—if the word cede is to be understood in its technical meaning, in that in which it is used in the instrument which gave us the land, or in any meaning in which it has ever been used, so far as I know, and the states shall refuse, or neglect, or omit, the payment of the debt which is due to the United States, the creditor and debtor between the general and the state governments. I ask you whether it is wise, whether it is prudent and discreet to put this government in the relation of creditor, and any one or more of the states in the relation of debtor, and such a relationship you will stand in a worse condition than the colonies in the revolution anterior to the confederation, and the states after the confederation. A state owes you a large sum of money; during the confederation it was not paid, and it could have been demanded, (poverty, I admit, was a great obstacle, and leading to a state of things which came much defeating the revolution), but it would have been commanded to make payment. It obeyed or not, at its pleasure, and it was not to be enforced by your arm. Arkansas owes you a million of dollars, and you say that she cannot make good, or speaking in the spirit of her representative here, that she will not; where is your power to compel her? You would hear very different language then from what you hear now, and you would find that you had no constitutional power to coerce the payment but one, and that is the power to make war and suppress later rebellion. You might compel payment, but it must be by drawing the sword, and bathing it deeply in the blood of your fellow citizens. For such a spectacle I have no desire, and would avoid the cause of it. I would avoid it as a ruler and a legislator, and as a citizen, because, should any state refuse that which as trustees it is your duty to demand, your only remedy is to yield, or to spill the blood of your countrymen. You must make your calculation either for results like these, or to listen to appeals made to you by sovereign states, in terms of subservience and humiliation, invoking your molestation, and begging forbearance. Before I would see states of this union reduced to this, and begging at your hand that you will put off the day of execution, I would be almost ready to invoke the use of war itself. State degradation like that would be incompatible with the existence of the union, and I regard the dignity of the states too highly to place them, by any act of mine, in such a situation.

Something has been said in this respect of the subject as to the credit which is to be given to a state; and some of the arguments (such I suppose they were intended to be) sounded, in my ear, much like sneers at the credit system, and all that kind of party eloquence. I say little or nothing of it, being sure that such a question is not one of credit to the states, or of the states, or of the indebtedness of citizens to their own government, and of states to the union. This subject was referred to by the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PASTOR), in relation to the lands sold prior to cash payments. He was right in his reference. The lands sold and unpaid for, previous to 1819-'20, amounted to $21,775,327. It was a debt due from the people of the states, or, if you please, from the states themselves. It was not a debt due from Ohio, to Indiana, and, so far as the territories were implicated, in the territories. You had sold your land without receiving cash at the sales. The purchasers were then your debtors, but the state takes the title, and you pay, as it may be done, as an individual would in 1816, '17 and '18. What is the distinction? Then your debtors were a set of humble, faithful, industrious men, seattered over your new lands. They had bought the lands, but could not pay you; and it had been the duty of the state to get out at that day a noble man, that loved his country, who did not look at the condition of things with great alarm. How did you escape from such a condition? By relinquishing part of your debt; by giving time for the remainder; and by requiring for the future the wholesome system of cash payment. Now your condition is to be greatly changed. You are about to create a debt of immensely greater magnitude; and you take for your debtors, not citizens, upon whom you can set with directness and power, but states, over whom you have no control but that of force. You could not compel payment from citizens of the states, and yet you are to deal with the states of which they are citizens. You were afraid to bring the power of the government to enforce the public right, for you were told that all your power could not reach the case; and now you propose to make states your debtors. And can you better control them? You are not to act on scattered individuals, but on corporate masses of men—on states, proud and haughty, and, if necessary, ready to resist your demand. Be warned in time. Avoid that condition of things. Create not that necessity. Let us see if we cannot continue to manage this public domain, and shun such threatening slanders. I think we can, and so believing, I would not reuder such remarks as these.

Mr. SOUTHWELL here gave way to a motion to adjourn, which was carried and the senate adjourned.

January 16 Mr. SOUTHWELL returned. After recapitulating the grounds of objection he had given over, he proceeded: I have now a few more suggestions to address to the states themselves. The language of the bill is, "that the state shall be exclusively liable for all charges that may hereafter arise from the survey, and the necessary management of the public lands, and extinguishing of the Indian title within the limits of the said states respectively." How liable? How to be adjusted? What right does it give to the states? What to the general government? Upon demand, how are they to be adjusted? How claims enforced? How a most fruitful source of conflict, not even the ingenuity of the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN), could have devised. But this is not all. Are we to understand that, according to the provisions of this amendment, the states who receive these lands are to relinquish the Indian title? Are they to take upon themselves the high relations in which the general government stands towards the Indian tribes? Is that the meaning, I protest against the doctrine. This government has no power to surrender this relation to any state or number of states. What right has Arkansas or Missouri to make a treaty with one of the Indian tribes? What right, if the treaty be violated, to punish or expel them from their territory? None whatever. It would be a direct infraction of the constitution, if any state or number of states surrender its power to deal with the Indian tribes. Has the union in any form assented to the surrender of this high constitutional power? Can the union assent to it? And if a state has no right even to make a treaty with Indians, can this government surrender the higher and better power of determining where and how the Indians are to be disposed of by force? Can they say to any state, we give you the land—you pay for the Indian title, and have therefore a right to demand that it be extinguished with and how can you do that, I mean you please? Yet such must be the result. If the purport of this amendment is, that the states are to be regarded as having the power to remove the Indians by force, or to enter into treaties with them, it is entirely against the constitution. How can the government say to Ohio, for example, here is the miserable remnant of the Leni Lenape, the remains of the once warlike and formidable Delaware, who held control over the northern confederacy of Indians, and who were driven out of their lands and reduced to a few hundreds. You make a treaty with them according to your own interests, or we will make it for you; and if they refuse to leave their ancient seats, you may remove them by any means within your force—by any means you choose. The constitution then, by this amendment, if there be provision in the constitution which justifies this, at least, have been unable to find it. These remarks have to do with the question of power.

Next comes the consideration of humanity and policy. Three states have, or fancy to have, a deep pecuniary interest in speedily expelling the aboriginal possessors of the soil. Is it right, just, humane to let them decide on their expulsion, and the times, circumstances and considerations which shall go to govern them, and which may be of great weight or appeal? Are they the only states and the only people who rise above the weaknesses and errors of our nature, and can calmly see the truth and the whole truth through all the interests and passions which bind and mislead the human mind? Are the principles of the union, have a recorded obligation, and in a record too which will not be erased or expunged, that they will regard these matters as a trust on their consciences and oaths, will they yield their duty to faith in others, and without the possibility of securing the performance of the trust, shall error be committed and wrong done, when and how can we make compensation—when and how relieve ourselves?

But I turn from this painful view of one of our easily inferior magnitude—yet one which has weight of its own in the scales of justice—the question of money. And in regard to this, I ask, are the states in whose favor the proposed cession is to be made, to bear the burden of the expense of our intercourse with the Indians and of removing them? If they are, then I entreat the senate and I entreat gentlemen from those states to look at the consequences. Are they to sustain the expense of the Indian wars which may arise from their treatment of the Indian tribes within their territories? Will the Indians consider themselves aggrieved, as they are very likely to do, was any grow out of their discontent, and the feeble remnants within these states may be connected with very powerful allies beyond their borders, and when oppression is perpetrated on the other side they are prompt to revenge and their history tells us there are civilized and Christian nations ready to give them encouragement. Are these states to bear the cost of the Indian wars which their own conduct may create, or are we not only to give them land, and give up our power to deal with the tribes, but in addition to carry on all the wars which may grow out of the management and settlement of these lands? Does the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN), mean that such shall be the result of this amendment or does he not? Such it must be, whether he designs it or not.

Is it a part of his plan that, while we cede all the land, we shall retain all the burden? How can we avoid it? Will any "irrevocable" act of a state legislation, which is not a treaty, and which when made shall have arisen. Let the Indian warlike and warlike, and one drop of American blood be shed by an Indian warrior, and what must be the result? This capital will quickly bear it, and no sooner will it be heard than the power of this nation will be called up to avenge the deed. Can we refuse? No, sir, no. It would be impossible; and yet with such a liability upon us, we are asked to surrender to the states on the frontier this entire matter, to manage according to their own notions of justice or feelings of antipathy. As I understand the plan, the old states are not only to surrender their respective portions in the public domain, but they are still to bear the burden and cost of every frontier Indian war. I ask, again, can we avoid it? Can we, under the obligation of our constitutional duties, and in possession of the power to expel the Indians and plant in the bosom of every American citizen towards every other American citizen as such—can we, in the very nature of things, avoid it? New Jersey has not a single Indian left within her borders; or, if upon the here and there a miserable survivor of his race, he is a being so considered as to have neither power nor power, nor any capacity to influence the conduct of her people for either good or ill, but let the question arise whether Mississippi or Arkansas shall be protected from the incursions of a savage foe, and New Jersey will be called upon, in arms or money—the soldier's touch of the elbow, or the sinner's which give strength to resistance or security of protection. She could not if she would, and she would not if she could, escape her obligations in this regard. She takes all the states most exposed, and bears the full proportion of burdens in such a case. However you may frame your laws, and how solemnly soever you may declare that the expense of Indian wars and the burden of their own defense shall rest upon the states, and that you have received your grant, you never can carry such laws into effect. The heart, the head, the hand of every American citizen, rise up together and proclaim it impossible. I ask, then, is it wise or just to make surrender? And for what advantages to these states, so far as money, or any rational advantage, is thereby given? They are to make the expenditures for sales, &c. and to exhibit their accounts, and we to receive them. But if done wisely, discreetly, and according to the terms of this compact, how must that account be stated?—They are to take all the states most exposed, according to their notion of the expense, and I know no mode in which we can correct them. 2. Out of the net proceeds they are to pay over 65 per cent.—when and how they will—for your laws will give them the right to do so. 3. They are to pay over 35 per cent. in full of their rights. Let the account be justly stated, and the matter fairly administered, and they will find their reward to be the gratification of the craving of the possession of money and land, and the satisfaction of their vanity, or even profit. They now get 5 per cent. This is lost. The distribution bill would give 12 1/2 per cent. The balance is to meet their responsibilities and expenses. Will it do it? It may, but I submit it to the wisdom of the states to reflect on the results of this game which is offered them, and if they cannot rise above the mere question of the possession of money and land, to decide whether they may not find themselves losers by the contract, while the union also will be the loser. With me, however, this is, in comparison, but a small question. The question I propound and must decide is, what is our constitutional duty, and what are the rights of all the states?

But this amendment, give all the force you will, more than half of all the difficulties which now press upon us, and under which we are so restless and agitated on this subject of the public lands. What does it embrace? The lands within the limits of nine states of the union, containing one hundred and thirty million acres, and, if we take the census, in all, does this nation, according to the statement, an estimate of the report of the senator from Michigan, (Mr. NORVELL), now possess? More than a thousand millions. To get rid of this question, you are dealing with one hundred and sixty millions of acres, to get rid of this, you are giving up the care of a hundred millions more. Do gentlemen suppose they are dealing with a trifle, or with only the one hundred and sixty millions? They forget the obstacles which beset them. What is to be the progress of this thing? We have no power to prevent it, and we must continue to bear all its expenses. We have given notice, whether conditionally or not I shall not now discuss, to every American citizen, and even to every alien, that he has the right to go in on all the public lands, and to acquire the title to a portion of this territory, and, at his next demand, by some rash conduct they get into conflict with the Indians, and then the whole military power of the nation must be drawn out to protect them in their trespass. But is that all? It is not. There is another principle, which has been boldly maintained here, that, whenever a territory can number sixty thousand inhabitants, it not only may be admitted into the union, but has a right to demand admission and equality with all the other states; and then, the argument is it admitted, all the land within its limits becomes theirs.

[Mr. LINN here interposed to explain. He had never heard it advocated—it certainly never had been said—himself—nor did he think it a right to go upon Indian land the title to which had not been extinguished; on the contrary, land of that description had always been excluded in every pre-emption law, nor had any amendment ever been proposed, so far as he was cognizant of.]

Mr. STUART. I must have presented my idea not so clearly as I intended, if the senator's explanation has been rendered necessary. What I say is this: on the border of all these new states lie vast bodies of vacant land which we claim. The people, or foremen, under the doctrine which has been here laid down, may cross over the line and settle upon it, for they may not know where the Indian title has been extinguished and where it has not.

Having multiplied in numbers, even if they be all citizens, they may come and seek redress and justice, and when admitted may, according to the provisions of this amendment, demand all the land upon the same terms. I do not say it is distinctly claimed that our citizens and foreigners can lawfully go on land to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, but they do in fact often go on such land, and there can be no argument against admitting them as soon as the Indian title shall have been relieved, for the language of the amendment, "whenever the Indian title has been extinguished," Here we maintain a principle which will authorize our citizens or aliens to go without the limits of a state into the lands of Iowa or Wisconsin. We assert and maintain their right to do so, and it being so we bring ourselves into collision with the Indian tribes.

And when a large number of these settlers shall send up their cry to our doors "you as our government are bound to protect us: the merciless savage is upon us: come speedily to our help!" how can we refuse them? I fear not to avoid it. I would not seek to avoid it. I admit, in its fullest latitude, the obligation of the government to extend protection over all its citizens.

I would have the name of an American citizen an impervious shield over every man who bears as in old times the name of an American citizen; the uplifted arm of tyranny and oppression was paralyzed and fell powerless at the sound. I would have it so here. At the cry "I am an American citizen" I would be ever ready to put forth all the energy of this government for protection and defense.

But, while I admit this, I insist that, when we are laying our plans for the future, and can plainly see that a certain arrangement will tempt the states into a situation which is likely to bring us into trouble, it is an argument why we should refrain from making the arrangement.

Settlers have no right, in bodies of fifty or sixty thousand, to go upon the public lands and bring upon the whole nation all the exultations and expense of an Indian war. Look at the consequences of this amendment. The nine new states take all the land within their limits. Presently the territory of Wisconsin comes and knocks at your door. We shall hear and admit her into the confederacy. According to some gentlemen, we must do so, because she has no land left to her—no territorial reserve to refuse. What Wisconsin is admitted; her territory contains millions of acres, and she then turns round and demands that you shall cede all these lands to her, as you have ceded to Arkansas and Missouri. Can you deny it now? You cannot.

The moment the territory of Wisconsin enters the union, if this bill passes, all the land within her limits is hers, and must be hers, and will be hers, if you consent to thecession which is proposed. What next? Presently Iowa comes and knocks, and she demands the same privilege as Wisconsin.

She tells you that her people have gone there on the public land; that they have increased and multiplied until they have attained the constitutional numbers, and now they have a right to be a state and to enjoy every prerogative which belongs to the states.

"Truce," say they, "there are Indian titles in the way, and there may be Indian wars, but give us all the land, and then put your hand into the treasury of all the old states, and foot up and pay the bill of all the expenses."

Your eighteen hundred millions of acres are daily being swallowed up by the progress of population. Territory after territory will apply, and the moment you admit them you have surrendered every foot of the public land which you contain. You have virtually surrendered it now, for how can you refuse, after having given the land to Arkansas, and refuse it to Wisconsin and to Iowa, and to every territory which may be formed to the Rocky mountains and the mouth of the Columbia river? Thus you are to have the burden of the settlement of these territories, the exhaustion of all the Indian titles, and the expense of all the Indian wars, and then to surrender to them every acre of that inheritance which the old states purchased with blood, when the elements were unknown, when they were yet in the loins of our fathers.

There are various other objections which lie as well against the general character of this amendment as against its details, and which, some, appear to be insuperable. I had intended to suggest a number of them; but I fear it will be unwise to attempt this further, than to call attention to one or two.

On the question of price I have already commented, in showing how the states will be situated as to the profit they are to derive from the proposed arrangement. There is another feature in the plan to which I have already alluded under other aspects of the general subject. This compact, it is provided, is to be irrevocable. The states are to declare it perpetual, inviolable, now and forever, and the general government is to be equally bound.

Now, are we grown so wise, in our day and generation, to be prepared to bind both the general and state governments? In a manner irrevocable, for all future time, no matter what unknown events may arise hereafter? Gentlemen, to be sure, may flatter themselves that their intelligence can stretch its wings to reach all the contingencies of the future, and provide for every possible posture of affairs. Our fathers, however, had not equal intelligence.

Go back but a quarter of a century, and where do you find a single man who ever looked at the conditions which now exist? Yet they, I am inclined to suppose, were as wise as we are.

Ask those who are so very ready to enter into mutual obligations, which are to be irrevocable through all future time, whether in peace or in war, whether the property is the deepest distress, if they believe that they are so wise as to be able to foresee all that will happen, and how such an arrangement will certainly bear upon events not yet present! If they tell me they are, then I bow to them as prophets induced from above with knowledge and foresight such as do not fall to the ordinary lot of humanity.

For my humble self, who claim no such high prerogative, I must object to that feature of perpetuity. We are binding ourselves, blindfolded, without knowing what circumstances will arise or what will be the result of these conditions in our hands.

Let us contract their representatives are now so ready to make. Nor can we anticipate what may be our own necessities. I object to entering into an irrevocable bond of this description. Let us pass such laws in relation to this public land as may best reach it when justice, policy, necessity may demand. Let us place the subject so that we, or those who follow us, can lay our hands upon it—so that we and they may look round, may see what our condition may require, and may alter the obligations, and then decide according to the existing state of things at the moment of our or their action.

I object, again, to the want of power in this government to enforce the provisions of its own law, if this is to be the bargain. Look at the fifth clause of this amendment, and see how you are to enforce it. On the principles of this union and under the powers granted you by the constitution, you cannot do it.

Let me now notice another item, though it is a small one, in the details of the scheme. I refer to thecession here proposed to the state of Tennessee. I do not know enough of the circumstances of the case to judge for what reason this direct grant is to be made to that one state. Still it is not placed upon the same ground with other states, but stands as an exception among them. There may be good reasons for this; but I am, for the present, incompetent to conceive on what just ground a provision of this kind is made.

But my chief objection to this amendment lies at the foundation of it. It has regard to the basis on which the whole rests. I oppose it as acession of the property of the nation. What is that property? It is the public land, the land, wider than the widest limits of the Roman empire; an inheritance almost equal to those far-spreading lands which British rapacity and power have been able to obtain for her in this the height of her glory, and which she has retained in her hands, and which she has made valuable. How came you possessors of it? Where did you get it from, that you have the right to give it away? How did you get it, that you may deal with it as a bounty to one class of states, and exclude another class from possession? With those who represent the American colonies, I would have been to be independent of the British crown, they looked, one and all, to the crown lands as being sufficient eventually to relieve them under the burden of the struggle. These lands were to pay the revolutionary debt, so that the colonies might come out of the great contest free from poverty and suffering. There was not one of the colonies who did not look to this source for relief. Hear what Maryland has said, in answer to what New Jersey and when the articles of confederation were presented to her. She was not wandering in spirit or in love of liberty. She well knew that the colonies were in the hands of the British ground of the revolution; that her property was wrecked in the storm; and though she might come out victorious, and even rich in glory, she must be hopelessly poor in other respects. She therefore made her submission, and her colonies, demanding that, while the colonies became possessors of immense wealth in these lands, and while her blood mingled with theirs, and was poured out in streams on many a battle field fought in the common cause, she should not be left alone in poverty and distress, while they were proud and powerful. Her appeal was listened to, and one of the grounds of thecession of these lands to the United States was that very appeal.

As one of her representatives on this floor, I have not forgotten enough of all I have heard from my friends of the suffering and the distress, that I should be so willing here to surrender what, in the crisis of her trial, she demanded as her due, and what was freely yielded to the justice of her demand. The whole of these lands were relieved by the revolution from the sufferings which were to be theirs, because the common property of the nation by what has been called the "generous" surrender of Virginia and other states. I would rather call it their just surrender to the equal rights of an equal suffering and a suffering code, in that they came into our possession as a common fund, for the common use and benefit; and I stop not to inquire whether the transaction was financial or otherwise. Discuss that point as you may, it will come to this at last, that whatever thecession was made on grounds of financial expediency, it was made on grounds of financial expediency, with a view to the history of our war required and justice demanded, and to sustain our republican government, our civil liberties, and thereby to preserve the hope of human liberty, it will be found of little consequence. I care not for the details of thecession, but I care for the common property of the union for the common use and benefit of all the states. It has always been so managed, and so regarded. During the early history of the government, it was never looked at in any other light. Search our history from beginning to end, and you will find that all this doctrine about surrendering it to a few of the states is a notion of very modern growth. It is not a quarter of a century old, and I think we are becoming wise a little too fast, and that we are taught to see lessons of wisdom by signs then unknown and unborn.

The men who compose them were infants in their mothers' arms, or brothers and sons of those whom they would now deprive of their inheritances. The object of them had not been laid out, and when this Virginia grant was made, who now stand here to teach us that the public domain is no longer to be regarded as common property, held for the common use. I prefer to take lessons, on such a subject, from those who were themselves in the struggle which has elapsed, and who were taught to see lessons of wisdom by signs then unknown and unborn.

court of honor, in what heart, can such a doctrine find its sanction? You have been appointed a trustee, and without regard to your principles, you are to hand over your trust to another.—Such an act would be denounced in every court as a violation both of honesty and honor.

Disputants may debate about terms and expressions. They may quarrel about the changes of names from the old confederation and the old congress, to the new and existing government. But are we not, by these changes, which have been made by those for whom the trust is held, put in the place and stead of those who have entrusted the trust to the government representative, and by their will and their command, those in whom they first confided? Is it not, with a mere change of form and name, the same trustee? Do not all the original responsibilities and duties rest upon us, in all their force, and can we avoid them, without quibbling, cowardly of an advocate, in the humblest tribunal? No, Mr. President, we stand here, in possession of the trust properly, bound to execute it—to execute it faithfully, according to the original purposes for which it was devoted. There is not an honest and intelligent chicanery on earth, which, if it could reach us, would not compel us to discharge our duty.

But it may be asked, how, then, are you to divide the land? Will you divide it? Will you divide the money into a distribution of the proceeds, or will you divide the land? But will remark that the persons among whom we propose to divide the inheritance are the very persons from whom we have received the trust, who own and are competent to decide for themselves on these interests. They are competent to receive it. They are the owners; we are trustees. If they say to us, keep the title, but divide the proceeds among us, and we obey their mandate; is there any violation of justice or law in such a division? Is it the only mode by which we can divide the property of a common fund. Graduation and pre-emption apply the land only to a few of the owners—not equally among them all. But when you distribute the proceeds you can exact and equal justice to all and you can divide the property, can you nothing either in the law or in the terms of the contract, or the principle of justice, which forbids us to adopt the measure. So far from it, I think I see in it the only and last hope of those who made the purchase to receive their lands. If you divide the proceeds, you will not agree to distribute the proceeds, they must buy their account to lose the whole. What hope can New Jersey, or Connecticut, or Rhode Island entertain of receiving any return for the millions they have expended, if the lands they have bestowed to earn this rich inheritance? None; none. And if you go on with your pre-emption bills, and your graduation bills, and your session bills, till you have parted with the last acre out of your possession, then will have been accomplished before the civilized world a grand exhibition of the justice of republican communities. After the struggle has united in an odious and agonizing struggle for national independence, and poured out its blood like water, and secured for those to come after them a rich inheritance of free principles and social laws, prizes, one of the great prizes which they won is seized and ravished from the possession of those who gained it, and who suffered for it. Is this your republican justice?

But we are told that this domain is a subject of constant difficulty in the transaction of our public business—that it is a prize to be fought for—a stake for which political gamblers will always be contending—and that, if we would have any peace, it must be reserved for the use of the government. Lands will always be held out as a bribe by the ambitious where to obtain power; that we do not possess sufficient firmness and virtue to resist; and that such a bid will be made for votes, through the promise of this vast territory, as must disturb all the future regular action of the government. It may be so. But I think that, if there have been bids made, the bids of the senator from South Carolina (Mr. C.) for outstrip the whole of them—and I hope no future dealer in the commodity will be able to outstrip him. But it is so. The Congress cannot perform its regular legislative duty on account of the immense prize which the public domain holds out to ambitious men and to parties within its halls. I am reluctant to believe it. But if it be true, by the will of the bribe offerer, and the greediness of the bidder, it must be offered by the new states, or by those who court their favor. They have the lands within their hands. Their politicians can make bids, but those from the old states cannot so well do it, without the degrading and dishonouring ambition is, however, and enough to encounter.

When I hear gentlemen say that there is a political game to be played by means of the public lands, what am I to understand but that the new states hold a great prize, and that they can offer it to unchastened ambition, if it gratify their wishes. A political game? Where? Where does it prosper? It prospers in the great case of the new states. I do not believe the public lands, if they were worth ten times as much, could bribe the American people to give their suffrages in any quarter which their judgments and their hearts do not approve. I know, I know, that the new states, in power or place can purchase the votes of New Jersey at any such price. How it may be with others, I can only judge by what I see of the virtue and consistency of those who represent them—and by their conduct.

In connexion with this idea of our corruptibility, by means of the public lands, it occurs to me that another suggestion is worthy of some notice. It comes, however, from a different quarter, and is subject to another consideration. It is that, such a political affair have been matter of such speculation on the exchange of London. The inference—if any inference is intended to be drawn—must be, that London stock-jobbers and London capitalists have gone common with the party opposed to the existing administration, and have had some influence in the recent election, and must have some in its future results and effects. And the administration—the executive—by its acknowledged organ, announces such to be their true opinion; an organ on which it is reasonable to rely, for it has other means and instruments of defence—pride themselves as these means and instruments may.—Now, to me, this is a marvellous idea; suited, indeed, to the sense of right and wrong of any editor, sold, soul and body, to his party, and reckless of every consequence save one—success. But, who offered on this floor, it should be sustained by evidence, which might at least afford an apology for asserting a fact which, if true, reflects unbecomingly on the character of the country. It is that, at the late election, I have said that I could not, here, and on this occasion, discuss it. I have proved that, at other times and other places, I was not slow, however, to seize and wield the weapons which I saw in the hands of my opponents. But other matters claim our attention—far higher, both to my own state and the union, than the temporary possession of executive power, or the triumphs of the hour to a party. But the character of the country, the virtue and integrity of the people, the interests of the nation, the suggestions, coming with the pomp of authority and the confidence of influence, and which must, however they may be intended, affect the future action of the nation, should demand at least an inquiry as to the reputation of the country.

I ask then for the evidence. What is it? So far as yet developed, a banking house in London has written a letter, and articles in newspapers and reviews, and perhaps some books, have been published in London. When, and in what year, has it been established that this was the proper evidence, which to try the character of our parties, or the character and motives of our people? Since when have opinions, emanating from that source, been so much in favor as to be considered decisive on such a point? Sir, we are changing rapidly; banks and banking houses abroad are now regarded as good guides in estimating the character of our parties and people.

But who is this banking-house? What opinions have they expressed? What gives to their opinions such weight? How were they induced to say any thing on such a subject? I understand them to be an ordinary banking house in London, (Huth & Co.)—dealers in stocks and money—one of the great houses in London, and in the Bank of England. They have no peculiar knowledge of us, no connexion with us; nor capacity to judge of us, or of our interests, characters, or motives. I do not know that they have the slightest connexion in relation or interest with the whig party—though it is said that they have with a portion, and that not an unimportant one, of the supporters of the present administration. What induced them to give an opinion? The state of Missouri chose to issue certain stock, or obligations, which rested upon the state. That state said, that a portion of which money was to be raised to be used in the state. She chose to send, or to permit to be sent, some of this stock—this state security—to London to pass it off and get the money which was needed. Her agent, I understand, was Huth & Co., and the company, and the company was induced to manage the securities for the state, and sell them or otherwise procure the money. In all this what had the whig party or the majority of the people to do?—What had the people to do? They had nothing to do. The state said that the agent was so commanding in his influence. They did not select the securities to London. They did not select the agent there. And if that agent—the agent of an administration state and administration interests, has expressed opinion, it does not seem to accord very well with fairness and justice, to bind us or the people of the country by them. It would be to bind us fair and just to receive as binding the allegations and opinions of the representatives of that state, her senator here, as conclusive. I should hardly be willing to place the evidence of the agent in London above that of the selected representatives of the state in Washington. The latter hold a far more commanding position. But what opinion do Huth & Co. express that its influence is to be so controlling? It seems to me, in substance, to be nothing more than this: that state securities, and the state of Missouri among them, cannot be sold in the present condition of things; and that those who wish to invest their money in them are not willing to do so because they are fearful of the opinions, and principles, and conduct which prevail, and which are to be anticipated from the party in power in this country; but that they would be somewhat relieved, and more willing to buy, if this position should succeed. Now, if this opinion be ever so absurd and monstrous, I beg that we may not be assailed with it; that, if rebuke is to be given, if the appeal is to that state to its senator, agent, and that he be taught by his principals more justice and good sense, and courtesy towards them. It may be a difficult task to him to alter his convictions. He says and sells, not for himself, but for those who will purchase his securities, his securities. He does not buy to hold, but for sale to others. The London brokers and banking houses are not the agents through which the retired and quiet holder of money makes his investments. And it will be a very difficult task to him to alter his opinion of his buyers with safety? Was there not justice in the opinion expressed—proper grounds on which any man would hesitate to hazard his property.—Have not the general government and administration parties in this country, and the country, in general, man pause? Recollect the course of one state, and her want of punctuality in paying the interest; the avowed principles of the executive of another state; the doctrines promulgated in so many quarters of influence; and now, the position of the country, in general, unnecessary resolutions of this body about assuming state debts. If you had money to lend, would you lend it to those who avowed such principles? Would you not prefer to lend it to those who refused to avow such principles, and acknowledged the unchanging obligation of their bonds, in whatever hands they might be found?

But enough of this. I ought not to reason on such a question on the floor of this body. Before the representatives of what we proudly call sovereign states, shall it be said or suggested, with out rebuke, that the people of those states have been influenced in their highest act of sovereignty by the exchange of London? Is there money enough in London and Paris to bribe, or the combined wealth of Europe, to bribe the voters who decided the recent election—to govern their suffrages, when great principles of government and civil liberty are to be discussed and decided? Then have I miscalculated the virtue of my countrymen.

But if the gold of British banks did operate with such a deadly and resistless power, it must have been somewhere, and can be pointed out. I ask where? In what state of the union? Was it in Indiana? or Ohio? or Delaware? or Vermont? or Massachusetts? or Connecticut? or Rhode Island? or Georgia? or New Jersey? or was it in Missouri? or which of the states was brought to its vote by influence from the London exchange? Let us have some specification. And if no single state be named, then I put it to another question, one by one, to say whether it was their state which was "bought up by foreign capitalists"? Was it in your state? or yours? or yours? No; no stock-jobbing combinations could ever accomplish a political revolution such as has changed the face of this entire land. I have no belief in any such degrading of persons of my country. I plant myself upon the intelligence, the honor, the virtue, of the American people, and I believe them far above the reach of any such influence.

I do not believe the proposed scheme as to the lands will operate at all to remove from our deliberations here the struggle of party opinions. If things have reached that point, or if we are servile and money bought, we had better, I say, at once, give up the republic, and establish a monarchy, or a struggling for it, if it have become already so corrupt as such arguments assume. Let each senator apply that to his own state, and if he think them merited, let him be content. But as applied to me and to mine, I repeat them not.

I have now concluded what I have to say in regard to the amendment of the senator from S. Carolina.

The amendment proposed by the honorable senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN), comes

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The steamship British Queen arrived at New York at an early hour on Saturday morning, the 4th inst. bringing London and Liverpool papers to her day of rating, the 10th March.

The Queen experienced a very rough and disagreeable run, and on the 30th ult. having been out 20 days, found herself obliged to put back for fuel. She left Halifax on the 1st, and made the passage to New York in three days.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The people of England appear to have been panic-struck at the intelligence which reached them respecting the packets George Washington, U. States and Westchester, from New York. The first named vessel took out the news of the stoppage of the United States bank—the second that of the indictment of McLeod, and the Westchester Mr. Pickens' report in congress on the McLeod affair. These three causes combined, created a sudden panic among all classes of persons, and the funds at the stock exchange were materially lowered in consequence.

We find it utterly impossible in our limited space, to give at this moment even a synopsis of the comments of the press upon this intelligence, but upon Mr. Pickens' report, which seems to have created the greatest shock, the Globe says—"the painful effect which this intelligence, 'party document' must otherwise produce on the strongly cherished hopes of the people of this country, of an amicable adjustment of the dispute, will be much relieved by the tone of the principal speakers in debate which ensued on the question of printing this report."

There are nothing in this manifesto of empty and unreasonable denunciations, qualified as they are by the strong expressions of dissent and reprobation with which it was received, to shake our belief that peace will be preserved."

The Morning Chronicle of the 9th says: "The publication of this report created considerable uneasiness. In this feeling, we confess, we do not altogether participate. The very men who drew up the document—it is plain upon the face of it—must have felt that they were putting their names to a case upon which no nation would venture to enter upon hostilities. The language of the report is not the language of men who either were convinced that they had a good cause, or were determined to go to extremities in a bad one."

The Times says: "We shall not quarrel from this offensive and unjust tirade, but we earnestly invoke our readers to study it in extenuo for themselves, and then judge themselves what chance exists of fair or just treatment for Great Britain from those authorities with which such a catalogue of merits could have originated."

"If the Harrison government be, as we believe it will be, against the report, it is then not ground to fear that they may be too feeble to resist the war action."

From the money articles in the same papers, we find that this American news caused a panic in the markets.

The Dispatch says, "the stoppage of the United States bank will cause a great deal of misery here as well as in America. Shares which brought two years ago £24, are now anxiously sold at £4 10s."

The Morning Herald says, "the financial and political news from New York produced a considerable impression on the stock market, but the depth of this impression would be ill measured by the actual decline merely in quotations of stocks, for it must be remembered that the funds were on the rise, and with a firm tendency to a greater rise still."

The Globe of the 8th says—"The arrival of the Westchester from New York, whence she sailed on the 16th February, brings certain information that the congress of the United States, by the large majority of 103 against 65, had voted in favor of the report on the McLeod affair, which was calculated to excite hostilities with England. The subject being has taken up by congress, the government must of course act in conformity with the will of the majority, and therefore the chance of seeing the acts of the interior jurisdiction of the state of New York overruled by the general government no longer exists. It makes the danger of a collision more imminent than it was before. Our citizens, viewing it in this light, have shown a much greater degree of alarm regarding the question this morning, than they did on the receipt of the previous communication, and stocks fell 8 or 3 1/2 per cent. immediately after the opening of business."

Chp. 12 o'clock. The effect of the unfavorable news received yesterday from America is wearing off here; but we perceive that it is viewed in a serious light in Lancashire, where people have begun to purchase cotton largely, under the impression that some interruption to the trade with America may possibly take place, and that article has consequently advanced in price.

Two o'clock. Consols for America had reached 85 1/2, but they have again fallen to 85 1/4, and for the account 88 1/2; new 34 per cent. 96 7/8 to 97, and exchequer bills 75 to 75 1/2 premium.

[Globe of 9th, P. M.]

A squadron ordered to America! The Times and other papers state as a positive fact that some part of the squadron, believed to consist of ten sail of the line, which had been engaged on the coast of Syria, had been suddenly ordered off the coast of America, to support the remonstrance of the British minister, Mr. Fox, against the "judicial murder of McLeod."

Infantry for Halifax! The Times also states, that "three battalions had been put suddenly under orders for Halifax," and adds, "God knows how the home service of the realm could be furnished after the departure."

The Atlas says, "war with America must and will as surely follow upon the murder of McLeod, as the light of morning follows the darkness of night; but then this war will be a war without any definite object, except revenge for an injury which cannot be proved to no country."

The news from the continent was of very little interest.

In France every thing is as quiet as at our former state.

On the 5th of March, in the house of commons, while discussing the question that the house go into a committee of supply, to which the army estimates were to be referred—

Mr. S. O'Brien took the opportunity of advertising to state the relations between Great Britain and the United States. Two circumstances were stated in the newspapers to have occurred recently, which, if true, deserved the immediate notice of the house of commons. The first was that a true bill had been found in the United States against colonel McLeod for murder and arson, on the allegation that he had been present at a transaction ordered by the colonial authorities of Canada, and the second was, that the legislature of Maine had recently passed these two resolutions:

"That the government be authorized to take immediate measures to remove the troops of the queen of Great Britain now quartered on the territory called 'disputed' by the British government; that the resources of this state be, and they are hereby placed at the disposal of the governor, and the specific sum of $400,000 be, and the same hereby is appropriated out of any moneys in the treasury, for the purpose of carrying the said resolutions into effect." He did not know what authority there was for believing these resolutions to be genuine; but if they were authentic, they amounted to nothing less than a declaration of war against Great Britain. (Hear, hear) He was more adverse to war than any individual in that house. He looked upon a war with the United States as one more to be deprecated than any other, inasmuch as it must be of a fratricidal character. (Hear, hear) He likewise saw that the vast commercial interests of this country must be exposed to disasters by its continuance.

Still, if war did take place on the present occasion, it would be a war of necessity. Besides, we should lose our high character as a nation, if we did not defend our colonies when attacked, neither could we claim their allegiance if we did not give them protection when they were acting under our authority. (Hear, hear) He had seen a great number of our vigor under the auspices of the noble secretary for foreign affairs in another part of the globe, where it was of a more ambiguous character than it would be on the present occasion, and that he trusted that the noble lord would in this emergency display the same vigor which he had displayed elsewhere. His movements, however, were so secret—and he did not blame the noble lord for it—that the house had no opportunity of forming an opinion upon the efficacy of his directions. (Hear, hear) It was, however, his duty, as a member of parliament, to say that our interests would be better secured than they were at present in case we had a strong fleet in front of the harbors of the U. States and a strong army on the frontiers of British America. He left it to the government to say whether the naval and military estimates were on a sufficiently large scale to meet every contingency that might arise in that quarter of the globe. (Hear, hear) If they were not, ministers would be wanting in their duty if they did not come down to parliament and ask for such sums as would enable them to meet every contingency. (Hear, hear) He was sure that the house would willingly comply with any demand which would enable them to secure the honor and interests of the country. (Hear, hear)

Mr. Ewart did not see the necessity for participating differences between the two countries. He believed that the great body of Americans were inclined to peace with this country—they knew their own interest too well, he believed, to wish for war. He trusted that the unhappy discord which it appeared existed at present might pass off without evil results, and he was confident that, if it did, not only the interests, but the wisdom, of both nations would be satisfied.

Mr. Hume hoped that the noble lord would be able to satisfy the house and the country by some statement on this subject (cries of oh!) and remove any prejudice which might be occasioned by silence. He (Mr. Hume) was of opinion that there were no grounds for immediate interference, and thought that nothing had taken place in America, but what had been done under the civil law. It was manifestly too soon to appeal to war when they were not informed that any thing had taken place which was not in accordance with the laws of these countries in which they had taken place.

The house then went into committee, and there had nothing occurred of much interest in the house on the 9th of March. On the 5th, the following took place in the house of commons: The earl of Mountcashel, said, he rose to put a question to the noble vicar opposite respecting some information which had, it appeared, been just received from America, and which was of great importance to this country. That intelligence, he understood, had created a great sensation in the city, and had caused a fall in the price of the public funds. He alluded to a report from the committee of foreign relations, made on the 12th of last month, to congress, and he wished to know whether any confirmation was to be given to the statement which had been received by her majesty's ministers? It was not his intention, on the present occasion, to submit to their lordships any motion on the subject as he was most desirous not to cause a greater division between the two governments than that which unfortunately now existed. But when a report, such as that to which he had referred, was promulgated, it was plain that they should receive information as to its authenticity. For his own part, he thought it could not be genuine. He believed that it must be an invention, and there were many persons who would be glad to purchase such a report for stock-jobbing objects. He felt very great doubts as to the authenticity of the report, and why—because, aware of the good understanding of the inhabitants of the United States, he could not think that they would maintain such doctrines.

He was convinced that if the inhabitants of the United States would but consider—if they would look around to the situation of their own finances—if they would recollect that there were 3,000,000 of negro slaves in their country, and a great body of Indians in the West, and that he had referred to the fact, in consequence of the wrongs they complained of, to take a part in the contest—if they cast their eyes towards Canada, where there was as loyal a set of men as any in the empire, and asked, "Had they not the power of getting into their hands individuals belonging to the United States?" and also if they recollect that the very large body of regular troops that we had in Canada, and the efficient naval force which was now at our disposal, in consequence of the western question being settled—they would, if they considered these points, anxiously abstain from hostilities. They were a calculating people, and they would see that they must sustain an immense loss by such an event. For these reasons he was of opinion that the document was not a true one. He therefore asked the noble viscount whether his majesty's ministers had received any official information respecting this report. Under all the circumstances, he felt that he was perfectly justified in putting this question. The report had appeared in the public papers, and it was necessary that some information should be afforded respecting it. At the present moment he did not think it right to make any observations on the subject; but if they were given to understand that the report was to be considered as official, he should feel it to be his duty, at a proper time, to bring it to the notice of the house, for a denunciation of the insult to this nation could not possibly be concealed.

Viscount Melbourne said, he was unable to give any other answer to the question of the noble earl than by stating, that he was not aware of whether communication had been made to the minister of his majesty's minister in the United States relative to the subject referred to. But he apprehended from the form in which the document appeared, that there could be no doubt of its authenticity.

House of commons, March 9. Mr. Hume moved for a return under different heads, or the manner in which the several sums voted for the insurance in Canada, viz: in 1838, £500,000; in 1839, £647,000; and in 1840, £353,000, amounting in the three years to £1,500,000, were expended. "A return of the number of muskets and other fire arms, of swords, and the quantity and kind of military stores, sent to and landed in Syria, since July, 1840." Also for the return of the number of English, Scotch and Irish non-commissioned officers and privates in the whole of the British army in each of the years on the first of January, 1830 and 1840, distinguishing the house-hold troops, the cavalry, the artillery and sappers and miners from regiments of the line." Ordered.

In the house of commons, on the same day, there was no allusion to the affairs of McLeod, or Mr. Picken's report: neither was there on the following day.

United States bank. The first impression of the news of the suspension of the United States bank, produced a panic among the stockholders, and the market generally. United States bank stock fell to £4 10s. but in a few days rallied to £5 10s. which is the price quoted at the latest dates.

The London Observer gives the amount of this stock held in Europe at about £4,000,000, or £15,000,000; and recommends that some mode be adopted, to ascertain whether the holders of that stock would not desire that the affairs of the bank be wound up. The paper of the 7th says:

"The shares to-day averaged about £5 10s. each. The more current price to-day of such an American state securities as have been actually dealt in were these:—New York redeemable in 1845 to 1860, 84; Pennsylvania redeemable in 1864 to 1865, 80; Ohio, redeemable in 1856 to 1860, 80 to 90; Massachusetts, redeemable in 1856, 100; Indiana, redeemable in 1861 to 1866, 84 to 86; Indiana redeemable in 1870, 75; South Carolina, redeemable in 1858 to 1862, 88 to 90; Louisiana, redeemable in 1845, 37, 38, 39 and 40, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100; Alabama, redeemable in 1858, 59 and 60, 78; New York city five per cents 83.

The United States bank. The fall of the United States bank, naturally draws attention to the loans contracted last year in Europe by that institution, as they show the very great extent of its liability to the market. The following are its existing engagements then, at the period referred to, the bank has received the following loans:—two in London, the first for £800,000, of which half will fall due in April, 1841, and the remainder in April, 1842; and one in Amsterdam, for £200,000 payable on the 1st of October, 1841, and October, 1842; also, the Dutch loan for £700,000, redeemable in five years. These engagements amount to £2,400,000, to which is to be added the £1,000,000 of credits on the agency establishment in Philadelphia; all entered into within the space of about 2 years, and thereby the whole has ultimately derived from English capital, employed too, be it remembered, to save a part of the loss which otherwise must have fallen upon the Americans themselves. It was a current remark in New England on the large credit in London in favor of the United States bank were made known, that they had served to realize for New York an equal amount of "suspended debt," and to throw the whole weight on England. Such a wreck of a great banking concern has probably never before occurred. The 100 dollar shares, which never fell to 25s. before, are now to the first suspension of specie payments, are now quoted at 4l. 10s. and that in almost a nominal quotation.

It seems to be the nearly universal opinion that something is well left but a liquidation, and that, therefore, it is delayed the worse it will be for the creditors.

Bank of the United States. From the London correspondence of the New York Courier and Enquirer, we extract the following gratifying information:

"The intelligence of the suspension of payment of the bank of the United States was altogether unexpected in England—the institution having been thought to be in a course of returning property—and which would be more confirmed when it was known in the U. S. that all the bills had been readily accepted by the house of Robert Moore & Co. Whatever renewal of difficulties this may lead to in the United States, appears difficult to be perceived in this country, as the circumstance had been entirely unforeseen—but in the interim it is gratifying to inform the friends of the bank that all the pause which it will a large margin in the margin of the London agents, it is only proper to be observed that so far as the suspension of payments at home, has occurred at a time when its affairs were re-established in England, it is a consideration probably of some importance in the event of its resumption of business, or winding up its affairs. The firm and liberal conduct of the London agents has created a marked reaction in favor of the shares of the bank, and although every other American security is now totally unobtainable, there is not only this afternoon a ready market for the shares at 13s. and 6d. but there is one broker who is in possession of orders for the purchase of £200,000 shares, if to be obtained at the rate of 50 per share.

Of the state securities it is needless to enclose a list, no transactions being ventured upon by any person in London, nor is there expectation in the London market until the arrival of intelligence from the new administration of the United States.

Liverpool, March 9. The duty on flour remains at 17s. 6d. and the article is offering to day at 25s. per bbl. in bond, without finding buyers. The corn market very dull and on the decline. Turkeys 11s. 6d. to 14s. 10d. per pair. Live geese, 10s. to 12s. 6d. at higher prices, and some few fowls have been made at an advance of 1/2d. per lb.

Liverpool cotton market, March 9. Of the transactions this week, Saturday and Monday embraced about 16,000 bags, of which the greater number were made being stored amongst the following four days, in about equal portions; and we have found, as we have noticed on Wednesday last, that in the rates of demand, so has been the steadiness of prices, which elude the same as on Friday last. It is very evident that since the receipt of the last account from the United States, and the lack of encouragement from the Manchester market, that a greater degree of caution actuates buyers, whilst the account of short crops still has its influence with the holders. Speculators have received 7,000 bags of American and 500 Super 1,250 bales of American and 110 Surat were forwarded into the country last month unsold. The sales to-day are about 4,000 bales of all kinds.

Cotton market, March 9. The sales of cotton to-day embraced 1,000 bags, of which speculators have purchased 700 Americans and 1,000 Surats; the rest is to the trade.

The market has been very brisk, and prices are 2 to 4d. higher than on Friday last. The advance is attributable to the warlike intelligence received from the United States, which has induced speculators to withdraw their stocks from the market.

TURKEY, EGYPT AND SYRIA. The Austrian Observer of the 26th ult. states that intelligence from Constantinople of the 15th ult. informs us, that the sultan's firm granting to Mehemet Ali and his family the pasha of Egypt hereditarily, had just been prepared."

The firmans had been forwarded to Alexandria on the 14th ult. The first contained the order to invite Mehemet Ali with the pasha of Egypt, as viceroy of Syria, and to allow him to withdraw the pasha of Egypt are to be subjected. The second firman invites Mehemet Ali to send the arrears of tribute due for Arabia, Candia and Syria to Constantinople. The third firman places the provinces of Senaar, Nubia and Ethiopia, provisionally under the orders of the "general" of the Egyptian army. It would appear, says the London Times, that the Turkish government anticipate a refusal on the part of Mehemet Ali to accept the terms with which his recognition by the sultan was accompanied.

The Ottoman government desires to see the ambassadors, announcing to them that the Egyptian affair being concluded, the blockade of the coast of Egypt was raised, and the liberty of commerce re-established.

The London Times states that a protocol has been signed by all the powers, parties to the treaty of July, in which it is declared that the provisions of that convention are brought to their natural close in consequence of the fulfilment of the purpose which it was intended to accomplish; and that a definitive arrangement has been made, in which France will be a party, may be speedily and appropriately consequence of the expiration of the late treaty.

CHINA, INDIA AND EGYPT. By an extraordinary express from Marsabit, in anticipation of the overland mail from India, late intelligence from China, from the several presidencies of India, from Alexandria, and from most of the ports in the Mediterranean, was received in London on the morning of the 10th, and was brought by express to Liverpool by our agent at London, in answer to be despatched by the British Queen.

The great object of interest in the intelligence received by this express is the state of the British relations with the Chinese government. The negotiations up to the 18th of December, which is the latest date of the news from Macao, appear to have been successful, for the Chinese seem desirous of shuffling and delay.

On the 6th of November admiral Elliot issued a notice at Chusan to the British there, stating that a truce had been concluded with the Chinese, binding them within certain limits, the British boundaries being Chusan and the small island adjacent. This notice was accompanied with a recommendation to endeavor to conciliate the Chinese. The other plenipotentiary, captain Elliot, issued a circular declaring that the interests of the British at Chusan should be secured during the negotiations. In answer to the same, a dreadful mortality diminished the troops there.

The admiral, with a considerable portion of the squadron, arrived on the 20th of November at Tientsin. On the 21st captain Elliot proceeded in the Queen to the forts at Bogu-fort, in order to deliver a letter for Keesen, the boat was accompanied with a flag of truce flying, but it was fired at by the Chinese from the fort. The boat returned; and several shots were fired at the steamer, one of which struck her. Two shells were thrown into the hut from the steamer, for the purpose of the capture. Captain Elliot went subsequently to Macao, and by some secret means contrived to send the letter.

An apology was demanded for the insult to the flag of truce, which, after some delay, was assented to by Keshen.

On the 26th of November preparations were made for an attack on the English works, as Keshen was suspected of producing unnecessary delay. However, he made his public entry into Canton, having taken care to give previous notice of his arrival to the admiral. On the 29th of November the admiral, on the ground of serious indisposition from palpitation of the heart, resigned the command of the expedition to com. sir J. Gordon Bremer, and sailed for England on board the Volage.

The proceedings at Canton have since been strange. Keshen, on the ground that the people were supposed to be desirous to communicate in person with the outside barbarians, is said to have declared that he would not interview with them at Peiho, and sent two subordinate mandarins to confer with captain Elliot. Some efforts were made to liberate Mr. Stanton, which were successful. Nothing is known of the other prisoners.

Threats are stated to have been used by the commander, whose nomination to the command has been hailed by all the British at Macao, that unless Keshen would begin the negotiations in reality, recourse would be had to hostilities. The 14th and 17th of December had been named as the days of attack; but on the 13th captain Elliot went to Macao, and told the merchants that the negotiations were still open. Great anxiety is felt at Bombay about the result, for without success at Keshen, the sincere in his efforts to make peace, others devised the fact, and stated that hostilities would become imperative. A few days would decide.

The merchants at Bombay have addressed petitions on the subject to both the governments.

The admiral left Singapore for England on the 20th of December. Tranquillity prevailed in India, and the intelligence by the express brought nothing of importance from any of the presidencies.

The commander in chief of the Madras army, sir S. F. Whittingham, died of apoplexy on the 19th ult. He has been succeeded, ad interim, by major general Allen, during the absence of sir Robert Dick, the senior officer. Great apprehensions prevail respecting the Galeatas, a tribe of which 1000 soldiers for China from Madras in September; and has not been heard of since he passed Singapore.

In the month of November, sir Lionel Smith, the governor of the Mauritius, found himself obliged to resign the command of the island, and the province of Bourbon, to issue a proclamation, ordering all the French allies to prepare to leave that colony until the question of peace or war be better decided.

The French frigate Magicienne was lost near Palawan on the 27th of November. The crew was saved by two English vessels.

London, March 10, 12 o'clock. The greatest excitement prevails in the city, occasioned by the promulgation of the news by the overland mail from India and China. Tea has suddenly risen in price, and the stock market is very much depressed, and exhibits a downward tendency.

I have no time to add another word, am only enabled to write this with a pencil on my way to Southampton by an express train. A steamer will be ready to convey me to the British Queen, with all your despatches. Your humble servant, P. Q.

TEXAS.

Overland trade with Mexico. A late number of the Shreveport Intelligence states that two envoys arrived at the city of Mexico, from the provinces of Mexico, charged with power from the people of Chihuahua, Durango and Zacatecas, to make terms of amity and commerce, in order to open a communication between those provinces and some ports on the Rio Grande. The Shreveport Intelligence paper says that those provinces consume nearly one hundred millions of goods annually, and that they labor about $5,000,000 worth of goods annually.

CANADA.

Elections. The Rochester A-brothers has a communication supposed to come from Wm. L. McKenzie giving the result of the recent elections to the legislature in Canada, as far as ascertained. The article says, that of thirty-two members who have been elected nineteen are reformers; and thirteen are classed as tories. The house consists of eighty-four members, forty-two from each province; until further returns are received the political character of the united parliament will remain in doubt. The Upper Canada returns are more republican than was expected; the Lower Canada more conservative.

A dreadful riot occurred at Toronto recently, between opposite political factions. One man named Jas. Dunn, a tailor, was killed on the spot. A second, a coachman of the receiver general, received a ball in his thigh, but we understand, is recovering. A son of Mr. Cathcart, was shot through the thigh, and a constable named Davis was struck in the hand—the ball piercing his coat. An express started immediately for the military, and in a very short time, a company of the 34th was on the spot. The riot was repressed, and the soldiers returned to the barracks. The house was immediately forced, and eight men, one of them much wounded, were escorted by the sheriff and a party of the military to jail. More troops arrived, and order was soon restored.

George Arthur arrived at Boston on Monday, and taking passage in the Calcutta, the elections in Canada, so far, shows a return of 36 unionists and 19 of the opposition party.

New Brunswick. The provincial legislature of New Brunswick closed its session on the 25th inst. with a unanimous vote of satisfaction and the lieutenant-governor, sir John Harvey, took a final leave of each other, with strong expressions of mutual regard. The speaker of the assembly, in presenting the money bills for the lieutenant-governor's assent, addressed him as follows:

"In presenting the money bills, I may be permitted to observe, that since the arrival of your excellency in the province, six sessions of the legislature have been held, in all of which the best understanding existed, and continues to the present moment. The two deliberative branches are united in sustaining your excellency's enlightened and liberal administration of the government."

"The results of this happy state of affairs are contentment and tranquillity throughout the province, and a rapid increase of the number of our resources—and a great advancement of general prosperity."

"The useful and unremitting labors of the present session are not, therefore, particularly distinguished by any extraordinary proceeding, will, without doubt, prove highly beneficial."

"I cannot omit this opportunity of expressing my deep and painful regret that your excellency is shortly to leave our shores, and I am assured that my feelings on this occasion are in unison with those of the whole population of this colony."

Sir John Harvey, in his address to the assembly, announcing the close of the session, after thanking the house for the liberal supplies voted for the public service, and after some remarks complimentary to the loyal and enlightened course of the provincial assembly, and of the general conduct of the people of the province, closed his address as follows:—

"The queen having been pleased to terminate my official connection with New Brunswick, the painful task is imposed upon me of bidding you adieu which I know you will believe that I do with feelings of deep emotion—arising as well from gratitude for the confidence which you so frankly reposed in me from the first hour of our intercourse—confidence which has alleviated and facilitated the anxious duties attaching to my station, and rendered their performance satisfactory and delightful, and as I will hope, and as you have been pleased to assure me, beneficial to the province—from regret at my separation from a people among whom several of the happiest years of my life have been passed, and to whom I shall ever feel myself linked in sentiments of unceasing regard and affection—and lastly, from pride and satisfaction at the prosperous and happy state in which I leave you."

"In imploring for the people of this noble province the continuance of those blessings to which their many high-minded qualities so justly entitle them, I will add, that for myself it will constitute one of the chief consolations of my remaining exile, to be permitted to witness the progress which New Brunswick is destined to make in all that relates to her prosperity and improvement."

"England already looks with great interest to the progress which New Brunswick is to make, and to the barrier against the spread of ungodly and unconstitutional opinions on this continent; and I foresee, that in the course of events, that feeling will be elevated into one of just pride in the possession of so noble a heritage for her glorious institutions."

"I have yet one more observation to make, and if that observation should be deemed superfluous, I trust to your candor to impute it to its true motive—an anxious desire to perpetuate to you, as far as my advice or influence may be permitted to extend, the blessings which have resulted from the harmonious work of the machinery of which legislation and government are composed. Permit me, then, to impress upon you the advantage to the public interest which must result from according to the disinterested wishes of the people, who have placed in you the sovereign to represent her majesty in this province, the same degree of confidence which you were pleased to repose in me, and to which, I repeat, I mainly impute, under the blessing of Divine Providence, whatever of success may have attended my efforts to be useful."

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

DEATH OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE U. STATES.

"I WISH YOU TO UNDERSTAND THE TRUE PRINCIPLES OF THE GOVERNMENT. I WISH THEM CARVED OUT. I ASK NOTHING MORE." Such were the dying words of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON—the, upon whom but one brief month since, were reposed the confidence and affections, as well as the highest hopes of this whole people; has been suddenly, by the overruling dispensation of an ALL WISE PROVIDENCE, removed from the scene of mortal things, and a nation is in mourning. May we receive this chastening, with that true humility through which alone we are authorized to look beyond the deepest of gloom to the rainbow which is still hung in the Heaven.

Washington, April 4, 1841.

An all-wise Providence having suddenly removed from this life WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, late president of the United States, we have thought fit to say a few words in relation to his death, and in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT from the seat of government, to make this afflicting bereavement known to the country, by this declaration, under our hands.

He died at the president's house, in this city, this fourth day of April, on Monday, the 4th inst., at thirty minutes before one o'clock in the morning.

The people of the United States, overwhelmed, like ourselves, by an event so unexpected and so melancholy, will derive consolation from knowing that his death was calm and resigned, as his life has been patriotic, useful and distinguished; and that the last utterance of his lips expressed a fervent desire for the perpetuity of the constitution and the preservation of its true principles. In death, as in life, the happiness of his country was uppermost in his thoughts.

DANIEL WEBSTER,

Secretary of state.

THOMAS EWING,

Secretary of the treasury.

JOHN BELMONT,

Secretary of war.

J. J. CRITTENDEN,

Attorney general.

FRANCIS GRANGER,

Chief Justice.

The following announcement of the death is from the Madisonian of the 6th.

The national bereavement. A dark pall covers this community. The arrow of death, which always seems to love a shining mark, has reached our chief magistrate before he had completed the term of his office. The arm, which not long since wielded a sword in defence of the country, is palsied—the eye, which lately beamed so brightly and benignantly, is closed—the voice whose trumpet tones but a few weeks ago resounded through the halls of the capitol, is forever hushed and silent—and the venerable form of William Henry Harrison, lately animated and erect, has become but a cold and lifeless clod. The hopes of a nation are withered, and high and confident expectation has given place to grief and despondency.

Who shall measure the anguish of that afflicted family, from whose midst an all-wise Providence has removed the affectionate husband, father, relative, friend and benefactor? And although the tears of multitudes may be mingled with those of the relative, and the sympathies of a nation be excited, yet who can repair the loss? May God, in his Providence, sanctify the dispensation for the overruling good of the family and the nation. The great consolation to the bereaved is the hope of the eventful and patriotic life of the deceased, as there is also in the manner of his death. In the one, as in the other, he has manifested the goodness of his heart, the constancy of his patriotism, and the purity of his intentions. Short as has been his administration, none who have been friends to him will have cause to regret their efforts or their devotion.

The particulars. From the moment general Harrison was elected president to the day of his illness, his heart has been filled with gratitude to the people, to whom indeed he has always been affectionately devoted. In the generosity of that heart he has invariably opened his doors wide to the reception of his friends, and his house has been the abode of hospitality and kindness. His friends, his friends, alas, to his own destruction. From sunrise in the morning, till nearly midnight in the evening, he has incessantly devoted himself to his fellow citizens who visited him, with the exception of the few each night who were called to breakfast. It was his habit, after rising, first to pray, then to read the Bible and then to take a walk before breakfast. Frequently he would bring in with him persons he had met in his walk to breakfast with him. And afterwards, the whole day would be spent in receiving company and transacting business.

On Thursday morning week the porter, who found him reading the Bible, and even then complaining of indisposition, suggested to him the propriety of excluding visitors until 10 o'clock in the morning. "No, no," said the kind hearted president—"let them come in. Many of them have come from distant states to see me, and they wish to get home, and I will not refuse them." On Saturday morning, however, we saw him, and he was at that time complaining of a headache, and expressing his regret that he found so little time to attend to important business before him, alluding to a map of Florida which he desired to examine, as he wished to bring the war in that territory to a speedy close. The next letter he wrote, was on the subject of that war. The same afternoon he was taken with a chill, and retired to that bed, which has in eight days proved his last. We were not without hope of his recovery until the afternoon of last Sunday, when a severe diarrhoea came on, under which he soon sank. Religious services were performed by the rev. Mr. Hewley Saturday evening, and he did not seem to have become insensible until after 10 o'clock. At a quarter before 10 o'clock the president gave his last breath, which was taken down at the instant, by Dr. Worthington, and deserves to be remembered as reflecting glory upon his death. It was in the following words, and it may be supposed to be addressed to governor Tyler, who became general Harrison's successor under the constitution: "SIR, I WISH YOU TO UNDERSTAND THE TRUE PRINCIPLES OF THE GOVERNMENT. I WISH THEM CARRIED OUT. I ASK NOTHING MORE." At about 11 o'clock the general raised partially from his pillow and coughed. After this he was not the slightest indication of sensibility. He gradually sunk—until the pulse first departed from the left arm, and immediately after, viz: at half past 12 o'clock, the circulation entirely stopped, and general Harrison, without a struggle, went into the eternal sleep of death.

As his fame will be immortal on earth, so may his spirit rest in eternal happiness in heaven.

There were present at the closing scene, in addition to the medical attendance, such of the relatives of the family as were connected with the members of the cabinet, colonels Todd and Chambers, who were the aids of the general at the battle of the Thames, and a number of other personal friends.

Immediately after the demise, the members of the cabinet, (except the secretary of the navy, who is absent), withdrew and prepared the above announcement of the fact, which they deemed it their duty to make to the country, and despatched immediately an express for gov. Tyler, at Williamsburg in Virginia.

The National Intelligencer of the 8th inst. in publishing the announcement, by the secretaries of the departments, of the death of president HARRISON, accompanies it with the following remarks:

"The solemn event which has just occurred above, although the public will have been in some degree prepared for it, will be to the whole country an astounding blow. The uninterrupted health of the deceased patriot, his robust constitution and active strength, up to the last week of his life, had left his countrymen nothing to wish and nothing to fear in regard either to his bodily or mental capacity for the able discharge of the high trust to which he was called. The tens of thousands of citizens who assembled to witness the ceremony of his inauguration, felt in the presence of this trumpet voice, and assurance that he possessed health and strength equal to the arduous duties which lay before him. But this promise and this confidence were soon to suffer a reverse. The week before last, pursuing the practice of his usual life, and his habit of early rising and exercise, the president, in the course of a long walk before breakfast, was overtaken by a slight shower, and got wet. The following day he left symptoms of indisposition, which were followed by fever, and an increasing and ruinous illness, which afflicted all medical skill, and terminated his virtuous, useful and illustrious life, on Sunday morning, after an illness of eight days. He expired a little after midnight, surrounded by those members of his family, who were in the city, the members of his cabinet, and many personal friends. Immediately after his demise, the members of the cabinet retired and drew up and signed the above announcement, and caused it to be published. In the course of Saturday the president appeared so much better as to inspire hopes that his demise would be retarded, but at about four P. M. a sudden and very unfavorable change took place, and he continued to sink until death closed the scene.

"The last time the president spoke was at nine o'clock—a little more than an hour before his decease, and the words which he then uttered were so remarkable that they deserve to be recorded and remembered. While Dr. WORTHINGTON and one or two other attendants were standing over him, having just administered to his comfort, he cleared his throat, as if desiring to speak aloud, and, as though he fancied himself addressing his successor or some official associate in the government, said: "SIR, I WISH YOU TO UNDERSTAND THE TRUE PRINCIPLES OF THE GOVERNMENT. I WISH THEM CARRIED OUT. I ASK NOTHING MORE."

"These his last words were uttered in a distinct voice, and as they were well calculated to do, impressed the gentlemen present so solemnly that Dr. Worthington immediately wrote them down for preservation. They present a brief but impressive record of the thoughts which occupied the last moments of the departed patriot, and are characteristic of him throughout his life, and shone forth even in the hour of death. Thus passed from life, and from the station on earth most worthy of a noble ambition, this good and wise and illustrious citizen. It is not for us to attempt to do justice to the solemnity of the occasion, or to the deep grief which pervades all hearts. As more fitting and adequate than any words of his could be, we quote the following expressive language uttered from one of our pulpits yesterday by an eloquent divine:

"The intelligence of this morning, my Christian friends, has filled thousands of hearts, and will fill thousands more, with sadness and anxiety. The chief magistrate of our union is no more. One short month since, amidst the breathless attention of an immense multitude, with clear and solemn voice, he called God to witness that he would faithfully discharge the duties of his high office—his solemn vow to appear in the presence of that God. The praises of his friends, the denunciations of his enemies, are alike awed into silence before this dispensation of mysterious Providence. Amid the busy schemings of man the Supreme Ruler has manifested his power, and we read with irrepressible awe his awful lesson, of the uncertainty of human life, the emptiness of earthly glory."

"You have seen—how recently and sadly seen—the summit of human power—affords no security to the shadow of death. The illustrious man, the lately solemn nation's idol now lies in the calm death slumber which knows no waking till the final day. Those deeds of service to his country which were so familiar to the lips of thousands, and that fidelity to his country's good, lately so fervently expressed, and as true as sincere, are no more. And all else that graced his character have followed him to the bar of the just and the merciful Judge. Before that bar, my friends, we also are to appear. We know not how soon. May we so use the present time as to prepare ourselves for that day?"

We extract the following announcement of the death of general Harrison from two of the leading opposition papers.

Office of the Globe, April 4, 2 o'clock, A. M.
It is with deep regret we announce that WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON is no more. He died at thirty minutes before one o'clock this morning. His disease was pleurisy, complicated with disordered liver and bowels, and from the first bore a serious aspect. All the efforts of the medical skill and most unremitted attention were unavailing. In announcing this melancholy event, all other reflections are absorbed in the thought of the nothingness of life, the emptiness of earthly grandeur. One brief month has witnessed the ascent to the summit of the duties of the exalted station of chief magistrate. "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue."

From the Baltimore Repository, April 3.

A NATION MOURNS ITS CHIEF: Death of Wm. Henry Harrison, president of the United States. In the words of the poet, and more than that, what we are called upon to announce to the American people, the melancholy intelligence of the demise of their chief magistrate, WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, who had scarcely entered upon the high duties of his exalted station, and whose shadow of death has struck him to the earth, and his spirit is summoned to mingle with the illustrious dead. The whole nation must feel the shock, and millions of freemen mourn the deeply afflictive occurrence.

We have never before witnessed such a universal gloom thrown over a people, as was produced in this city yesterday morning upon the arrival of the melancholy intelligence from Washington, rendering it more unexpected as it was, in consequence of the ill health brought by the late attack on Saturday evening last, being of such a nature as to create a hope that the end would be more distant, and that there was good grounds to believe that the president might recover, but,

And bows to woe as the north wind's breath,

And stars to set—but all,
That shall not soon be thine own, oh death!"
Upon the receipt of the news, the flags of the shipping in port as well as other places, were placed at half-mast, and the different bells tolled throughout the day.

General Harrison's family. The connections of general Harrison present the following relations at the time of the decease of their beloved relative, were the following:

Mrs. WILLIAM HARRISON, (son's widow).
Mrs. TAYLOR, of Richmond, (niece).
Ma. D. O. GOULDING, (step-daughter).
HENRY HARRISON, of Va. (grand-nephew).
FINDLAY HARRISON, of Ohio, (grand-son).

The number of strangers in the city yesterday was very large. The corpse lay in state in the entry of the president's house during the day, and hundreds went with melancholy steps for the last time to view the mortal remains of the departed hero.

Colonels Chambers and Todd. An impressive and affecting feature of the closing scenes of Saturday night, was the presence of those two gentlemen at the death-bed of their long-loved general. In the battle of the Thames they were the chosen aids of a commander-in-chief. Col. Todd was aid, and acting adjutant general from 1812, until general Harrison resigned in 1814. Col. Chambers and Colonel Chambers were in the last of the war on the right hand fork of the Thames. They stood by general Harrison where the bullets flew thickest, and when he told them to prime their pistols—that he was determined not to be taken alive. They were steady by him during the day, and during the late political campaign, no two men were more zealous or active in repelling the assaults of the general's enemies, or in defending his fair fame, than they. They stood by him night and day during this, the general's last battle with the forces of terror, and saw that all was done that could be to resist his final conqueror, death. There has seldom occurred an instance of more enduring and devoted mutual attachment, confidence and friendship.

Before his death, general Harrison showed how highly he estimated Colonel Chambers, by appointing him governor of Iowa. He had also fully determined to manifest his confidence in Col. Todd, by nominating him to the senate for a mission abroad. The vice president, Mr. Tyler, arrived in Washington city on Tuesday morning about 4 o'clock. The special messengers who were sent to inform him of the death of the president found him at James Town, Virginia.

REPORT OF THE PHYSICIANS.
Washington, April 4, 1841.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with the request made to us by yourself and the other gentlemen of the cabinet, the attending and consulting physicians have drawn up the abstract of a report on the present state of the late president, and transmit to you.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,
THO. MILLER, attending physician.

To the Hon. D. Webster, secretary of state.

On Saturday, March 27, 1841, president Harrison, after several days' protracted indisposition, was seized with a chill and other symptoms of fever. The next day pneumonia, with congestion of the liver and derangement of the stomach and bowels, was ascertained to exist. The age and debility of the patient, with the melancholy termination, forbade a resort to the bloodletting. Topical depletion, blistering and appropriate internal remedies, subjoined, in a great measure, the disease of the lungs and liver, but the stomach and intestines did not regain a healthy condition. Finally, on the 3d of April, at half past 12 o'clock, he expired, under which he sank, at 30 minutes to 1 o'clock, on the morning of the 4th.

The last words uttered by the president, as heard by Dr. Worthington, were these: "Sir, I wish you to understand the true principles of the government. I wish them carried out. I ask nothing more."

Immediately after the decease of the president, Mr. WEBSTER, jr. chief clerk in the department of state, accompanied by Mr. BEARD, an officer of the senate, set out for the residence of the vice president, in Virginia, bearing to him the following letter:

"Washington, April 4, 1841.

"To JOHN TYLER, vice president of the U. S.
"Sir: It has become our most painful duty to inform you that WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, late president of the United States, has departed this life. This distressing event took place this day, at the president's mansion, in this city, at thirty minutes before one in the morning.

"We lost no time in despatching the chief clerk in the state department as a special messenger to bear you these melancholy tidings.

"We have the honor to be, with the highest regard, your obedient servants,

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE FUNERAL.
Washington, April 8, 1841.

The circumstances to which we are placed by the death of the PRESIDENT render it indispensable for us, in the recess of CONGRESS and in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, to make arrangements for the funeral solemnities. Having consulted with the family and personal friends of the deceased, we have concluded that the funeral be solemnized on Wednesday, the 7th inst. at 12 o'clock. The religious services to be performed according to the usage of the Episcopal church, in a church in which the deceased most usually worshipped. The body to be taken from the president's house to the congress burying ground, accompanied by a military and a civic procession, and deposited in the receiving tomb.

The military arrangements will be under the direction of major general MACOMB, the general commanding in chief the army of the United States, and major general WALTER JONES, of the militia of the District of Columbia.

Commodore Morris, the master in plain in the navy now in the city, to have the direction of the naval arrangements.

The marshal of the District to have the direction of the civic procession, assisted by the mayors of Washington, Georgetown and Alexandria, the clerks of the supreme court of the United States, and other citizens as they may see fit to call to their aid.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, ex-president of the United States, members of congress now in the city or abroad, all the members of the diplomatic body resident in Washington, all officers of government, and citizens generally, are invited to attend.

And it is respectfully recommended to the officers of government that they wear the usual badge of mourning.

GENERAL ORDERS.

War department, Washington, April 8, 1841.

It is with feelings of the deepest sorrow, that the secretary of war announces to the army, the death of the president of the United States WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON is no more. His long and faithful services in many subordinate, but important stations, his recent elevation to the highest in honor and power, and the brief term allotted to him, in the enjoyment of the honors of government, and citizens generally, are invited to attend. And it is respectfully recommended to the officers of government that they wear the usual badge of mourning.

While the officers and soldiers of the army will share in the general grief which these considerations so naturally and irresistibly inspire, they will doubtless be preatened with increased sensibility, and feel a deeper concern in testifying, in the manner appropriate to them, the full measure of a nation's gratitude for the eminent services of the departed patriot, and in rendering just and adequate honors to his memory, because he was himself a soldier, and an approved one: receiving his earliest lessons in a camp, and when in ripe years called to the command of armies, illustrating the protection of arms by his personal qualities, and contributing largely by his successes, to the stock of his country's glory.

It is to be regretted that the suddenness of the emergency has made it necessary to announce this sad event in the absence of the vice president of the seat of government; but the greatest confidence is felt that he will cordially approve the sentiments expressed, and that he will, in due time, give directions for such further marks of respect, not prescribed by the existing regulations of the army, as may be demanded by the occasion.

JNO. BELL.

Navy department, April 5, 1841.

The department announces to the officers of the navy, and marine corps, the death of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, late president of the U. States, which occurred at the executive mansion, in the city of Washington, on the morning of the 4th inst. and directs, that, uniting with their fellow citizens, to the manifestation of their respect for the exalted character, and eminent public services of the illustrious deceased, and of their sense of the benevolence the country has sustained by this afflictive dispensation of Providence, they wear the usual badge of mourning for six months.

The department further directs, that funeral honors be paid him at each of the navy yards, and on board each of the public vessels in commission, by firing twenty-six minute guns, commencing at 12 o'clock, M. on the day after the receipt of this order, and by wearing their flags at half mast for one week.

J. D. SIMMS,

Acting secretary of the navy.

Navy department, March 5, 1841.

The acting secretary of the navy, requests the officers of the navy, in the city of Washington, or in its neighborhood, to appear in uniform, at the navy department, on Wednesday the 7th inst. at 10 o'clock, A. M. to receive the funeral honors to the late president of the United States.

Militia of the District of Columbia. The foregoing notice from the head of the executive department of the government informs you what a signal calamity has befallen us, in the death of the president of the United States, and the prominent part assigned you in those funeral honors which mark the death of a nation's respect to the memory of a departed patriot and statesman, whose virtues and talents as a citizen and soldier, had achieved illustrious services, and whose sudden death has disappointed the expectation of still more important benefits to his country.

With a view to carry into effect the views of these high officers of government, in a manner befitting the occasion, and honorable to the militia corps of this District, I request the general and field officers of the militia, to be present at my house (at 10 o'clock, A. M. on the 7th inst. at 10 o'clock, to report the strength and equipment of the several corps of the militia, and to receive final instructions for parade and arrangement in the military part of the funeral procession.

The commanders of such militia corps from the neighboring states as desire to unite in the procession, are respectfully invited to report to me as soon as practicable their intention, with a view to arrange them in due and uniform order, as a part of the general military escort.

The detail of them arrangements, to which all the military accessories, both of the army and militia, are expected to conform, will be published in due time for the information of all.

For the present it is deemed sufficient to say that the whole military part of the procession, including the regular troops of every arm and denomination, and all the militia corps, whether of this District or of the states, will be consolidated in one column of escort, whereof major general MACOMB, commander of the army of the United States, will take the general command, and brigadier gen. ROGER JONES, adjutant general of the army of the District of Columbia, will act as adjutant general and officer in command.

WALTER JONES, major general,
Commanding the militia of the District of Columbia.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Headquarters of the army,

Adj't gen's office, Washington, April 6, 1841.

The death of the president of the United States, having been officially announced from the war department, the major general, commanding-in-chief, communicates to the army the melancholy intelligence with feelings of the most profound sorrow. The long and faithful services of the deceased, in which president HARRISON has been engaged since the first settlement of the western country, from the rank of a subaltern to that of a commander-in-chief, are too well known to require a recital of them here. It is sufficient to direct the fields of Tippecanoe, the banks of the Miami, and the Thames, in Upper Canada, to recall to many of the soldiers of the present army the glorious results of some of his achievements against the foes of his country, both savage and civilized.

The army has on former occasions been called upon to mourn the loss of distinguished patriots, who have occupied the presidential chair, but this is the first time since the adoption of the constitution it has to lament the demise of a president while in the actual exercise of the high functions of the chief magistracy of the union.

The members of the army, in common with their fellow citizens of all classes, deplore this national bereavement; but although they have lost a friend, ever ready to protect their interests, his bright example in the paths of honor and glory still remains for their emulation.

The funeral honors directed to be paid by the troops in paragraph 523 of the general regulations will be duly observed, and the troops at the several stations will be paraded at 10 o'clock, A. M. when this order will be read; after which all labors for the day will cease; the national flag will be displayed at half staff; at dawn of day thirteen guns will be fired, besides the half hour gun as directed by the regulations; and, at the close of the day, a national salute. The standards, guidons, and colors of the several regiments will be put in mourning for the period of six months; and the officers will wear the usual badge of mourning on the left arm above the elbow, and on the bill of the sword for the same period.

By order of ALEXANDER MACOMB, major general, commanding-in-chief.

R. JONES, adjutant general.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE FUNERAL OF THE PRESIDENT.

Adjutant general's office, Washington, April 6, 1841.

The major general commanding the army of the United States, and the major general commanding the militia of the District of Columbia, have been charged by the executive officers of the government with the military arrangements for the funeral honors to be paid to the patriot and illustrious citizen, WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, late president of the United States, direct the following order of arrangement:

hither. The steamboats brought crowds of people from Alexandria, and the individuals entering the city from the adjacent country on horseback and in vehicles of any description seemed to be more numerous than even on the occasion of the late inauguration. The great point of attraction was the president's mansion. Towards that all steps, all thoughts, were tending. There lay the body, closed in its leaden coffin, and covered with a more pall, seated in that deep repose which nothing shall break but the angelic trump. It lay on a bier in the east room, (an occupation how different from its wont!) and ladies were admitted all the morning to be healed by the contact with the flowers of the most beautiful flowers. The northern portico of the mansion was hung with long banners of black, extending from column to column. The iron gates of the enclosure in front were closed, save when the carriages of the foreign ministers, members of the cabinet, the attending physicians, the clergy and some other privileged persons, were admitted, preparatory to their taking the places assigned them in the funeral procession.

The military portion of it, constituting the funeral escort, began to form line on the New York avenue, immediately north of the president's house, and a most noble and imposing appearance it presented. Without undertaking to give the exact details of all the details of the military part of the procession, it must suffice us for the present to state that of volunteers, besides the Light Infantry, National Blues and Columbia artillery of this city, and squadron of Potomac Dragoons from Georgetown, were present the Eagle Artillery, Eastern Infantry, Invincibles, Independent Greys, National Guards, Maryland Cavalry and Military Association, of Baltimore, the Annapolis Greys, from the city of Annapolis, and a part of the York Rifle-men and Washington Blues from York, Pennsylvania. There was a battalion of United States Marines, and a division of United States light artillery, commanded by capt. RINGGOLD, from Fort Mifflin. But one of the most impressive portions of the military part of this procession consisted of the disarmed and mounted officers of the United States militia and volunteers. Scarcely has there been exhibited within a space so limited so many distinguished military men; the sight of whose well known figures left me such thoughts to many a brave and many an emulating soldier, on which the national honor has been well and nobly maintained.

The civic part of the procession was not less striking than the military. It embraced the municipal officers of the District, the clergy of all denominations, the judicial and executive officers of the government, including the president of the U. States and the heads of departments, the ex-members of the late cabinet now in the city, the comptroller, auditors and commissioners, treasurer, register, &c. with a number of officers from all the several departments. Such members of both houses of congress as are in the city also attended, and ex-president ADAMS in his place. Next followed officers and soldiers who had served under gen. HARRISON in the late war. Another division of this procession consisted of public societies and associations, preceded by their banners, and wearing their respective badges—among whom we noticed the society of Old Fellows, very richly attired, the Washington Catholic Temperance association, with their white banners, and the cross which is the symbol of their faith, the Typographical society, several schools and lycæums, and, to close all, the different fire companies of the city, in their showy and picturesque uniform of cloaks, hats, and accoutrements, and with appropriate ensigns.

The music was excellent; several fine bands playing mournful airs, giving place, from time to time, the muffled drums of the military, beating slow marches.

But the object of chief interest, and one which, as it passed, hushed every other sound, and caused many a tear to fall, was

THE FUNERAL CAR containing the body of the deceased president. It was of large dimensions, in form an oblong platform, on which was raised dead, the whole covered with black velvet. From the corners of the platform fell a black velvet curtain outside of the which, within a few feet, lay a new carpet. From the corners of the car a black crape festoon was drawn on all sides, looped in the centre by a funeral wreath. On the coffin lay the sword of justice and the scroll of state, surmounted by the scroll of the constitution. Both together by a funeral wreath formed of the yew and the rose, and the wreath drawn by six white horses, having at the head of each a colored groom, dressed in white, with white turban and sash, and supported by pall-bearers in black. The effect was very fine. The contrast of this slowly-moving body of white and black, so opposite to the strong colors of the military around it, struck the eye even from the greatest distance, and gave a chilling warning beforehand that the corpse was drawing nigh.

The entire procession occupied two full miles in length, and was marshaled on its way by officers on horseback, and carried by the military band. The utmost order prevailed throughout; and, considering the very great concourse of people collected, the silence preserved during the whole course of the march was very impressive.

The funeral cortege was moved from the presidential mansion, religious services were conducted in presence of the PRESIDENT of the United States and ex-president ADAMS, the members of the late and present cabinet, the foreign ministers, and the mourning household, by the rev. Mr. HAWLEY. The reverend gentlemen declined making any address upon the occasion, but, pointing to a Bible and Episcopal prayer book which lay upon the table, stated that they had been purchased by the deceased president immediately after his arrival in the city, and had been in daily use by him since; then, the late president had declared to him (Mr. HAWLEY) personally his full belief in the truth of the Christian religion, and his purpose, had not disease intervened to prevent it, to have united himself to the church, and to have received the sacrament.

On the firing of the signal gun at the appointed hour, the procession, having received into its ranks the funeral car and the family mourners who followed the remains of their relative to the tomb, moved slowly on, passing on the south side of the city hall, and the principal avenue, under the first minute guns near the president's house, repeated at the city hall on the head of the column arriving opposite to it, and at the capitol on its reaching the western gate of the enclosure. Having reached the capitol, passing on the south side of it, the procession advanced over the plains eastward till it reached the space in front of the congressional burying ground. Here the car halted, while the line was formed by the military as they arrived, and then moved slowly on, being saluted as it passed with cannon lowered, the troops presenting arms, and the officers saluting it in military form. Having reached the principal entrance, the car was again halted; the coffin was taken down and placed on the shoulders of the bearers; the clergy advanced, and the Rev. Mr. HAWLEY, reading a solemn and a general service of the Episcopal liturgy, the procession advanced down the principal avenue of the cemetery until it reached the receiving vault, where a space had been kept open by sentries under arms, and where a hollow square being formed, the coffin was lowered into the vault. A signal being given to the troops outside, the battalion of light artillery, who were placed on an adjoining eminence, fired a salute, which was immediately followed by the several military bodies in line, which commenced firing from the left to the right, and continued the salute till it had thrice gone up the vault line.

The procession then resumed its march, and returned by the same route to the city, where the troops were disbanded, and the citizens retired to their several abodes. By five o'clock, nothing remained but empty streets and the emblems of mourning upon the houses, and the still deeper gloom, which oppressed the general mind with renewed thoughts of the late president, and the solemn and heroic bereavement alone was left to fill the thoughts.

The following gentlemen, as PALL-BEARERS, were designated to represent the several states and territories which were attached to their names at the funeral in such order as follows:

R. Curtis, esq., for Maine.	Hon. J. R. Moore, for N. H.
Hon. C. Cushing, Mass.	W. S. C. Clarke, esq., R. I.
W. B. Floyd, esq., Conn.	Hon. H. Hall, Vt.

The ex-members of the cabinet of the late administration now in the city were invited, and all attended the funeral of gen. HARRISON.

From the legislature of PENNSYLVANIA, in session, a joint committee of both houses arrived in this city on Wednesday morning, and truly represented the feeling of that great state on this melancholy occasion.

There is something touching and morally beautiful in the merging of all party distinctions, in the above instances, in the feeling of respect due to the memory of the honored dead.

THE NEW PRESIDENT.

By the extraordinary despatch used in sending the official intelligence to the VICE PRESIDENT, at Williamsburg, a similar despatch by him in replying to the seat of government, JOHN TYLER, new president of the United States, arrived in Washington on Tuesday morning the 6th inst. at 4 o'clock, and took lodgings at Brown's hotel.

At 12 o'clock, all the heads of departments, except the secretary of the navy, (who has not yet returned to the city from his visit to his family), waited upon him, to pay him their official and personal respects. They were received with all the politeness and kindness which characterize the new president. He signified his deep feeling of the public calamity sustained by the death of president HARRISON, and expressed his profound sensibility to the heavy responsibilities so suddenly devolved upon himself. He spoke of the present state of things with great concern and seriousness, and made known his wishes that the several heads of departments would continue to fill the places which they now respectively occupy, and his confidence that they would afford all the aid in their power to enable him to carry on the administration of the government successfully.

The VICE PRESIDENT then took and subscribed the following oath of office:

I do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of president of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the constitution of the U. States.

JOHN TYLER.
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
City and county of Washington.

I, WILLIAM CRANCH, chief judge of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, do hereby certify the above named JOHN TYLER personally appeared before me this day, and, although he deems himself qualified to perform the duties and exercise the powers and office of president on the death of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, late president of the United States, without any other oath than that which he has taken as vice president, yet, as doubts may arise, and for greater caution, took and subscribed the foregoing oath before me.

WILLIAM CRANCH.
April 6, 1841. The American Spectator.

In consequence of the lamented death of the late president of the United States, the duties and responsibilities of that high office will devolve on the vice president, JOHN TYLER, for the residue of the term for which gen. HARRISON was elected, in pursuance of the first section of the second article of the constitution of the United States, which provides, that—

"In case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the vice president, and the congress may by law provide for the ease of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the president and vice president, declaring what officer shall then act as president, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed or a president shall be elected."

To meet some inquiries which have been made of us, we subjoin the third and sixth sections of the second article of the first of our constitutions, which designate the person who shall perform the duties of president in a case of a vacancy in the office of president and vice president, and provide for the election of a president and vice president in such cases.

Sec. 9. In case of a removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the president and vice president of the United States, the president of the senate pro tempore, and, in case there shall be no president pro tempore, then the chief justice of the United States, or, if he shall be absent, then any one of the representatives for the time being, shall act as president of the United States, until the disability be removed, or a president shall be elected.

Sec. 10. Whenever the office of president and vice president shall be vacant, the electors of the electors of the United States shall be notified by the secretary of state shall forthwith cause a notification to be made to the executive of every state, and published in at least one of the newspapers printed in each state, specifying that electors of the president and vice president of the term for which gen. HARRISON was appointed be chosen in the several states, within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December next ensuing, if there shall be the space of two months between such date and such Wednesday, and in case there shall be less than two months, the electors shall be notified on the third day of March next ensuing, the shall specify in the notification that the electors shall be apportioned or chosen within thirty-four says preceding the first Wednesday in December in the year next ensuing, within which time the electors shall be appointed or chosen; and they shall meet and give their votes on such Wednesday."

From the Pennsylvaniaian.

The death of the president will call into application certain parts of the constitution of the United States, and the first of these is, that "in case of the death, resignation, or removal of the president, the powers and duties of the office shall devolve upon the vice-president, until such time as another president shall be chosen." It is, therefore, the duty of the vice-president, in such a case, to exercise the powers and duties of the office, until such time as another president shall be chosen. It is, therefore, the duty of the vice-president, in such a case, to exercise the powers and duties of the office, until such time as another president shall be chosen.

"Article 2. Sec. 1. Clause 1. The executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the vice president, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows," &c.

Same article and section. "Clause 6. In case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the vice president; and congress may, by law, provide for the case of removal, death, resignation or inability, both of the president and vice president, declaring what officer shall then act as president, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a president shall be elected."

Same article and section. "Clause 7. The president shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected." Clause 8. Before he enters on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation: "I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of president of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the constitution of the United States."

Same article, section 3. "He (the president), shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States."

1st. The death of general Harrison devolves upon John Tyler, the vice president, the powers and duties of the presidency.

Mr. Tyler will continue to act as president during the term of four years for which General Harrison was elected. The constitution obviously contemplated no special election for a president, except when both the president and vice president died or became unable to hold. For this latter contingency, and in pursuance of the constitutional provision, congress legislated in 1792, designating the "president of the senate pro tempore, and there shall be a president of the senate, who shall be the speaker of the house of representatives, for the time being." This case has not arisen, and we hope no such crisis will arise.

4th. Clothed with "the powers and duties," Mr. Tyler is obviously entitled to the salary of a president.

dent, which by a law of the 18th of February, 1793 was fixed to be "at the rate of $25,000 per annum with the use of the furniture and other effects belonging to the United States, to be paid quarter yearly at the treasury."

5th. As the constitution prescribes a special oath to be taken by a president, before he enters on the execution of his office, and as the taking of this oath constitutes an inauguration, Mr. Tyler should go through the form of inauguration, and may then, as is usual, communicate to his fellow citizens, by an address, the principles upon which he intends to administer the government.

6th. Acting as president, Mr. Tyler, must re-appoint and recommission the incumbents of those offices held at the pleasure of the executive, except where the law authorises them to continue for some unfinished term or until successors be appointed.

There is therefore, as we conceive, at this moment in strictness, NO CABINET; no heads of department holding by subsisting commissions;—their commissions expired with the president who gave them and the several secretaries, and postmaster general should forbear any official act of moment, until fully empowered. Mr. Tyler, has clearly the right to make his own cabinet, and the public exigencies require him to do so promptly. But we think a very dangerous example may be set, if the secretaries of general Harrison attempt any measures of government, or if Mr. Tyler recognises them as officers for any purpose whatever, until he has re-appointed them. As to all political usurpations, we cannot too scrupulously regard the maxim, "obstare principiis."

Mr. Tyler, although certainly not one whom the people of the United States ever intended to make their chief magistrate, has become so in conformity with the constitution. His position must be unelected and embarrassing; and he is fairly entitled to the sympathy and aid of his fellow-citizens, as well as the best assistance of his friends. As governor of Virginia, and as the representative of that commonwealth in the senate of the United States he has shown ability enough for any station. He has been called upon to perform a duty foreign to the emergency. Let him not be softly deluded by the insinuating suggestion that he may catch the mantle of Elisha; but put on his own vestments, take his own attitude, and steer his own course. He has no right to expect theocratic aid, which first made him popular in the ancient dominion. Let him not shrink from the herculean task which an act of Providence has called him to perform. Let him not yield to the dictates of indolence and roll into the bed that others have made for him.

From the New York American.
THE CABINET. Some intimations are made that the cabinet officers will resign. Not so. This is the practice in monarchies, where ministers are the king's servants. In our republic they are the servants of the people, and commissioned by the consent of the senate to offices created by law.

When J. Q. Adams succeeded Mr. Monroe, Mr. McLean, the postmaster general, Mr. Southard, secretary of the navy, and Mr. Wirt, the attorney general, retained their commissions without any new appointment, or intermediate resignation.

APPOINTMENT BY THE PRESIDENT. Walter Forward, esq. of Pittsburg, has been appointed, by the president, first comptroller of the treasury.—Mr. F. has accepted the appointment.

TREASURY CIRCULAR. To disbursing agents whose accounts are rendered to the first and fifth auditors.

Treasury department, Comptroller's office, March 30, 1841.

SIR: You are hereby required to render your account of disbursements for the current quarter as soon after its close as practicable; and in so doing you will present with and refer to in your account two abstracts, one referring to vouchers for payments made for demands which accrued prior to the 4th instant, the other to those subsequent thereto. You will, in all cases, report the amount of funds in your hands on the 4th instant.

Subsequent quarterly accounts are to be rendered as required above, should they embrace payments for demands which accrued prior to the 4th instant.

You will be governed by the above, in lieu of the circular of the 22d inst. Very respectfully, yours,
J. N. BARKER, controller.

CHOCTAW RESERVATIONS. Notice to purchasers of reservations under the 19th article and supplies.

The office (at Columbus, Mississippi) of commissioner to examine and report on the above class of claims has been discontinued by direction of the secretary of war. Deeds, or other papers connected with them, which require the action of the executive, will be transmitted to the secretary of war or to the office of the commissioner of Indian affairs.

ANOTHER OUTRAGE BY A BRITISH CAPTAIN

The Salem, Mass. Register says that "letters have been received from the brig Trinidad, of Salem, of this port, which state that the vessel had been overhauled by a British cruiser. The Richmond was taken on her passage from Salem to St. Helena, and sent on to Mozambique; and a few weeks before her arrival at St. Helena, when off the Island of St. Thomas at the coast of Africa, she was brought to by a British brig of war, (the Persian, our informant thinks) her invoices and other papers were demanded and examined, and she was finally suffered to proceed on her voyage, nothing being found to justify a seizure. This is the A/A Salem vessel that had been searched by English cruisers within a few months

McLeod. An attempt was lately made to enable McLeod to escape from jail. After the exit of a visitor, there was found concealed in the prisoner's bed, a small saw, two small files, two chisels, a watch main spring straightened, and teeth filed in it like a saw, and fitted with a string or bow, in order to enable the prisoner to cut the bars at his window without making a noise.

HISTORICAL REMINISCENCES.
COL. TODD. In reference to a rumor that col. Charles S. Todd, of Kentucky, has been designated by the president for a foreign mission, some of the newspapers have asked who col. Todd is. Those whose recollection of public affairs extend back to the war of 1812, and even to the later period of Mr. Monroe's administration, would need no one to tell them who this gentleman is; but, for the information of younger politicians, less familiar with the men and things of the periods to which we refer, we copy from the National Intelligencer of April 13, 1824, the following paragraph:

"Col. C. S. Todd, late charge d'affaires of the United States to the government of Colombia, arrived to this city yesterday, on his way to rejoin his family, having been detained at Charleston for several weeks by illness, from which he has almost entirely recovered. Mr. T. was appointed secretary of legation to the mission to that republic, but declined accepting the appointment. It is but just to say that colonel Todd has acquired great respect in the eyes of those who have had an opportunity of observing it, by the manner in which he has discharged his duties whilst abroad."

We have thought it due to a gentleman who is at this moment spoken of for a distinguished posthumous to revive the above notice of him, which has been so long buried in the oblivion of the public trash implied something more in the incumbent than mere party subserviency. In regard to Col. Todd, it may interest those unacquainted with his history to add that he was born in Kentucky; that he was a distinguished army officer in the United States; was a graduate of William and Mary college; was educated for the law at Litchfield, Connecticut; entered the late war as a volunteer subaltern from Kentucky, in 1812; in 1813 was promoted to the rank of captain, and sent to the camp to gen. Harrison at the battle of the Thames; in 1814, he was assistant inspector general and acting adjutant general to Harrison and McArthur; in 1815 he was inspector general of the eighth military district. "He was the most important services from the opening of the campaign, and was particularly distinguished in the pursuit of Proctor." He and Col. Wood pursued Proctor so closely that he abandoned his army, and fled to Canada, where he was captured. No more beautiful eulogium could have been pronounced upon an officer than gen. Harrison's declaration to a distinguished member of the congressional committee, (Col. Todd) as equal in bravery superior in intelligence to any officer of his rank in the army."

CAPTAIN CHARLES W. MORGAN. There was no braver or worthier man among the nine officers who were recently presented with swords of honor by the state of Virginia, than captain Charles W. Morgan, of the U. S. navy. We recollect an anecdote of his gallantry during the late war, related to us by a friend, and which we believe is not generally known.

I. N. Y. Times.

At the commencement of the war the now silver haired veteran was a gay young midshipman, attached to the Constitution, and was on board that ship in the celebrated action with the Guerriere. On that memorable occasion he performed an act of the most heroic daring. Soon after the commencement of the battle, both vessels became enveloped in a heavy cloud of smoke, from the incessant cannonade, so that it was impossible to distinguish either from the deck or overboard. At this juncture the hero, with respectfully saluting his commander Hull that a man should be sent aloft, where the smoke was not so densely packed, in order to ascertain the position of the Guerriere, and direct the men how to point the guns.

The cosmonauts declined to send any men on a service so desperate. Young Morgan immediately volunteered, ran up the shrouds, and in a few moments was directing the men, at the guns, from amidst a shower of balls. His clothes were cut in a half a dozen places, and he received one or two slight wounds while in this perilous position. When the British frigate surrendered, her commander inquired of commodore Hull, whether this was a man who had been in the service of the British in the Constitution. "Yes" was the reply, "why do you ask?" "because," said Dacres, "we have been firing at him for this half hour; he must have a charged life."

THE ARMY.

General Scott and one of his aids, captain Anderson, arrived in this city by the Sullivan coach on Monday evening. Their stay was at the Exchange hotel. On the next morning, when they took their departure for the Niagara frontier in the regular mail coach. The general's face is yet somewhat discolored by the bruises he received by falling on the ice, while crossing the Hudson at Albany—or, as they say, by the horse-drawable evidence of the necessity of a bridge at that place—testimony which would have been too dearly bought by the nation had it cost, as it came near doing, his valuable life. (Rockster Democrat.)

St. Augustine, April 1, 1841. A letter received here from an officer of the army at Tampa, expresses the opinion that there will not be another gun fired by the Indians in Florida. God grant that it may prove correct; but we can scarcely rely upon it as yet.

THE NAVY.

The New York American contains extracts from a letter, written by Maxwell Woodhull, acting master of the United States schooner Dolphin, speaking of the success of the expedition, against the native kings and pirates, on the coast of Africa. From this extract it appears that the Dolphin and Grampus, worked their way amidst very many obstacles, up to the narrow river Nunez to the town of Wilkes, the principal place or capital of the king of Schabari, a potentate, who some time since conceived he might plunder American vessels and abuse and ill-treat their crews with impunity.

To punish this worthy was the object of the expedition. When it situated about 80 miles up the river Nunez. Here the Dolphin and Grampus took a position in which they could soon have reduced the place to ashes. Satisfaction was demanded, and after some boasting and bragging on the part of his aid, Mr. Woodhull, complied with all the demands made on the part of our government, and the two vessels safely descended the Nunez, and arrived all well, at Sierra Leone. The river Nunez is so little known, that on the last maps we do not find the name of a single town last down.

The pirates on the river had, however, made themselves so notorious and offensive, that our government deemed it of importance to put an end to their depredations, and we are glad to say that our gallant Bells have so successfully and meritoriously effected the object of the expedition.

Steam frigate Mississippi. We find in the Philadelphia Gazette a description of the national steam frigate now building at the navy yard in this city. Her dimensions are, length 215 feet, breadth 40 feet, depth 25½ feet, mean immersion 18½ feet, and her tonnage about 2,000 tons. The cylinders of her engines are each 75 inches in diameter and 7 feet stroke. Her paddle wheels 30 feet diameter. She will have 4 copper boilers, with stowage for 800 tons of coal. The paddle wheels will be the divided split paddles generally used in American vessels. The boilers are tested to a pressure of 30 lbs. per square inch above the atmosphere, and intended to be worked to a pressure not exceeding 15 lbs. The vessel will be rigged and fitted as a frigate, and armed with 10 guns—two 10 inch long guns, and eight 24 pounders.

STATES OF THE UNION.

NEW YORK.

Undoubtedly the great question of the day for this state is, how far and how fast, she can carry out her great system of internal improvements. That the system should not, and will not, be abandoned is certain. The remaining question, then is—the sole one indeed—as to the degree of despatch with which we should proceed. Mr. Sibley is for the fraternal love, or make-hate slowly policy, but is decided as any man can be going about.

The Albany bridge question. The committee of the New York assembly on roads and bridges, after an elaborate hearing, on the petition for a bridge over the Hudson, at Albany, which has excited a very deep interest, reported. First, against the petition. The report was signed by four members of the committee, one member who was in favor of the petition being absent. In the house after an animated debate on a motion by Mr. Hoffman to recommend the report, with instructions to report the bill submitted by the petitioners for the information of the house, without intending to express any opinion on the merits of the application, the motion prevailed by a vote of 74 to 34.

Albany. The legislature of New York has passed a law to divide and equalize the wards in the city of Albany; and changing the time for holding the charter election in that city, to the second Tuesday in April.

Markets. The news from England has had little effect here. The holders of cotton are encouraged by the news from England, and the price of tea chose not to sell unless upon advanced rates. The stock market declined a little. U. States bank brought 18½. [Cor. Nat. Incl.]

NEW JERSEY.

The experiment of smelting native iron ore with anthracite coal, has been successfully practised at the Stanhope iron works in Sussex county.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The U. S. bank meeting. The Pennsylvania of the 6th inst. publishes the account of the meeting of the stockholders of the United States bank, held in Philadelphia on Monday last, and says: "The meeting was characterized by the most intense excitement. A degree of earnestness and determination was exhibited such as is rarely met with. Nothing would be listened to, but what was clearly to the main purpose."

The report of the committee alone was demanded, and previous efforts at speaking were not allowed to proceed even far enough to develop their purpose. The report was indeed an important document, and the community have abundant cause to look eagerly for its printed publication. It was ordered for Thursday, at the adjourned meeting. Its disclosures are startling—they lay open systems of operation well calculated to found, and the elucidations thus given, will probably not only throw light upon the management of the bank, but perhaps likewise furnish materials for the proper understanding of passages in political history. The report occupied about an hour in the reading, and was heard in deep silence—except when exclamations of indignation broke forth from the audience.

The Public Ledger also says: "It being an adjourned meeting, the chairman of the former meeting, Mr. Breck, occupied the chair, and called the assembly to order. Some considerable confidential notice was given to the motion to read the report, and on captain Scotland attempting to speak, the excitement broke forth in hisses and obstreperous clamor, so much so that he was compelled to desist. Without having concluded his remarks. The object, as we are now gathering it from what he did say, was that he desired, or that he hoped, the report would not be personal."

The indignation on change, after the reading of the report, towards those now and recently connected with the institution, and who were seen before the public, among them characterised as the friends of the bank, and as one of the consequences, it may be noted that the stock fell 20½ per cent.

The Gettysburg contractors. The Harrisburg Intelligence of Tuesday says:—We are truly gratified with the action of the house on yesterday, in relation to the bill granting relief to those contractors on the Gettysburg rail road, who have since 1839, been kept out of a large amount of money, which is honestly due them.

Cumberland, Perry and Juniata. A special election for a member of congress, is ordered in that district on the 4th of May, in the place of Mr. Ramsey.

MARYLAND.

Congressional election. The governor has issued his proclamation calling a special election, on the 17th of May next, for members of congress to represent the district at the extra session, which will convene on the 31st proximo.

Hon. Francis Thomas. This gentleman, who has for ten successive years done good service in the cause of the country and the great principles of democracy, declines being a candidate for congress at the next election.

The Frederick Citizens say:—"We part with him with regret, and in the name of his constituency, whose sentiments towards him are so well understood, return him our cordial thanks for his generous and noble services to his political friends, and his country at the expense of much personal loss and inconvenience."

We are pleased to see that although Mr. Thomas has withdrawn as a candidate, he still stands prepared to give his valuable aid to the good cause.

Frederick, March 24, 1841.

That my fellow citizens may not act under misapprehension as to my wishes, I feel called upon to declare this publicly, that I have declined becoming a candidate for re-election to legislative and constitutional offices, having existed without interruption, for ten years, between the people whom I have recently represented and myself, I cannot retire from their service without expressing the deep and abiding gratitude which I feel for the generous and unflinching manner in which my attempts to serve my country have been received by them.

I am not aware, that the expectations of those to whom I am indebted for repeated elections, have been disappointed so far as a steady and inflexible adherence to democratic measures and aims was anticipated. And, when it is remembered, that during the long period that I have been in the public service, occasions have frequently occurred, to try the souls of those who maintain the political doctrine to which it is well understood I am forever devoted, it must be conceded, that I have a very good reason indeed, to feel the homage of a grateful heart to that patriotic and noble people, who have allowed me to escape without censure. With my whole heart I thank you.

From that retirement to which I go, I shall look, with anxious expectation, on the progress of that mighty contest for popular sovereignty, in which, I am honestly believed, my political associates are engaged, and stand prepared to give aid to the good cause, whenever called on by my fellow citizens, and, when that aid can be rendered, consistently with my desire to bestow more attention than I have heretofore done, to my own neglected personal concerns. With the highest respect, I am, your fellow citizen, FRANCIS THOMAS.

Hon. Solomon Hilen, jr. It will be seen by the following letter that this gentleman declines being a candidate.

To the voters of the 4th congressional district. Fellow citizens: In a few weeks you will be called upon to elect your representatives for the 27th congress. From the numerous flattering inquiries of friends as to my disposition to be a candidate at re-election, it becomes my duty, publicly, to announce, that my name will not be presented to the nominating convention. This determination was repeatedly avowed, immediately after the close of the last congressional contest; and, I hope, it will not be considered presumptuous, respectfully to decline the honor of a nomination, by anticipating a renewal of that kindness which I have already experienced. My object is to withdraw my name from public consideration, the result of which will be the selection of another more deserving of your favor, but with whom I shall claim, at least an equality in gratitude for the unmerited distinction of having occupied, by virtue of your suffrages, a seat in the councils of the nation. Respectfully, SOL. HILLEN, JR.

Baltimore, March 29th, 1841.

Cheapsake and Ohio canal. The provisions of the bill in favor of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, are as follows:

That the bonds of the state are not to be sold under par; that until they can be sold the company may issue its notes or order formed on the bonds, of any denomination not under one dollar, and payable by the treasurer out of the proceeds of the bonds; and that the law is not to operate until such amount shall have been made by the company and approved by the treasurer, by which the work will be secured to be performed for the two millions. There are two further conditions which are to be fulfilled before the law is to have effect. 1. The four mining companies of Jennings and Braddock's runs, are to give bond, with security to be approved by the treasurer, that they will have rail roads completed from their mines to the canal by the time the canal shall be completed to Cumberland. 2. The stockholders of the mining companies of Allegany county are to give bond with security to be approved by the treasurer to pay the state annually for five years after six months from the time of completing the canal to Cumberland, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars. They will be allowed in tolls that amount so paid—and if the tolls of their transportation shall exceed this amount they are, nevertheless to pay the excess.

The last provision of the bill directs proceedings for foreclosing the mortgage of the state on the canal.

General tax bill. We have received a copy of the tax bill as it has just passed the legislature. The following are two of the leading sections in it:

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of Maryland, That all real and personal property in this state, all churches, real and personal, all goods, wares and merchandises, and other stock, in trade at home, or not permanently located elsewhere, the interest or proportion in all ships and other vessels, whether in or out of port, owned by persons residing in this state, and all other property, as well as judgment, decrees, mortgage, bond, bill of exchange, promissory notes from solvent debtors, except debts due for goods sold and delivered after the passage of this act, and bank notes, all stocks or shares in any corporation, or in any state or national bank, institution or company, incorporated in any other state or territory, all debts due to residents of this state by solvent debtors residing out of this state, except debts due for goods sold and delivered after the passage of this act, all investments in ap-estates, or stocks of other states, made or held by residents of this state, all public loans and stocks of any state, except those created or issued by the United States, owned or held by residents of this state, all stocks or shares in any bank, institution or company, incorporated by this state, and all other property of every description whatsoever, shall be valued agreeably to the directions of this act, and shall be chargeable according to such valuation with the public assessment; provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the assessment of or levy of any tax upon property belonging to the United States, to this state, or to any county or city in this state, or to any incorporated literary or charitable institution, county schools, houses for public worship, buying grounds, the crop and produce of lands in the hands of the producer, or his, her or their agent, provisions for the use and consumption of the person to whom the same shall belong and his or her family, plantation utensils, the working tools of mechanics and manufacturers moved or worked by hand, and the produce of their respective occupations whilst in their possession or the possession of their agents, wearing apparel, fish at the time fishermen may be employed in catching, salting and packing the same, or while they remain in their possession or that of their agents uncolled, household manufactures, judgments, bonds, mortgages, promissory notes, or other securities belonging to any bank or other incorporated institution, the capital stock whereof is made subject to taxation by the provisions of this act, nor to any goods, wares, merchandise or other property belonging to persons not residents of this state, in the hands of factors in this state for sale.

Sec. 9. And be enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said assessors in their several counties and districts respectively, to make diligent inquiry, and inform themselves by all lawful ways and means of all the property in their respective counties and districts, of every description whatsoever which shall be liable to assessment under the provisions of this act, and to value the same in the names of the owners thereof respectively, at the full cash value of the same, and all property owned by persons residents of this state, and not permanently located elsewhere within this state, shall be valued to the owner in the county, district and city where he or she may reside, and they shall specify in their returns made as hereinafter mentioned, as far as may be practicable—

1. The names of the tracts or parcels of land and other descriptions thereof owned by each individual, with the quantity of acres therein, and value thereof.
2. The negro slaves, classified in them according to their ages, as follows: the negro slaves under the age of fourteen years, their number and aggregate value; the male slaves from fourteen to thirty-five years of age, their number and aggregate value; the male slave from thirty-five upwards, their number and aggregate value; the female slaves from fourteen to thirty-six years of age, their number and aggregate value; the female slaves from thirty-six years of age upwards, their number and aggregate value.
3. Stock in trade, its general description and value.
4. Public securities liable to valuation, particularly specified, with their respective values.
5. Bank stocks and other stocks particularly specified, with their respective values.
6. Private securities.
7. Live stock.
8. Household furniture, and the aggregate value of each.
9. Plate.
10. Gold and silver watches.
11. Property of other descriptions.

Legislature. This body adjourned on Monday last after a session of about four months and at an expense to the people, of some forty or fifty thousand dollars.

All the bank projects were postponed. The fund commissioners have been authorized to borrow money to continue the public improvements, restricting all loans to that extent, except that for the completion of the Wabash and Erie canal.

A law has passed reducing the salaries of engineers, &c. on the public works, allowing but one superintendent on the national road, as we learn. But 33 laws of a general nature were passed, a great number of local laws, and joint resolutions.

Catholic cathedral at Cincinnati. The Cincinnati Chronicle relates that bishop Purcell has purchased a large lot in that city, on which are to be erected a new Roman Catholic cathedral, orphan house and hospital. A church for the accommodation of German Catholics is also to be commenced this season at Cincinnati.

MISSISSIPPI. Rev. David C. Stuart has been nominated as the wing candidate for governor of Mississippi. We have the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with this gentleman. He was a few years ago a travelling Methodist minister, and belonged to the Virginia and North Carolina conference. He is a man of sterling integrity, strong mind, and possesses a great energy of character. He is a self-made man. He came to this state from New England a poor pedlar. While engaged in vending his wares, he applied himself studiously to his books. He communicated with the conference, and having established an enviable character for sound morality and piety, he presented himself as a candidate for the ministry, was received into the Methodist connection, and labored as a travelling preacher until this year 1839, when he removed to the west, and soon found his way to the bench in Mississippi, where he has distinguished himself as an able judge; and now he is about to be elevated to the chief magistracy of the state.

Judge Shuttleworth presents a brilliant example of individual effort and success, and of the beauty and excellence of our republican system, under which men may raise themselves by their own merits from the humblest walks of life to the highest stations in the government; and his success ought to stimulate and encourage the hundreds of our country who are eulizing upon life with no brighter prospects than those which dimly shone upon his early path way, to diligent, vigorous and persevering efforts. All may not attain to the highest position, but every one can do something for himself and his country; and his motto, at least ought to be "WILL TRY."

Resolutions. The legislature of Mississippi, after stating the refusal by the governor of Maine to comply with the requisition of the governor of Georgia, for the surrender of fugitives, and the refusal of the governor of New York to comply with a similar requisition by the governor of Virginia, proceeded to say:

Whereas, The offences charged against all said fugitives from justice, was larceny feloniously committed, stealing, taking and carrying away certain slaves, and whereas, council and co-operation of that and all the other slaveholding states of the union have been asked in the premises, to the end that our common and peculiar interests may not be prejudicially affected, and our state and national interests, but opposed to the institution of domestic slavery; therefore,

Be it resolved by the legislature of the state of Mississippi, That the right of executive authority over the executive authority of another state, and the duty of the latter to surrender such fugitives upon the demand, is a right secured by the terms of the federal compact, a right which cannot be denied without a palpable violation of the said compact, and which no state legislature can annul, evade or impair.

Be it further resolved, That the attempt of the governor and legislature of the state of Maine and the governor of New York, to evade, impair and deny that right, is deemed by this legislature, an outrage upon the chartered rights of Virginia and Georgia and a precedent full of danger to all the slaveholding states.

Be it further resolved, That any state which makes compact with any of her sister states whose rights have been or may hereafter be invaded as aforesaid, in any mode or measure of existence or address necessary for their or our protection.

Be it further resolved, That the governor of this state be requested to transmit copies of the foregoing resolutions to the legislatures of the governors of the several states, and to each of our senators and representatives in congress.

Approved, February 6, 1841.

Nomination. Henry Johnson, esq. has been nominated by the people of Louisiana, as a candidate or governor of that state.

MISSOURI.

Times. It is stated in the St. Louis Bulletin, on the authority of the Paris Sentinel, that meetings have been held in Cooper county, Missouri, for the purpose of petitioning the executive officers of the county to resign, so as to prevent the sacrifice of property at public sale for debts which may be owing by the citizen. The Bulletin says that probably the scarcity of money was never felt so seriously in that state as at present.

FLORIDA.

Later accounts from Florida have been received at Savannah. Fifty-eight more Indians have come in at Fort Fanning, and 100 more were deliberating upon taking the same step. Colonel Harney had returned from his expedition to the everglades, and the prospect for peace seems once more encouraging. The Indians now in Florida are estimated at 8,000 Seminoles, Micкасукис, Tallahassee and Creeks, who are only prevented from quarrelling among themselves, by their deeper hatred to the whites than to each other.

The Savannah Republican of Monday says: The steamer General Taylor, capt. Peck, arrived yesterday from Florida. A letter states that there were about four hundred Indians at Tampa on the 21st inst., ready for emigration. Yards were also in readiness to receive them, and the houses in the west, but the commanding general was waiting orders from Washington.

We have been favored with the following extract of a letter, dated Fort Brooke, Tampa Bay, E. F. March 20, 1841.

"This afternoon I had the pleasure of seeing about 260 Indian friends, shipped for their new homes in Arkansas. We have left here now 70 or 80 who will follow soon. These devils have kept us in a ferment ever since we have had charge of them, expecting every night that some one would attempt to escape. Consequently our men have been on guard every other day, which has caused a great deal of sickness, as they have been up every other night and all night. It is not possible for man to bear it long. News arrived here yesterday that 300 Indians had come in at Santa Rosa, a port 30 miles from this. A few days since col. Worth went out with part of his regiment, (8th) and by some management or other got an interview with the celebrated chief Wild Cat, who has been heretofore the worst enemy of Florida, but has been induced the colonel to come in, which every one here believes, and that he will bring his people. The colonel has also had a talk with an Indian chief called Quak-Turcaneau, who has also promised to bring his people in—and another chief."

The editor of the Georgian has been favored with the following extract of a letter, dated Fort Armstrong, Saratoga, E. F. March 14th, 1841.

"A few days since an Indian and negro came in at this post with a white flag and said they were tired of the war, and desired that some one would send them to Florida for three days. To day about forty Indians came in from Peas creek,—making all now at this post 83. Hostipaka, with three of his warriors, have remained behind to hear from Sam Jones and other chiefs south. They will probably be ready in a few days."

Apalachicola, March 24. Indian emigration. The steamer J. A. Adams, in the government service, arrived at this port on Monday afternoon, having on board one hundred and five Indians, emigrating to Arkansas. Major Bellup, who has been charged with the duty of transporting the Indians, and a new board of officers, accompanied by lieut. Sprague, Mr. Capers, disbursing agents, Dr. Randall, and Mr. Cloud of the paymaster's department.

The party of Indians on board the Adams was made up of fragments of different tribes, Tallahassee, Micкасукис, Seminole, &c. Among them were thirty warriors, the remainder were women and children. The Spanish Indians captured by col. Harney, were also on board.

From a conversation had with the officers, we learned that a brig had sailed from Tampa, having on board one hundred and ten, embracing Echo Emathis, the chief of the Tallahassee, with ninety of his people; and also that one hundred and fifty were in with gen. Armstrong at the time the Adams departed. The aspect of affairs seems to be favorable to the success of the war. Wild Cat had gone to col. Worth, at Fort Cummings, also Coa-ta-nug-gue, one of the most warlike chiefs, who promised to go out and bring in all his party.

The Tallahassee were all except Tigertail, and the party headed by him consisted of only about forty, among whom were but eighteen warriors. Tiger had been frequently in at Tampa state, and said he was tired of fighting and wanted to be friends with the white folks." [Journal.]

DEBATE ON THE PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

In arrole, Wednesday, January 29, 1841.

Mr. Havercruys, in a speech before the senate adjourned last evening, he had suggested that he wished to offer certain amendments to the bill; and as they were now in order, he would proceed to propose them. When, on a former day, he had made some remarks upon this general provisions of the bill, he had indicated it as his conviction that there was a majority of the senate in favor of a pre-emption system of some kind, and the votes given since the present bill had been under discussion showed that opinion to be correct; he had further observed that, in his judgment, the bill as it had been reported from the committee on the public lands, was such a one as ought not to pass; and that he would, when the proper opportunity should present, make an effort to have it amended. The senate, as Mr. H. has stated, had now taken certain principles on the general subject, in the first place, that they would not adopt the plan of cession, as proposed by the senator from S. Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN), and again that they would not adopt the amendment offered by the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CALDWELL), attaching the principle of distribution to that of pre-emption; and in the third place, that they would not assent to the substitute proposed by the senator from Vermont, (Mr. PRENTISS), making pre-emption retrospective and non-exclusive. These points he considered as now settled; and the amendment Mr. H. wished to propose would not interfere at all with these decisions.

There were some provisions in the bill which he thought need not remain there, and some others which might, with advantage, be inserted, and some new ones which should be added, the better to secure the nation and honest settlers from fraud and imposition. The design of the amendments he should offer would be to carry out the professed object of the bill, which was to give the honest bona fide settler the prior right of purchase of a quarter section of land he had settled upon, and they went to carry out the spirit of the pre-emption law of 1830, a statute which has been introduced and the principal provisions of which have been adopted. This had not been particularly alluded to, but so is the fact. We are now under the pre-emption law of 1830; it is, with some alterations, at this hour, the law of the land; it was revived in 1840, and extended to 1842, and the present bill is a departure from that law, not merely by making the system prospective instead of retrospective in its operation, but by omitting important parts of that law, and altering essentially some of its provisions. On what grounds are pre-emption laws defended here, and in the nation? On the two principles of public policy and of private justice.

Is it not said to be justly due to the honest bona fide settler that he shall be protected in the enjoyment of the fruits of his industry? Are we not to say that if a foreigner leaves his country, and comes here, or one of our own citizens leaves his residence in an old state and goes on our public domain, and erects a log cabin on it, that justice requires he should be covered by a pre-emption law, and secured to the possession of his land? Is not this assumed every where, as the equity on which a pre-emption law is founded, so far as it respects the individual? And, with regard to its public policy, is it not said that such laws encourage the settlement and sale of the public lands; that they raise the price of the lands, and give an impulse to population, thus bringing strength to the country, and adding to the public wealth? Am I not justified in saying that these are the two principles on which the pre-emption system is made to rest? Gentlemen may differ as to the expediency of the system, but its friends put it on the two grounds I have stated. If these be indeed the principles on which alone the bill can be defended, I hope its advocates will support them, as they are assumed and embodied in the amendments I shall offer, which go to protect the bona fide settler, and him alone.

With these views I offer the following amendment to the bill, and ask the senate to compare it with the bill, and judge whether it is consistent with the principles on which any pre-emption law can rest, and ought not therefore to be adopted.

Mr. H. here read the amendment as follows:

"Sec. 3. After the word 'divided,' in the third line, strike out the words 'in the fourth line,' and insert 'equally between them; but neither shall have any claim, by virtue of this act, to any other land; and'

The bill now reads:

"Sec. 3. And he further enacted, That where two or more persons shall have settled on the same quarter section, the same shall be divided between them, and the deficiency made up to each out of the contiguous vacant ground; but no wilful intruder on the known claim of another shall be entitled to any benefit under this section."

If the amendment shall prevail, the section will read: "That where two or more persons shall have settled on the same quarter section, the same shall be divided equally between them, but neither shall have any claim, by virtue of this act, to any other land; and no wilful intruder on the known claim of another shall be entitled to any benefit under this section."

The bill in its present shape, declares that if two or more persons shall settle on the same quarter section, the land shall be divided between them, and each settler shall be entitled to so much from the contiguous vacant land as shall be sufficient to make up to him the full quantity of a quarter section; but that no wilful intruder shall be entitled to the benefits of this provision of the law. It gives no preference to a particular settler, but says that each settler shall have an equal right in that land, and also a right of pre-emption to what is equivalent to a whole quarter section. He is not to be a bare interest in the quarter section with the rest who settle on it, in looking upon it, but enough is to be taken from the adjoining land to make a quarter section to each. Will not this prejudice the interests of the bona fide settler, and promote those of the speculator? It does not prohibit the settlement on a quarter section by more persons than one, but it requires any agree to associate and settle in fixing themselves on a single quarter section, and thence spread themselves over all the contiguous lands. Will half a dozen individuals settle on one quarter section of land, if they all intend to become permanent residents on the soil. If they enter on the land with a sincere desire of making themselves homes in the wilderness, they will each take his quarter section and begin to improve it; but, by this bill, a family may go on one, and improve it to the exclusion of the others, and the settlement of them embraced within the provisions of the bill will be entitled to a separate quarter section at the government price. Nor is this all. If it were only families that could do this, their taking a tract from the pre-emption law would seem to be a fair and just way to settle permanently on the property. But what is to prevent a company of speculators from going on the land and inhabiting it, and raising one log cabin, to furnish a shelter for them all, and, as soon as the pre-emption law is to be applied to the tract, each one, his separate tract of land, at a dollar a quarter, and immediately selling it at a great profit? I have no disposition to benefit settlers of this description; and the pre-emption right should be conferred on those who in good faith do settle themselves with a view of becoming permanent residents. And this amendment effects this object, and therein carries out the principles avowed by the friends of the bill. Such was the provision of the act of 1828, and such is the spirit of the present law. The second provision is, that if more than one person shall settle on a quarter section, each of the persons so settling shall have an equal share of the land, but shall have no claim to any other land whatsoever by virtue of that act; such a bill became a law in 1830, and was in force in 1839, and it was in force two years longer. I presume the clause was introduced expressly to guard against the evil I have mentioned. I am disposed to carry out this policy. I wish to insert the guards which our present law has, and I think they are necessary, but they must not put the rich man and the speculator, and below the bona fide settler, but bona fide improvers of the soil. I trust the amendment will not be objected to.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that there were two ways to destroy ability; one was to vote it down, and another was to talk it down. He regretted that the gentleman had not brought forward his amendment sooner, when the bill was in progress of amendment; but after the bill had been read and as perfect as it could be, a proposition had been brought forward to recommit it with instructions, then another amendment had been offered to that, and now the whole ground was to be gone over again. He was disposed to support the bill, but he thought the section of the bill as reported by the committee, if it was rather retroactive in its character, and intended to refer to cases where several individuals had settled on the same tract. There might be a very serious spring, a particular spot, and half a dozen persons might settle around it for the sake of the water, while they cultivated elsewhere. Did the senator desire to confine them all to the same quarter section? The section gave them no floating claim, but confined them to land immediately contiguous to the land on which they were settled. The act of 1830, for that allowed them such a floating claim. It had been said that great frauds had been perpetrated under cover of these laws, and the evil was not corrected by the most liberal law Congress had ever made. The gentleman apprehended a great danger from speculators uniting to settle on a single quarter section; but it would be most extraordinary should a man come all the way from the old states, settling woods and making improvements, for the sake of a quarter section, and then come to the quarter section of land. Mr. C. adverted to the small profit gained by the government from the auction system, and the advantage of parceling out the land among numerous settlers. He demanded the year and a half for the government to sell the land.

Mr. HENTINGTON repelled the idea of offering amendments for the sake of impeding final action on the bill, and insisted that his amendment would be preventive of much fraud, and that it went no further than the law of 1830.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said the gentleman was mistaken. He supposed the law of 1830 to be the last law of the senate, and that it was only revived in 1840; but the law of 1840 was supplemental, and was more liberal in its provisions than the law of 1830.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said that the honorable senator from Connecticut had called the attention of the senate to the fact that a general pre-emption law, retrospective in its character, had been passed in 1840, to continue for two years, thereby demonstrating that there was no pressing necessity at all for acting on the subject of pre-emption at the present session. He had risen to express his thanks to the senator for the amendment he had now proposed, and, unless gentlemen did actually intend that the bill should operate in a manner different from that which it professed on its face, he hoped the amendment would pass. Mr. C. said that the pre-emption laws were founded on the abuses to which they always gave rise. They became, for the most part, mere instruments of speculation; the poor man, for whom they were professedly passed, was excluded, and a most ruinous prospect was opened to the speculator alone. How would this bill work in practice? A new and fertile tract of land had just been purchased from some Indian tribe. From the fertility of its soil and the advantages of its situation, it had become a most interesting prospect for settlement. The Indian title had been extinguished, but the land had not yet been surveyed. What would be the effect? A company of speculators would employ a number of men to go on this fresh tract of land, and erect a few log cabins in the spring, and thus obtain pre-emption rights to each section. The company would immediately purchase from them for a trifling sum, and distributing their rights on the adjacent land, would thus possess themselves of a choice tract of land at a very low price. The senator from Alabama, however, insisted on the limitation that the settlers must take their rights only from contiguous land; but could any thing be more vague than that? Suppose a hundred men should go on the land, and settle, and it should be found that they could not get their hundred quarters on land immediately adjoining that on which they set themselves down, would they not spread themselves through the township, or over into a contiguous township, for the provision of the law must be interpreted as to the nearest land, and the right of the party claiming under it; and if they could not lay their pre-emption on lands immediately contiguous, they must do the next best thing to comply with the law, and take their lands somewhere in the neighborhood. Such he very candidly would be found to be the practical result of this bill, and Mr. C. would here predict, in regard to the present law, as in regard to all other laws, so far as they departed from our old, venerable and excellent land system, that it would redound to the benefit of speculators. As the amendment offered by the honorable senator from Connecticut, was in the very spirit of the arguments advanced by the friends of the bill, he trusted they would now demonstrate that they were not insincere in the grounds they had taken.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, now withdrew the call for the yeas and nays; but

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, insisted on the call.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, read to the senate a section of the law of 1840.

Mr. HENTINGTON observed that the section of a law just read had no reference to his amendment. His design was to provide that, if a number of persons should agree to settle on one small tract, they should not thereby be entitled to pre-emption on the quarter section of land. There was land enough which might be embraced by the term "contiguous," to extend this privilege to a thousand individuals.

HUGHESMAN briefly opposed the amendment, and could not conceive why gentlemen should be opposed to a provision, the sole object of which was to get the land settled.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said he was prepared to go so far as any gentleman in favor of the pre-emption system, but he could not approve of that section in the bill now proposed to be amended. It was going back too much to the old system of "floas," under which frauds innumerable had been perpetrated and proved. The amendment was proper in principle, but it could not be adopted without insisting on the yeas and nays.

The call for the yeas and nays was thereupon withdrawn, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENTINGTON now offered an amendment, which provided that the yeas and nays should be insisted on, and inserted "twenty-one," thereby confining the benefits of the bill to heads of families, widows, and single man over the age of twenty-one years. He said he thought the bill in its present form, with the provision for minors, would be highly objectionable. It was likely to produce one of two evils, and perhaps both. It would either encourage minors who were under parental government, and who had not the capacity in law to enter into a valid contract, prematurely to enter into the purchase of public lands, or, if an individual who went upon the land was the head of a family, and had sons over eighteen years, instead of obtaining a single quarter-section—which was the benefit the bill conferred—his wife and children would be obliged to go with him—he might though his sons obtain two or perhaps three quarter sections more. He believed that it had never before been proposed to grant tracts of the public lands to any but adults, unless they were heads of families. The last time, in 1838, when its provisions, as to single persons, as such as were over twenty-one years of age, and Mr. H. was for following in the same path.

Mr. NORVELL said that he could not see any great necessity for the amendment, or any great ground for the bill as it stood, because there could not be many minors in the same family, between the ages of 18 and 21. Every body acquainted with western habits, knew that nothing was more common than for young men to leave their homes before they were of age.

Mr. HUNTINGTON demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, suggested that young men at the south were in the habit of marrying earlier than in the colonies, and that some of them, in Connecticut. They often married before they were 21, or at least had a contract on hand.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that undoubtedly the gentleman was correct; but, if his object was to provide for young gentlemen who were of legal age, this, why was not the clause of the bill confined expressly to such cases.

Mr. PRATT said that he was in favor of the amendment, and hoped it would be adopted; for, although he was opposed to the principle of the bill, he wished to render it as unobjectionable as possible. In the remarks he had taken occasion to make in the commencement of the debate, he had expressed his opinion upon the policy of pre-emption laws in general, and especially upon the policy of this particular bill, as it stood. He had seen it, in fact, new and unprecedented in its character, and most extensive in its operation. While all former laws upon the subject had been retrospective and temporary, this was to be prospective and permanent. It not only granted, without any limitation of time, the full benefit in upon the relation of parent and child, and invited minors, young men under age, to desert the family roof before their maturity, and seek their fortunes in the wilderness of the west.—If the bill must pass, it was to be hoped, at least, that it would be directed to this very objectionable feature.

The bill, Mr. P. said, proposed a new and untried experiment, and he feared that it would be as mischievous in its consequences, as he deemed it unwise in its principle, and objectionable in its tendency. An honorable senator had yesterday, in justice to and support of the bill, referred to certain laws which existed in some of the states of New-England. The honorable member seemed to think that between the laws and the constitution there was a striking analogy, and that both rested essentially upon the same principle. Nothing, in the opinion of Mr. P., could be more erroneous. The laws to which reference had been made were not of a mere arbitrary character, as was supposed, but were the result of an ancient and approved principle—a principle as old as the system of equity itself—as old as the code of the civil law. They were little more in substance, than the enactment into the form of law of a well known rule of equity, namely, that "legis which was before essentially an equitable right, and providing for it a simple, cheap and expeditious remedy. They allowed a party entering upon land under color of title, supposing himself to have a valid right, but whose title, on the trial of an ejectment, turned out to be defective, to recover compensation for his improvements, or rather for what he had made the land better. But, to entitle himself to compensation, the party was obliged to show that he had entered under a good faith, under a claim of title apparently good. The laws gave relief, without any favor to mere naked, wild intruders, nor did they hold out any incitement or encouragement to lawless invasion or wrongful intrusions upon the property of another. They were never prospective but always retrospective, applying only to past cases, and were enacted from time to time, as the purposes of justice seemed to require. Nothing could be more just than that, if the legal owner would lay by, without asserting his title, and suffer a purchaser, for a valuable consideration, under a supposed but mistaken right, to expend money and labor upon his land, and thereby increase its value, he should not be allowed to turn the innocent party out of possession without remunerating him to the extent of the real worth of his improvements. Such was, in substance and effect, the law which had been referred to, and in the question of justice and value, he should not be allowed any intemperance or support to pre-emption laws, and especially to a law like the one proposed by this bill.

If, said Mr. P., there was no other objection to the bill than the powerful temptation it held out to emigration, that objection alone would be sufficient with him. It might be well to look into the statistics of some of the old states, and see what had been the progress, and what was the present state of their population. That would enable them to judge whether it was wise or just, by acts of legislation, to create motives and inducements which could not fail to give a new and active impulse to emigration. He would ask attention to the condition of his own state. In 1820, the population of Vermont was over two hundred and eighty thousand; in 1830, over two hundred and eighty thousand; and now, a little short of two hundred and ninety-two thousand. It would thus be seen, that from 1820 to 1830 the increase was about forty-five thousand, while from 1830 to 1840 the increase was full twenty-five thousand. In 1820, the population of that state was two hundred and forty thousand; in 1830, two hundred and sixty-nine thousand; and in 1840, two hundred and eighty-eight thousand. From 1820 to 1830 the increase was full twenty-five thousand, while from 1830 to 1840 it was only fourteen thousand. In some of the towns in Vermont, the population had diminished in the last five years, and there was reason to presume that such would be the case in Hampshire. Had it not been for the manufacturing business, which, though greatly depressed of late, had built up considerable villages in different parts, it was probable that the aggregate of population would not have been augmented in either state, but might have been diminished.

In view of these startling facts, Mr. P. said it was quite impossible for him, representing as he did, an old state, to give his support to a measure which would take a family, and its most precious bounty, to emigration. While he would make no personal restraints upon emigration, but leave every one to go where he pleased, he would give it no extraordinary facilities or encouragement, and especially such encouragement as this bill held out, and which he could not fail to see must operate to the great detriment upon the old states. Emigration to the new states was rapid enough, and one would think that they ought to be satisfied with the surprising and almost incredible accumulations their populations was annually receiving, without exacting new facilities and new encouragement at the expense of the old states. This was what their true interests did not require, and what they had no right to demand.—At any rate, it was what, coming as Mr. P. did from an old state, and meaning to perform his duty faithfully in the station he had chosen to occupy, he was not willing to yield.

Public attention (Mr. P. said) was awakened to the great and momentous subject of the public lands, and the country was beginning to feel the importance, and the necessity, of adjusting the question, and that speedily too. It was not difficult to see that the public lands, if not made use of as a bribe for votes, would, more or less, be a source of jealousy and collision of interest between the old and new states, tending not only to conflict of opinion, but to alienation of feeling. Every one knew, and well knew, that the question had already entered, more or less, into the politics of the country, and carried a powerful, if not a corrupting, influence in election, and unless the question was soon disposed of, it would not only create a combination of interest, attended with concert of action, of a nature and aspect at once alarming and threatening, but engender a sectional spirit, so strong, as to be felt as it might be by interested and ambitious politicians, as a dangerous and most dangerous tendency. The senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN), had been so deeply impressed with the nature and extent of the question, that he had felt it his duty to rise to the source, that he had felt it his duty to a public man, to bring forward a proposition for settling the question by ceding away and disposing at once the lands themselves. While Mr. P. agreed with the bona-fide senator as to the necessity of a speedy adjustment of the question, he would not agree with him as to the mode of doing it. He did not think that the proposition to cede the lands to the states in which they were situated would remove any of the evils they had reason to apprehend from suffering the question to remain open and undecided. Passing by all other objections to the proposition, it was enough that the cession proposed would create the relation of debtor and creditor between the new states and the general government; a relation, above all others, to be deprecated, and standing against the interests of the new states, without a cession, would insist, as had been said, without even a plausible pretence of right, upon having all the lands to themselves to the exclusion of the old states, they would be quite as likely, after a cession, to insist, against right, upon keeping to themselves all the money which the lands produced.

In the opinion of Mr. P. the only plan which seemed to be at the same time practicable, constitutional, and likely to settle the question finally and satisfactorily, was a distribution of the proceeds of the lands among the states, in proportion to their just proportions among all the states could not fail to command general acquiescence, to secure general approbation, and give general satisfaction. It would put an end at once and forever to a dangerously disturbing element in the new states, and would be used by all states, as a motive for agitation on the subject. It was moreover the only conservative measure—the only measure which would preserve the public domain, save this great interest of the country, from being alienated, once permanently, and for generations to come, its benefits to all the states.

It had been said, among other things, in opposition to the measure, that if they took from the treasury the revenue arising from the public lands, for the purpose of distributing it, they would be obliged to provide in some way for the deficiency it would occasion; and that it would be idle and foolish to distribute the money among the states, and then impose taxes to supply its place. Mr. P. would frankly admit that the reasoning of gentlemen would be unanswerable, and he should feel himself bound to vote against distribution, if, in his opinion, congress had the right either to distribute or retain the proceeds of the lands at its discretion, and the question was simply, whether the lands, so much as they should be retained or distributed, and nothing more. In his view, the question went far beyond that, and involved other and higher considerations. It was a question which agitated and distracted the councils of the nation, and which, if not speedily and harmoniously settled, would be a source of high considerations of public policy, for the sake of settling the question, and at the same time giving to the states what rightfully belonged to them, that he was in favor of distribution. It was his deliberate opinion, that the lands, so much as they should be fairly and justly entitled to the proceeds of all the public lands embraced in the compact of cession. He had given the reasons for this opinion on a former occasion, and he did not know that he could add anything, either new or material to what he then said. He then considered as he now considered, that the question depended upon the terms of the deeds of cession, connected with certain provisions of the constitution.

The question, in his opinion, the leading and most important deed, was the only one material to be noticed, declared that the lands ceded "shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of all of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation or federal alliance of the United States, and shall be distributed to the several States, in proportion to the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

It was, according to the leading and most important and legitimate sense, to make this clause any thing more or less than a declaration of trust in behalf of the respective states composing the confederation. Such was its obvious import and meaning. The words "to be distributed to the several States of the United States, ex Virginia inclusive," could be regarded as nothing else than a declaration in terms that the cession was a grant to the use of the several states. But not only was the use declared to the states at once, in proportion in which the states had a share in the use was also declared. A rule was given for apportioning the fund among the states; and the insertion of a rule of apportionment, of itself, necessarily implied a several, separate interest in the states in the common fund. They were to share in it "according to the usual respecter proportion in the general charge and expenditure," that is, they were to share respectively in the fund, each state having its proportion, its distributive share, according to the ratio presented. This was the plain Import of the language used, and there was nothing in the words "common fund" which at all varied or in any way qualified the meaning. In the case of a grant, to A, in trust for the use and benefit of B, C and D, the fund would be a common fund, whether so declared or not, but the beneficial interest would be several. Nor was the meaning at all affected, as some had contended it was, by the words in the concluding clause, "and the said lands shall be sold, and the proceeds thereof shall be divided and apportioned among the parties entitled thereto, in proportion to their respective shares in the said common fund." Disposed of for what purpose? The words referred to an antecedent member of the sentence, and supposed the substitution of the grant to the use and benefit of B, C and D, and stated. And what was it? Why, to form a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States, &c. Virginia included, &c. That was the declared purpose of the grant, and that was the purpose for which the lands were required to be sold. The words "according to the usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure" were used, not to designate the object or purpose of the grant, but to give a measure of apportionment, and limit and fix the respective interests of the states in the land. The true reading of the deed then was, that the cession was a grant to the confederation by one member of it, for the use and benefit of itself and the several other members of it, respectively, to be shared by them in the proportions specified. The short and true reading of the deed then was, that the cession was a grant to the confederation by one member of it, for the use and benefit of itself and the several other members of it, respectively, to be shared by them in the proportions specified. The short and true reading of the deed then was, that the cession was a grant to the confederation by one member of it, for the use and benefit of itself and the several other members of it, respectively, to be shared by them in the proportions specified. The short and true reading of the deed then was, that the cession was a grant to the confederation by one member of it, for the use and benefit of itself and the several other members of it, respectively, to be shared by them in the proportions specified.

"The congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be construed as to prejudice any claim of the United States or of any particular state."

"All debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be and remain the debt of the United States under this constitution as under the confederation."

These provisions of the constitution, which were the only ones having any bearing upon the question, instead of extinguishing or impairing, in any degree, the obligation of the compact of cession, saved and confirmed all the rights of the parties to the cession. The new constitution superseded the old confederation, but the trust continued a subsisting and binding trust, and the beneficial interest in the lands remained, as before, in the states. If it had been apprehended that the trust could not now be executed in the precise manner designated and directed by the deeds of cession, then, according to well known and established principles, it was to be executed as nearly in that manner as was practicable.

Such, Mr. P. said, was his reasoning upon the question at the last session, and what he had now said upon it was little else than repetition, in substance, of what he then said. Distribution, he would repeat, was, in his judgment, the right of the states. Justice not only required it, but it was demanded by considerations of the highest and most weighty nature. He thought the thanks of the country were due to the honorable senator who originally brought forward the proposition. It was a wise, just and conciliatory measure; and Mr. P. ventured to say that no one could deny the sagacity which the honorable senator from Kentucky had originated, and which had rendered, and would, in future history, render his name signally conspicuous, the measure of distribution, above all others, worthy of regard and approval. He thought the strongest evidence of his wisdom, his sagacity, his enlarged and enlightened patriotism.

Mr. P. said there was one other topic, not very intimately connected, it was true, with the subject before the senate, upon which he wished to say a word or two. It was a topic which had arisen rather incidentally in the course of the discussion, and he noticed it, not because it had any immediate bearing upon the merits of the main question, but on account of its general importance, and for the purpose of expressing his dissent from the doctrines which gentlemen had taken occasion to advance upon it.

It had been said that the states had the unqualified and exclusive right to determine and fix the qualifications of electors, and might by their constitutions or laws admit whomsoever they pleased, whether citizens or aliens, to vote in elections either of state or federal officers. To that doctrine Mr. P. could, by no means agree. It was not only, in his opinion, repugnant to sound, acknowledged principles of national policy, but it was incompatible with the express provision and plain object and intention of the constitution of the United States.

The constitution gave to congress the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. The power thus given was, from its very nature, national policy; and that made so it was not, of course exclusive, as much so as the power to regulate commerce, or the power to declare war. The states being one nation under the constitution, and these powers being all equally and strictly national in their character, and therefore they could be exercised only by the national government. It would be inconsistent with the nature of the union, and the objects of the general government, to allow either of the powers to be exercised by the states. Congress was empowered to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and for the purpose of securing uniformity on a subject of such high national concern, the power was surrendered by the states and vested in the general government.

It had been contended that no one could be a citizen of any state without being a citizen of the United States. The constitution declares that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." A citizen of any one state, therefore, must be a citizen of all the states, and therefore of the United States; and this consideration alone, if nothing else would do it, demonstrated the utter repugnancy and incompatibility of the exercise of the power by the states. It was true that it was once supposed, and long has been held by the judiciary, that the states possessed a concurrent authority in the matter of naturalization; but, considering the nature and purpose of the power, and that such concurrent authority would render the power entirely nugatory, and wholly nullify the policy, the error was never allowed for a time laid at length given way to sound reasoning and more comprehensive and enlightened views upon the subject, so that it might now be considered as settled and established that the power was exclusively vested in congress.

The power of naturalization given in the constitution, Mr. P. said, necessarily implied that no one could be a citizen, or enjoy the full rights of a citizen, who was not such by nativity of birth, except by naturalization. Every one, therefore, was an alien, until he became a citizen, either by birth or by naturalization. The question was, could the elective franchise be given to aliens, to persons who owed no allegiance to the country, but were bound by allegiance to a foreign country, which was the legal conclusion of every alien. If the states could not give the power of naturalization, could they confer all the essential civil and political rights and privileges which naturalization gave? If they could not directly, and in a legal and constitutional sense, make an alien citizen, could they give him all the rights which belonged to a citizen, and thus indirectly, but substantially, exercise the power of naturalization? It appeared to Mr. P. to be very plain that they could not. The constitution of the United States was the supreme law of the land, and it was hardly necessary to say that every state constitution or law which was repugnant to any of its provisions was of no validity and could confer no rights. If, in addition, without naturalization, could have and enjoy civil, rights, civil and political, which properly and necessarily belonged to a citizen, for what purpose, and for what purpose, a citizen in every thing but in name? There would be nothing left of his alienism but a mere abstraction.

Mr. P. said it was very clear to him that the right to elect and be elected could only be bestowed upon citizens, native or naturalized. The supreme power, according to the theory of the American governments, rested wholly in the citizens, or, in the language of the constitution, in the people—a word which was as synonymous as the word citizens. It might be assumed, as an elementary principle in our political institutions, that the exercise of the powers of government could be delegated by none but citizens, and only to citizens. Citizenship, on the other hand, was a question of law and reason, not of sentiment. The individual, of course, was not a citizen until he had been admitted to the rights of a citizen. If he was not a citizen, no one could be an elector who was not a citizen. It was true, the states might superadd, or dispense with, other qualifications, but they could not, or dispense with, the fundamental one of citizenship. They might, perhaps, repeal the common law, which disabled an alien to hold lands, and give him all the rights of property; they might, perhaps, remove other disabilities, and allow him to be a juror, or to exercise the rights of citizenship, depending upon the relation and of mere municipal concern. But when they added to these civil rights the political privileges which belonged only to a citizen, such as the exercise of the elective franchise, which was the highest function of a citizen, and was of general and national concern, the constituency of the state government was limited to the constituency of the general government, they did that in substance, if not in form, which was palpably at variance with the meaning, spirit and policy of the federal constitution.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, as he was very desirous to rally around the doctrine, he could not vote for the amendment; and, indeed, on a little reflection, he was persuaded the senator from Connecticut would never find it in his heart to deprive a young fellow who was under 21, and had an affectionate wife, of his right of getting a pre-emption right and settling down in life. As to our western boys, he believed many of them were disposed to marry early, and he thought that those who did so, ought not to be discouraged from going into the new country. Give them a fair chance; and even those who were not married, let them go and erect a log cabin and get it ready to accommodate a wife immediately after they should be 21. He thought it would be rather a reflection on the senate should they refuse so small a boon. The provision in the bill could do no harm, and would be of great benefit.

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, was opposed to the amendment as unnecessary. It was his belief that the inhabitants of the old states were quite as much, if not more benefited by pre-emption laws than those of the new states. He stated that he had been settled that the population were crowding each other out, and he was for holding out inducements for them to go to the west, where land was cheap. A young man, by hiring himself out for a year or two, could earn money enough to buy a farm, and settle himself for life; and it was no uncommon thing to see those who had begun in this manner eventually become prosperous and wealthy. There were men in the western country now worth $50,000 and 100 thousand dollars, who had entered that country with an axe, and had not been worth the clothes on their backs. By hiring out at $10 and $15 a month, they had earned themselves a piece of land, and by industry and integrity had become among the most respectable and wealthy of their citizens. A man in the eastern states who had a family which he found it difficult to maintain, would remove to the west, carrying with him sons between the ages of eighteen and twenty one. It was an every-day occurrence. When he got there, he would hire himself out for a year or two, and then they would hire out, and, in a little while, earn themselves each a farm. Thus neighborhoods were formed, and there were entire towns in the western country which had been settled by persons originally moving from the same neighborhood in the eastern states. The young people would establish themselves somewhere in the vicinity of their parent, and would thus avail themselves of their advice and friendly aid. This appeared to Mr. S. a very desirable state of things, and he would do nothing to prevent it.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that he wished the honorable senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) had finished a more practical commentary, than he had done on his own defective early marriages. Mr. H. had no desire to prevent the prosperity of enterprising young men, who chose to marry early; and they were embraced in that provision of the bill which gives the right of pre-emption to a young man, being the head of a family. He could not understand it, however, to give to minors who were very single, as this bill does, under the description of a "single man over the age of eighteen years." In regard to the latter class, he was inclined to "follow in the footsteps" of the "predecessors," entrusting their policy on this subject to a wise one.

Mr. MANGEN said that, after the last votes which had been given in favor of this bill, he presumed it was to pass, and was desirous to make it as perfect as possible. He thought that a young man, under 18 and under 21 should have a pre-emption right, provided he was married, and the head of a family; but, if a similar provision was to be extended to other minors, he appealed to gentlemen to consider what was the effect of giving them a pre-emption right on the domestic relations of life. Inviting young men from the household of their fathers, conferring property on them before they were of age, and settling them in matters in a new country—what must be the effect on themselves, as well as on the community into the midst of which they were thrown, without being bound to it by any of the ordinary social ties? It went to break up family relations, and tempt young men to a breach of the duty they owed their parents. What it was to do to the community, he could not say, but he thought it was to tempt boys into circumstances where they would be exposed to all manner of imposition? What right had such young men to enter on our public domain and erect themselves a log cabin or other building without the consent of their parents? By the laws, he believed, of every state in the Union, their personal services, until they were of age, belonged to their fathers. It would be a cruel thing to desert their duty—to deprive their parents of the aid on which they leaned, and to which by the laws of the country, they were entitled, and which they might claim under a law of far higher origin and far more sacred obligation.

Mr. NORVELL suggested that, by the laws of the general government, young men of 18 could become purchasers of the public land. There was no law to prevent it; and why, if he went on a piece of wild land with the intention of settling, if he cultivated the soil and erected on it a dwelling, ought he to be placed on a worse footing than others?

The question was now taken on the proposed amendment to strike out 19 and insert 21, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Criffenden, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Pierpont, Pickett, Rogers, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Webster, White, Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allee, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, Kerr, Linn, Lumpkin, McKim, Newland, H. Smith, Fort, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Wright, Young—21.

The Senate being equally divided, the president gave his casting vote in the negative. So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUNTINGTON now offered another amendment, proposing to strike out from section first the words "has been or shall be extinguished," and insert "shall have been extinguished at the time of such settlement." So that if the amendment be adopted, it will read, "on any of the public lands which the Indian title shall have been extinguished at the time of such settlement."

He said that he proposed it merely with the view of making the bill more explicit, and of preventing misconception, especially as the registers and receivers were to have power to decide in a summary manner and definitively all questions arising under the act.

As the bill stood, it might be so construed as to apply to land to which the Indian title had not been extinguished. The object of the amendment was to prevent this. Instead, therefore, of the words in the bill, "the title to which has been or may be extinguished," he proposed to substitute the words, "shall have been extinguished at the time of such settlement."

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he concurred in the amendment.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I am glad there is one amendment which the gentlemen can approve.

Mr. CLAY. And I am glad there is one of the gentlemen's measures which I can approve.

Mr. HUNTINGTON rejoined that, although he was pleased to have the support of the senator from Alabama in this amendment, he thought it more important to have a majority of the senate to concur in this, as they already had done in another amendment which he had proposed, and to which the gentlemen from Alabama had objected.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he would propose to the senate another amendment, the object of which, as in the last case, was to render the provisions of the bill more explicit. He could not suppose it was his intention that the pre-emption right granted by the bill should be extended to any other land than the quarter section on the pre-emptor settled; but, as the bill was drawn, it must be manifest that a person who settled on a quarter section, and brought himself within the scope of the bill by making improvements, &c., might be entitled to a pre-emption right to any other quarter section on pre-emption. To prevent this, Mr. H. proposed to insert in the 12th line of the 4th section, after the words "land," the words "so settled upon;" so that, if amended, it will read "what was settled upon on pre-emption in the purchase of a quantity of the public land so settled upon, not exceeding one quarter section."

Mr. LINN inquired whether his friend from Connecticut would exclude a man who had settled on a fraction containing 17 or 20 acres. The senator was aware that in the survey there were some fractional sections, one quarter of which would not always be 40 acres. This had produced some difference of opinion in Missouri. At some land office a man was allowed to settle on a fraction, and at others not. In consequence, no appeal had been made to the land department at Washington, and there it had been decided that the settler must confine himself to the exact amount of 40 acres. This was productive of great inconvenience. Part of a man's farm might have been on such a fraction, and he was thus prevented from entering it. Such cases could possibly occur in this bill, and he should be sorry to see it prevented.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that the case supposed was already provided for in the bill, and his amendment did not in his opinion interfere with it.

The question being put, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTINGTON now offered as a further amendment a new section to the bill as follows:

"Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That before any person shall be admitted to the purchase of any patent for the land which he may claim by having complied with its provisions, he shall make oath before some person authorized by law to administer the same, which oath, with the certificate of the person administering it, shall be filed with the register of the proper land office when the land is applied for, and by said register sent to the office of the commissioner of public lands, that he entered upon the land which he claims in his own right, and exclusively for his own use and benefit; and that he has not, directly or indirectly, entered into any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person or persons whatever, by which the title which he might acquire from the government of the United States should inure to the use or benefit of any person, himself, or to convey or transfer the said land, or the title which he may acquire to the same, to any other person or persons whatever, at any subsequent time; and if such person claiming the benefit of this law as aforesaid shall swear falsely, he is, in addition to the penalty of perjury, to be fined and punished for perjury, forfeit the money which he may have paid for the land, and all right and title to the said land; and any grant or conveyance which he may have made in pursuance of such agreement or contract as aforesaid shall be void, except in the hands of a purchaser in good faith, for valuable consideration without notice. And the certificate, which shall be filed with the commissioner as aforesaid, shall be taken to be conclusive evidence that the oath was legally administered."

Mr. H. said that his intention to this amendment, is in the others, was to carry out the professed object of the law, by preventing frauds and securing the honest, bona fide settler in the possession of his land.

By the bill, in its present form, any individual was not only not prohibited, but was permitted to enter on land for the benefit of others, instead of himself. Now, if the design of the law was to grant a pre-emption right to the bona fide settler only, was it not reasonable to require his affidavit that he was not a speculator, but a bona fide settler? This was the security which government had against frauds, and, however fair, it was no security. Did western gentlemen want others to get the bonus? Did they desire individuals to go upon the land for the benefit of speculators? As the bill now is, a man might openly and professedly enter on a quarter section for the benefit of some rich speculator, and obtain for him the right of pre-emption. Mr. H. said that he followed, in this amendment, the law of 1836; and though he admitted that it would prove a very inadequate security, still it would be some. Good citizens would not refuse to take the oath.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said that the friends of the bill had no wish to allow men to enter on the lands for the benefit of others, and, hoping that the amendment, if adopted, might produce the effect of reconciling some gentlemen to the bill, he should not oppose it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTINGTON now said that, as the gentlemen from Alabama had gone thus far, he would have his concurrence in the amendment not proposed to propose. The law was not only prospective but permanent. He desired so to amend it as would expire by its own limitation; and it would be found to be productive of evil. He wished, therefore, to provide, as in former pre-emption laws, that the law should continue in force for a limited time only; and with that view he offered the following:

"Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be and continue in force two years, and no longer."

On this amendment Mr. HUNTINGTON demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. LINN said he wished to offer a few words on this amendment. If, said Mr. L., we are to open a pre-emption discussion every two years, he predicted that it would cost this government ten times as much to administer the law, as the present of the pre-emption system altogether, and, without doubt, to the highest bidder, which, as has been conclusively shown, amounts only to the difference of a few cents. He did not entertain a doubt of it. Why, said he, have we not seen, from time to time, congresses engaged, day by day, gravely discussing, at an enormous expense to the people, the question whether you would pass laws to permit the earliest settlers of the wilderness to purchase their lands at one dollar and twenty-five cents the acre? He considered the money thus spent as absolutely squandered—the bill would avoid all such a waste of money. Mr. LINN (continued) requiring an oath to prevent fraud; that he must be permitted to say that there have been almost infinity of charges of fraud brought against the settlers on our western lands which were nearly destitute of foundation. There was scarcely ground enough of truth to sustain the sale of this land upon while lightning the thunders of denunciation and abuse which have been heard here and elsewhere.

I believe (said he) there is more false swearing in the custom house of one of our large cities, in one day, than would be sufficient to damn the whole world; certainly a thousand times more than exists on the whole line of our frontier, in relation to pre-emption rights, in a year. It has become almost proverbial to charge the people of the new states with want of moral sense. At Kingbeck's charge, on those who make it. I know it to be unfounded. I stand here openly to deny it, and I aver that, save in a very few cases, the charge of fraud in wholly without foundation. I know this system of accusation employed against Louisiana? It was said that the speculators there had seized upon the richest and most beautiful land in all the country, and by fraudulent practices had appropriated it to themselves. Well, the government employed an agent to clear up the matter, and he has been searching and searching into the truth of the charge. He did so; and what does he report to you? That he always heard reports in relation to some other neighborhood, but never was able to light on a spot where the existence of such a crime could be proved. Louisiana, on the ground, the charge received before him, it vanished, it evaporated, and never proved to be tangible, except in a very few cases; and he would venture to say, that if similar charges, which have been made elsewhere, shall be subjected to a thorough investigation, the gentlemen will almost feel ashamed that they ever entertained even a suspicion of their truth.

I do not deny that fraud may have been perpetrated, but I do say that it has occurred as seldom as ever will be possible under a merely human law. The system of the law is to admit of no fraud, no wrong to the United States, and the government, by that means, lost some of its best lands; and yet it was not fraud, but all originated from a construction given to the law by the land department here. It is said that he was opposed to the construction of the law, and should be still. The object of the pre-emption system is, that the new states may get an accession of good, moral, industrious settlers. And here I must be permitted to say, on the subject of the land speculation, that some little land has been committed against the general government, the United States have been guilty of a small amount of it, as regards some of the United States. By the treaty of Paris of 1803, you acquired possession of the magnificent territory of Louisiana, stretching from the Gulf of Mexico to the sources of the Mississippi, and by contiguity to the great western ocean. With the country was transferred into the bosom of the American family many thousand souls, mostly ignorant of our laws, customs and manners. They were ignorant of the value of the land, and of the respect that property. But did we not see that they refused for many years to confirm any tract over one league square, or any tract containing a lead mine or salt spring. Was this their right? And, sir, have we not seen that some large lands and tracts were pocketed by the government, and title was refused to the claimant; and, when taken from him and afterwards confirmed, you force him to take the same amount from your pocket and refuse public lands in respect to it, and give it to him?

This you call carrying out a solemn treaty in the spirit in which it was made. But, sir, I do not charge this government with intentional wrong in this matter, notwithstanding it did steal some of these strangers' lands. But I say that more rank injustice has been committed by the government, and by gentlemen who stood here and saw it done before their eyes, than has ever been committed by the people of the whole state in relation to your public domain.

When the state, during the last war with Great Britain, between the Missouri and the Mississippi rivers, was left to defend itself by a population who had settled on the lands in defiance of your laws, these very quarters proposed to be your benefactors, and they were the benefactors. And when the old state shall be sunk in folios and 63-POSTSCRIPT—ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA. We stop the press to announce the arrival of the Acadia at Boston, with Liverpool advices to the 19th ultimo, inclusive.

The war panic excited by the publication of Mr. Pickens' report, and the position of McLeod's affair, had somewhat subsided. Whilst some of the public journals were endeavoring lustily to blow up a flame, the tone in the official circles is calm and pacific.

A conclusive proof of confidence in the continuance of peace is found in the turn which the cotton market had taken. Demand became active and prices advanced upon receipt of Pickens' report, but on the day the Acadia left, the extra demand had ceased and prices had settled down to previous rates.

The Hampshire Telegraph has the following: "A thousand of our warships, we have this day learned that our government, in order to prepare for any emergency that may spring out of the case of McLeod (and if the republic execute him, we do not think there is a man in the kingdom but will demand justice), have directed a regular fleet to hold themselves in readiness to embark for North America—two of which are the 19th and 84th regiments, now in Ireland.

It is also stated in private letters from the first circles in Paris, that Lord Palmerston, the 27th ult. officially announced to Mr. Guizot that the English government would find it necessary to send ten sail of the line to the same quarter. Of course a fleet of steamers will form part of such an expedition.

The London Spectator issued prior to the sailing of the Acadia, remarks worthy of the report of Mr. Pickens. We copy, however, from the Spectator the following sensible remarks:

"Every thing seems to conspire to aggravate ill feelings and to neutralize better dispositions. Which is Lord Palmerston's case. He has just been sent out pre-emptory demands for Mr. McLeod's discharge, and orders for ships of the line to back these demands on the American coast. To what end has that been done? on what ground? in what foolishness? Has Lord Palmerston considered the law officers of the crown, and made quite sure that the United States can be called upon to give up Mr. McLeod, before he has made appearance before the tribunals, on a charge which, being formally, however grossly made, must be legally disposed of? Has Lord Palmerston considered the proper time and mode of urging the demand to secure success? The most reasonable demand may be so put as to make it impossible to accede; the country would be glad to know how Lord Palmerston has managed."

London, March 18, (receiving). Upon mature reflection, the tenor of the dispatches received yesterday from New York, is considered decidedly more satisfactory than the previous accounts, and consequently the alarm which prevailed here, on the subject of peace or war, has in some degree subsided. The proof of this is the fact that the advance in the prices of all securities, both English and foreign yesterday and to day; those who had speculated for a fall having shown a disposition to change their accounts and go for a rise.

It is said that four ships of war were fitting out with despatch—two at Sheerness, and two at Portsmouth. Their destination was supposed to be trans-Atlantic.

The money market, London, March 19, is in a favorable impression produced by the news received by the Columbia from America, has led to a further improvement in the funds to-day. Consols for the account having advanced at 88 1/2 to 3/4, being 1 per cent. advance there yesterday. Exchequer bills were at 8s. per cent.

CHRONICLE.

AMERICAN COAL. The Pottsville Miners' Journal states that the quantity of foreign coal imported into the United States last year was valued at about $20,000,000. There is at present a duty on this article of $1 66 per ton; yet on account of the difficulties of internal navigation, foreign coal may be brought from Pecos, Nova Scotia, and sold in New York and Boston at a profit.

Great Britain imposes a duty of seven dollars a ton on foreign coal, thus protecting her own commodity against competition. The miners of this island, however, it is said has not been, on the average, profitable to those engaged in it. If the importation of foreign coal from Nova Scotia should be restricted by a heavier duty, so as to render the protection to the British article, the competition between home producers, so much as the business was fairly established, would bring down the price to a minimum standard.

AMERICAN COPIER. A late number of the Wisconsin Enquirer says that Messrs. W. Alfred and P. W.

Thomas, of New Baltimore, in that territory, have met with complete success in their experiments on smelting copper ore. They constructed a very simple furnace, which cost only ten dollars, in which they smelted, on the 28th of September last, 2,500 pounds of ore, from which they obtained nearly 700 lbs. of pure copper, pronounced by competent judges to be superior to the South American pig copper. The time occupied in procuring from the ore the above amount of copper, was within five hours. Neither Mr. Alfred or Mr. Thomas had any experience in the business of smelting, and the result is justly deemed a matter of great importance to that territory, which abounds in great quantities of copper ore.

ANTONIO, the slave of capt. Ferrer, of the Armistad, was, according to the decree of the district court, to have been delivered up to the Spanish authorities, with a few days being among the most of Mr. Haven. It is understood that he gave leg bail, with two sureties for his appearance, and that the sureties have probably before this time delivered him up.

BANKS. The banks of New Orleans reported on the 18th ult. that they had received, in gold and silver, $3,377,123 in specie, and that their circulation of notes, deducting the notes held by banks amounted 6,613,557 dollars.

Milken bank of Clyde. The Albany Evening Journal says, the mortgages deposited with the comptroller by the Milken bank of New York, were sold on Friday at the Merchants' Exchange. The amount of the bank's debt, as an interest, was $35,752. The value for $64,705 in cash. The dividend to the bill-holders is about 90 per cent.

The banks of Richmond suspended specie payments on the 6th instant, having sustained heavy drains for some time past. They resolve that they will be ready to resume specie payments contemporaneously with the banks of Philadelphia or Baltimore, or whenever the balance of trade between this state and the northern states will render such a measure prudent and wise, and to this end it will be the fixed policy to observe the utmost prudence in their discounts, and to proceed to the favor of a change of the same, when circumstances should render such a measure prudent and wise.

The other banks of the state had previously suspended.

THE U. S. OF PENNSYLVANIA. THOMAS DEVLIN, esq. has resigned the office of president of the bank—col. DRAYTON, formerly of South Carolina, has been elected in his place. The committee report in favor of a change of the name and charter of the institution—capital to be reduced to fourteen millions of dollars and proxy voting prohibited—special security to be given—the directors to inquire into the obligations incurred by the bank—any various resolutions, and it is possible to proceed by legal means to enforce the fulfilment of them—the clerks of the bank absolved from oaths to keep secret the transactions of the bank from its directors and committee of stockholders, &c. &c.

CONNECTICUT—election. The general election terminated, a suit to have resulted in favor of the whigs transients throughout.

DEATHS. James Ronaldson, expired in Philadelphia on Monday last, in the 73d year of his age.

He will long be remembered for his public spirit and his various and successful exertions, which he has contributed to build up Philadelphia. The beautiful cemetery, which was laid out and planned under his immediate supervision, remains as a monument of his love for his industry. When asked by a friend, who was a benefactor, and his circle of friends salute him which is honorable.

In the Register, American of the 1st inst. we find the following announcement of the death of Herman Le Roy, esq. the father in law of the hon. Daniel Webster. The venerable Herman Le Roy, died last evening in the 84th year of his age.

For nearly two-thirds of that long term of life, Mr. Le Roy was honorably connected with the commerce of our city, which he has seen rising from a petty village into a metropolis, and it has become the commercial capital.

LEGAL DECISIONS. The admissibility of printed copies of English acts of parliament, as evidence in the United States courts, was determined last week in a case where the United States claimed that the acts were proper against certain imported glass ware.

The district attorney offering to read certain acts of parliament, procured from the official printer to the United States, and presented to by Mr. Parsons, one of the claimants, and insisted that such acts could only be received in evidence when authenticated by the signature of the secretary of state for foreign affairs.

The court decided that convenience, and a beneficial relaxation of the ancient strict rules of practice—was an analogy derived from the custom of a universal in our courts, of reading statutes from printed books—warranted the district attorney in using those printed acts, as evidence.

Exception was taken in this decision by the counsel for the claimants.

SHIPLEY CASES. Baltimore county court, at its late session, decided the class of cases known under the above significant title. The judgments rendered by the magistrates in favor of the plaintiffs have been sustained by the court. The cases are rendered responsible by the deliberate opinion of the court, judges Magruder and Furvance, before whom the above causes were argued. We congratulate the plaintiffs upon the result, and now some check will be put to these issues, which parties have been in the habit of imposing upon the public, and when called upon to answer, take, if they will, the consequences. It seems the most unaccountable defense, that these issues are contrary to law.

MONEY MARKET. It is a singular state of the money market when the banks of our city, which are generally supposed to derive strength from deposits and continually upon the result, now some check with new accounts with citizens; and yet this is, we understand, the course which most of the banks of our city are compelled to adopt.

MITCHELL, C. F. Attending witness. We state with pain that several forged drafts on New York state bank at Albany, amounting to several thousand dollars, have just been returned to brokers of this city and Philadelphia, and there is no reason to doubt that their forgery is the work of C. F. Mitchell, a member of congress from Niagara & Orleans counties. Mitchell has fled, and the officers of justice are now in hot pursuit of him. In a letter to the Courier and Enquirer Mitchell estimates that he will not be taken alive. He does not pretend to deny his guilt.

Mitchell has been one of the most determined and determined applicants for office the past winter. By his intrigues, importunities, and bargaining, he had continued a large influence in favor of his application; but it was promptly overruled by general Harrison and his cabinet, who appointed a better man to the place he solicited. Mitchell had already been left out of the next congress by his constituents. We congratulate them and the administration that they are so well rid of a scoundrel.

He has probably gone to England in the Calcedonia, though he tries to give the impression that he has started for Texas. He has left wife, children and friends at the last moment in the work of C. F. Mitchell, we believe, wholly unopposed for.

RODGERS & SONS. Most of our readers have heard of Messrs. Joseph Rodgers & Sons, the famous Sheffield cutlers. Rodgers' penknives, scissors, &c. have long been celebrated for their excellence on this side of the Atlantic. We have lately seen a statement, however, to the effect that the various works of Messrs. Rodgers have been in the service of that firm—and the result is the highest credit to both the employers and the workmen. The number of workmen is 5,000 and the aggregate of the time employed, is 4,600 years, viz:

Sometime since, the workmen in the employment of Messrs. Rodgers, invited those gentlemen to a dinner—and presented them with a list, which cost 90 guineas, as a testimony of the esteem in which they were held, for their liberality in giving the best prices and wages to the men, and the moral general improvement to those in their employ.

JAMES WATT. A truly great man. The Philadelphia National Gazette says: A London newspaper states that the university of Edinburgh has ordered a statue to be erected in honor of James Watt, which will be the first erected to the memory of that great man. And the editor remarks that "even the statue to the duke of Wellington are fewer in number than the statues erected to James Watt, with all becoming respect and reverence for the illustrious soldier, says something for the intellectual and moral advancement of the age." If we err not, (says the Gazette) the greatest of the great men of the nineteenth century is surely though gradually removing the passion for war and rancors. As the arts of destruction and the physical culture of men, which once constituted the highest merit of Christian civilization—the knights of the days of chivalry—it is not wonderful that this age will foster in a great degree the spirit of the bloody seeds to the vice presidency. At the late extra session of the senate, SAMUEL L. SOUTHWARD, ex-governor of New Jersey, was chosen president pro tem. of that body, and is now therefore vice president of the United States. Immediately on hearing of the death of president Harrison he left home for Washington, but was taken ill on the road, and is now confined at Tretout.

We find the following on the subject of the offices of president and vice president of the U. States in the National Intelligencer, of Thursday the 15th inst.

An erroneous conception of the quality and designation of the office devolving on the vice president, in case of the president's removal from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability, seems to prevail in some of the public papers, in which Mr. Tyler is styled as acting president, as if he were still, ex officio, vice president, merely acting ad interim as president; the office proper of president being vacant, and he performing the duties of that office in his quality of vice president. Whereas he is, to all intents and purposes, by the appointment of the constitution and by election, president of the United States; invested with the office proper of president, with as pleasurable right and authority as his predecessor, gen. Harrison; and exercises the powers of the office, not in his quality of vice president, but of president, the office of vice president being vacated by his accession to the office of president, or entirely merged in the superior office. By the terms of the constitution, the office of president "devolves on the vice president." By his original election as vice president, he is consequently elected president; that is, elected to the office of president upon the happening of any one of the conditions provided in the constitution.

The constitution uses very different terms when it comes to provide for the removal, death, &c. both of president and vice president. For such a case congress is empowered to provide, by "declaring whom officer shall then act as president; and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a president shall be elected." The office of president devolves not on him; he still retains his original office and official designation; as, for example, president pro tem. of the senate, speaker of the house of representatives &c. and in quality of that office performs, ad interim, the duties of another office; he becomes, indeed, with respect to official capacities at the same time; ex officio, he is merely president pro tempore of the senate, &c. and by that designation acts as president. Such an officer might properly enough, in common parlance, be styled acting president, though we conceive distinctly official designations to be, "president pro tempore of the senate, (as the case may be), acting as president of the United States." Not so the vice president when the office of president devolves on him. He is no longer vice president, but becomes president ex officio, and fills up the vacancy for the residue of the original term: the office of vice president is vacated by his accession to the office of president; he can neither perform the duties nor receive the salary appropriated to the office of vice president. Nor does there seem any constitutional provision for filling the office of vice president, though all its active duties are to be performed by a president pro tempore of the senate, chosen by the senate, in the absence of the vice president, or when the office of president devolves on him. The person, so chosen, takes not the office proper of vice president, but a new office under the designation of "president pro tempore of the senate."

RESPECT FOR THE MEMORY OF PRESIDENT HARRISON.

At every city, town and village in the union as the annals of the tidings of the death of the president arrives, it is received with every demonstration of mourning and regret, and followed immediately by such marks of respect and regard as the various local communities have it in their power to offer. Such legislative bodies as happen to be in session, are amongst the foremost to demonstrate their sympathy with the general impulse. That exhibited by the legislature of Maryland, in leaving the seat of the state government, and attending the funeral of an organized body, is amongst the most touching evidences of the kind.

The appropriate course of governor Porter, of Pennsylvania, in the solemn conjuncture, and of the legislature of that state, is worthy of record. The message of the governor, announcing to both houses, the demise of president HARRISON, bore strong and emphatic testimony to the "public service and private worth of the distinguished citizen" whose death, the authorities and people of the Commonwealth were then called upon to notice and deplore. To the same end, a circular was addressed by the secretary of the commonwealth, to the heads of departments and other chief officers of the state, announcing the melancholy event, and directing that, as a testimony of deep felt sorrow, under the afflictive visitation, the public offices should be closed, and the transaction of public business suspended for the day.

The deputations of members from each branch of the legislature of that state, were also appointed to proceed from Harrisburg to Washington, for the purpose of representing that body at the funeral. The legislature of New York adopted such measures as the occasion enabled them to do, to testify their feeling. The respective courts, wherever they were in session, have officially united in the general expression—generally—indeed we may say with but a single exception so far as we have noticed, the municipalities of all the principal cities in the union took immediate measures to evidence their respect for the deceased—unless, indeed the measure was anticipated by a general meeting of the community. The whole land may be literally said to be lustrated with the sad and emblem of woe, and the mournful tone of the funeral bell—or muffled drum—or the sad sound of the hour gun is heard from valley to valley, or from hill top to hill top, over the wide expanse of these United States—telling the tidings of bereavement.

To attempt even an abbreviation of what spontaneously bursts forth from millions of people and from thousands of communities, on this occasion, would be a fruitless attempt. Still more so, any effort to give the breathings of the public press. We can but call a few brief pages from the mast-head columns that now crowd every paper in the union.

The whole people upon this solemn occasion have felt alike. Not a shadow of party distinction is felt. The wildest elements have been as struck as by a solemn injunction, "PEACE—AS STILL," and the turbulent spirits of the former subsided. And but one family of Americans at the tomb of WM. HENRY HARRISON.

General Harrison's family. Most sincerely do we mingle our condolences with this bereaved family. We know well, as all must, that the blow that has lighted down upon them from the hand of the Almighty, is heavy and severe. But it must be our extending consolation to them, that a nation will be proud to remember, and that a nation will revere the character, and cherish the memory, of one they loved so much and so worthily.

The following relatives of gen. Harrison were present in the city on the day of the funeral, viz: John H. Harrison, of Ohio, [son's widow] and two sons.

Mrs. Taylor, of Virginia, [niece] a daughter and two sons.

Pike Harrison, [grandson] son of J. C. S. Harrison and grandson of Gen. Pike.

Mr. O. Q. Harrison, [nephew].

Mr. Benjamin Harrison, of Beskeley, [nephew].

Henry Harrison, [grand-nephew] son of the preceding, who has acted as confidential secretary of the president.

Dr. John Minge, of Charles city, Virginia, [nephew].

We may also add the name of Mrs. Findlay, of Ohio, who adopted Mrs. Jane Harrison as a daughter, and who almost invariably occupied the right hand of the president at his table.

The following are the surviving relations who were absent.

Mrs. Harrison, the general's bereaved wife.

John Scott Harrison, the only living son.

Mrs. Judge Short, eldest daughter.

Mr. J. O. Thornton, daughter.

Mrs. Taylor, daughter. All these are living at or near North Bend.

Mr. Taylor and his wife and family were expected to become members of the president's family for the residue of his term of service.

The following are the names of the deceased members of the family.

Lucy Harrison, a daughter, married Judge Este. J. C. S. Harrison, a son, married Miss Pike. Both dead.

William H. Harrison, jr. married Miss Jane Irwin. His widow presided at the president's table, and her personal graces have commended her to the affections of all who have had the pleasure to know her.

Dr. Benjamin Harrison, a son. Died the last summer.

Carter B. Harrison, a son, who was a lawyer of fine talents, and accompanied gen. Harrison to Columbia. Died two years ago. All of the sons left children. [Mediation.]

On the night of Thursday before last, general Harrison's death, he repeated the following verse from Isaiah to one of his relations, at his side, remarking that it had made an impression on his mind, which he had never been able to efface, nor fully to comprehend:

Isaiah 21 chap. 11 and 12, verses.
"He called to me out of Seir, watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night?"
"The watchman said, the night cometh, and also the night: if ye will tarry, inquire ye: return, come." [Ab.]

Among the many appropriate and touching announcements of our national bereavement, made in our churches on Sunday last, none could have been more so than that of the reverend rector of Christ church, Dr. John. He alluded most becomingly to general HARRISON's character as a Christian—to his having deviated from the usual and customary track of all former presidents in his inaugural address, in his acknowledging his belief in the religion of Jesus Christ, which, as a minister of the gospel, had particularly attracted his attention—of his habit of respectfully prostrating himself, and of strictly conforming to the services of the sanctuary while shipwreck—and that, since Divine Providence, by the mysterious workings of his omnipotence, (whether for weal or woe, he could not undertake to say), had on that day spoken to our whole country in tones sufficiently loud and deep, his pulpit should not be silent. He said, it not becoming in him to add any thing thereunto, and recommended his hearers to retire to their homes and in their prayers to commend our country, its rulers and its glorious constitution confidently to an all-wise Providence. No American could have left the church, be his politics what they may, without having been made to feel, if he did not before, the grievous loss we had sustained by the death of our illustrious chief magistrate. [Bell. Feb.]

Religious men feel so unusual degree of sympathy in the sudden demise of president Harrison. His religious character touches a sympathetic cord in their hearts. The Third Presbytery in New York, now in session, suspended its proceedings on Wednesday, and they determined to take a part in the solemn services of this day. The Protestant Episcopal church in New York also, is about to take the lead in adopting some appropriate religious exercise expressive of their grief in this national bereavement. It is expected a special day of communion and prayer will be kept apart, or they will act in conjunction with the arrangements made by the civil authorities. In some of the churches, the "prayer for a person under affliction," has been varied, so as to read a prayer for a people under affliction, and in Trinity church the reading of it melted the tears of many. We believe that Revelation gives to the death of a great man, when it knows he has sustained a religious character. [Phil. North Amer.]

One of the first duties devolving upon congress, at the coming session, will be to provide in a manner worthy of the occasion, for the national sympathy of general HARRISON. His life was sacrificed in the service of the country—the cares and anxieties of public business, from some of which he would shrink, having in all possibility accelerated his death. If he had known the sacrifice from the first, he was patient enough to have met it without swearing a step—for the consciousness that his name and service would unite the great reforming party in harmony for the achievement of the country's deliverance would have been indecently sufficient to impel him to any personal risk. As the action of congress on the subject will constitute a precedent for the future, we hope it will proceed upon a liberal and generous principle.

The following senators and representatives in congress, being present in the city, attended the funeral of the late president of the United States.

[Not. Ind.]

Senators. Mr. Tallmadge, of New York. Mr. Benton, of Missouri. Mr. Merrick, of Maryland. Mr. Prentiss, of Vermont. Mr. Walker, of Mississippi. Mr. Culbert of Georgia.

Representatives. Mr. Adams, of Massachusetts. Mr. Saltonstall, of Massachusetts. Mr. White, of Louisiana. Mr. Cubing, of Massachusetts. Mr. Carter, of Tennessee. Mr. Sherrod Williams, of Kentucky. Mr. Johnson, of Maryland. Mr. Peck, of New York. Mr. Kemble, of New York. Mr. Hall, of Vermont; also, Mr. Downing, delegate from Florida, and Mr. Doty, delegate from Wisconsin.

TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF GENERAL HARRISON BY STATE LEGISLATURES.

MARYLAND.
Proceedings of the general assembly of Maryland on the death of the president:

Annapolis, April 5th, 1841.

In the senate—The hon. Richard Potts, of Frederick, announced the death of president Harrison, in the following words:

MR. PRESIDENT: We have taken our usual place in this chamber, to-day, with feelings that unfit us for legislative action. An all-wise Providence has been prior to visit our country with an awful desolation in removing from a place of highest earthly honor, to that of far more excellent glory, the lately installed hero of our nation. It is one short month, only, since at the capital, we witnessed the imposing spectacle of the quinquennial inauguration of President, in the person of Mr. L. L. HARRISON, hallowed by invocations throughout the land, for the blessings of Heaven, upon the scene, which was there transacting.

Although far advanced in life, his constitution rendered by toil his country's service, and rendered his measures, from usage, and by habits of virtue and temperance, seemed to justify the assurance that a generous people had not tasked him beyond his strength, nor overcalculated his probable life. In the council of the Most High, however, there was other judgment in these matters. It was there determined, that this blow of heavy bereavement should fall upon our country, and at the close of a single month, his spirit should return to him who gave it, at an instant, and under circumstances which will not permit ourselves to doubt, has made him "immortal in both worlds."

Let us then, Mr. President, at once tender the assurance of our deepest sympathy, with the wounded spirits of his afflicted family, and the mourning tribes, wherever they may be, from his attached and severely stricken fellow citizens. This event is the first of its kind, in our history; let us indulge the hope, and offer the fervent prayer, that it may also be the last.

Immediately upon the conclusion of this address, the clerk of the house of delegates delivered a message proposing the appointment of a joint committee, to report "the proper mode of testifying the regret of the general assembly at the decease of the president."

Mr. Potts submitted a message in response, which was adopted. The joint committee on the part of the house of Messrs. Brent, E. A. Lynch, Causin, Bowie and Prestman, and on the part of the senate of Messrs. Potts, Howard, of Baltimore city, and Ritchie, proposed to the senate and house of delegates, respectively, the following preamble and resolutions, which were adopted, whereupon the general assembly adjourned.

WHEREAS, the general assembly of Maryland feel most united sorrow for the demise of WILLIAM H. HARRISON, president of the United States, and are over anxious to testify their respect for the memory of the illustrious dead: Therefore,

Be it unanimously resolved by the senate and house of delegates of the state of Maryland, That they sincerely condole with the nation at large for the affliction calamity with which it has pleased Providence to visit them, in the death of their much loved president.

And be it further unanimously resolved, That the chairs of the president of the senate and of the speaker of the house of delegates be shrouded in black, and that the members and officers wear crape on the left arm for sixty days.

And be it further unanimously resolved, That each branch of the legislature, accompanied by its respective officers, will proceed to the city of Washington, and attend the funeral of the late president, which it is understood, will take place on Wednesday next, and that the governor and secretary of state be hereto with the legislature.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to the governor by the clerk of the senate.

And be it further resolved, That the president of the senate and the speaker of the house of delegates, address a joint letter to the secretary of state, expressing a condolence of the disposition of the senate to unite in paying a tribute of respect to the memory of the late president as expressed in the above resolutions.

And be it further unanimously resolved, That the governor of the state of Maryland be requested to direct a copy of these resolutions to be transmitted to the respected Mrs. Harrison, assuring her of the profound respect this legislature will ever bear for her person and character, and of their deep sympathies in her late afflictive bereavement.

And be it further unanimously resolved, That both houses of the legislature do now adjourn.

In the house of delegates. Mr. Edward A. Lynch, of Frederick county, arose and addressed the chair: Mr. Speaker, While we are here, we are anxiously and laboriously engaged in promoting the interests of our own beloved state, and tidings of bereavement have been heard, and it becomes my painful duty to announce to you, and through you to this honorable house, that the great family of the union, without a head, in this present hour, is, whether, this nation without a ruler. The melancholy task devolves upon me of announcing the death of the chief magistrats of this confederacy, general

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON. Sir, if my lips had been touched with the prophet of old, would I have said, I might attempt a fitting eulogy of the character of the illustrious deceased; but speaking as I do with "uncircumcised lips," I have not the power to express, and oppressed as I am with painful emotions, I cannot commend the utterance of the benefit grief.

Yet, sir, I feel that the occasion demands some mention of his services, and that this house expects and will require some tribute to his memory.

Sir, gathered to his fathers, as you lauded proposed first, in the fulness of the year, and of his honors, which had filled up the measure of his own and of his country's glory, it would seem that at the moment when a grateful people had lifted him to the proudest elevation upon earth, Heaven had interposed the blood and carnage of a civil fought field, he won his early laurels in his boyhood. Disaster and defeat had attended all our Indian wars, until under the auspices of this gallant soldier, the red man was taught the efficiency of our soldiery.

And before he had time to breathe, he was hurled to battle by a sudden onset. Like the chivalrous Lancelot, his youth was devoted to the cause of humanity on the western frontier, and like the father of your country, his mature years were spent at the head of your armies, or in the calm retirement of domestic life. Engaged in the pursuit of a liberal profession, his sword had caught the sound of arms upon the frontiers of the great west, and the cries of suffering families exposed to Indian massacre, awakened all his sympathies. Discarding all private interests, he flew to the camp, and amidst blood and carnage, he met his fate in a fought field, he won his early laurels in his boyhood. Disaster and defeat had attended all our Indian wars, until under the auspices of this gallant soldier, the red man was taught the efficiency of our soldiery.

After having repelled the savage tribes from your border and protected your frontier from the tomahawk and scalping knife, he became the governor of that vast region which had been conquered by his prowess. Valiant in battle, he was equally firm at the council fires, where he negotiated common treaties which secured to us, upon equitable terms, an almost unlimited domain. And after his election to congress, by a single act, requiring the public lands to be sold in small parcels, he opened the forest and the early settlers. He gave to the vast resources of the wilderness. He placed within the reach of the poor man a home and a freehold. The tide of emigration poured its fullness upon these once inhospitable regions, and where but a few years before he had nothing but the cry of the rifle, and the yell of the savage, the oppressed of the sons of the children of men from every quarter of the globe, sought a refuge and an asylum. The forest fell before the axe of the frontiersman, and that axe, which has brought with it the civilization a larger field than ever paled beneath the sword of a Caesar or the sceptre of a Justianus. In this wild waste, within one generation, empires have sprung up as if under the potent influence of a magician's wand, and cities now stand the margin of those waters which had rolled their tributary streams into the bosom of the king of waters from the creation of the world.

At a later period of his life, when our arms had been dishonored and the nation filled with shame and sorrow by the surrender of the city of Maysville to the enemy, he was called upon to lead the northern column, the hopes of the country were fixed upon him, and in a few short years he won back the trophies which had been lost, and added fresh laurels to the wreath which had already encircled his brow. The spirit of the nation was infused into the bosoms of those who surrounded him, and a Croghan, a Johnson, and a Selby caught and reflected the high beams of glory which emanated from the commander-in-chief of this army of heroes. Yes, sir, another illustrious battle of Canas, and Thyrasene, he was called upon to retrieve the losses of more inexperienced leaders. And under all exigencies, in every emergency, he has fulfilled his high destiny.

After years of retirement he has of late been called, like other Cincinnati, and like your own immortal Washington, whose severe virtues he so well imitated, from the plough to the first dignity of the republic.

But to the hero and the statesman he super added the ornaments of the scholar; and the lighter tones of the bay were intermingled with the darker hues of the laurel. He delighted to tread that classic land which had been consecrated to perpetual fame by the stern virtues of the patriots, heretofore, and to see the succeeding generations still propose as models.

To this department of literature he directed much of his attention, not for the indulgence of literary curiosity or for purposes of display, but because he could not elsewhere find higher examples of generous self-devotion and pure patriotism, than among the Greeks and Latins. Like the Iliac priests of old, who sought amid the ashes of their altars some divination of coming events, he looked among the ruins and ruins of the past, for light to guide him through the future.

Mr. Speaker, virtues like his cast the odour of their sanctity around him, wherever he went in his earthly pilgrimage; and that ardent love of liberty which animated him in the land of his nativity, was equally displayed in distant climes. While prosecuting our commerce and commerce of Columbia, he became missionary of Anglo Saxon freedom to the descendants of the proud Castilian in the new world, and by precept and example subdued the ambition of the liberator Bolivar, who meditated the usurpation of absolute power. But sir, he so faithfully depicted the great wrong which was smitten by celestial fire among those ancient people, whose virtues he so much admired, he has been consecrated in the heart and affections of his countrymen by the suddenness and severity of the blow by which he has fallen.

Mr. Speaker, our own beautiful institutions, like the temple of the children of Israel, were erected amid the dangers and confusion of battle, and with sword in hand, by generations of patriots; and it is for this reason perhaps that our people delight so much to honor those who, to the qualities of a statesman superadd those of military greatness. So we let cherish the memory of our dead. When we cease to reverence the glorious and the pure forgetful of the benefactors of the nation, the period will have arrived when the historian will commence the narrative of the decline and fall of our republic.

All that remains of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON the city cold tancment from which the spirit hath departed forever; and, sir, when he shall have been gathered to the receptacle of things which have been and are not, "goodness and greatness, and he, will fill one monument."

Mr. Howard, in response, on seconding the resolutions offered by Mr. Brent, made some very affecting and appropriate remarks.

VIRGINIA.

The following are the proceedings adopted by the executive of Virginia:

Executive department, April 5, 1841.

"The executive having received the melancholy intelligence of the death of William Henry Harrison, late president of the United States, and deeming it proper that measures should be adopted to pay all due honor to his memory, and to manifest a deep sense of the calamity which has befallen the people of the American people of their chief magistrate—it is therefore ordered

"1st. That the Guard-house bell be tolled during the day, and that the flag of the United States be displayed at the capital and at the state army, at half mast.

"2nd. That one hundred guns be fired on the capitol square in the course of the day, at equal intervals of time commencing at sunrise and ending at sunset.

"3rd. That the principal entrances of the capitol be hung with mourning drapery.

"4th. That the members of the executive will wear crape for thirty days, and that it be recommended to all the executive officers of the government to wear the same badge for the same period.

"That the executive will unite with their fellow citizens in whatever further demonstrations of respect for our distinguished fellow citizen and chief magistrate, they may deem proper to make."

"Captain Richardson, of the public guard, is charged with the execution of the first and third of the orders, and the duty required by the second, is assigned to captain Hyde of the Richmond Payette artillery."

In consequence of the above order from the executive the bell tolled during the day, and one hundred guns were fired from the square. The capitol was hung in mourning. [Richmond Exp.]

PENNSYLVANIA.

To the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Intelligence has been received that WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, president of the United States, has paid the debt of nature. He departed this life at the president's house in the city of Washington on yesterday morning.

The public reveres and prize worth of the distinguished citizen who had just been elevated to the highest station in the republic, call upon the general assembly of this commonwealth, on behalf of our common constituents, for the appropriate tes-monials of public feeling which are inspired by the melancholy event.

DAVID R. PORTER.

Executive chamber, April 5, 1841.

When the movers were met, Mr. Reed rose and addressed the chair as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: The senate no doubt anticipates the object of the motion I am about to make. It is to place among its archives the recorded expression of the deep sorrow with which the intelligence of the death of the president of the United States has been received amongst us. A long life of public service has been suddenly terminated, and at the outset of a new career, which every American patriot hoped would be a career of usefulness the power to render further and greater services has been arrested, and the mysterious dispensations of Providence have interposed to disappoint the nation's hopes. At three dispensations we must not repine. Under this dispensation we should not mourn. But it is entirely consistent with submission, to testify our respect for the memory of the dead—our sincere sympathy with the sorrows of the living. The public services of gen. HARRISON are new part of the unquestioned history of the country. They are placed by the hand of death beyond all party controversy which might exaggerate or depreciate them—and to his virtues a grateful people may now without dissenting assent give tribute. He was a long—an active—and an honored life. He lived without reproach. He died without an enemy to speak a word of invidiousness or disparagement over his grave.

Fifty years ago, the president of the United States passed through the village where we are now sitting, on his way to his first campaign. The ancient building where the young soldiers then lodged, is yet standing. At that period the institutions of our country were in their infancy, and the certain—their efficacy untried. He has lived to see those institutions survive their hours of trial, and in those hours of trial he always stood faithfully by them. He has lived to receive the highest honors of his country; but no house did he ever in life receive more worthy of his virtues than that spontaneous tribute which, now that he has neither power nor patronage to bestow, the whole people pay to his memory.

Mr. Reed then submitted the following resolutions, which, after a few appropriate remarks by Mr. Brown, were unanimously agreed to.

Resolved, That the senate of Pennsylvania, having been informed of the death of the president of the United States, considers it a duty to the memory of the dead, his public services, unsullied character, and the station which he occupied, and to the deep sorrow which will pervade the nation, to express the mournful sentiment with which the intelligence has been received.

Resolved, That a committee of four senators be appointed, to act with a committee of the house, should the house appoint such committee, to report what measures should be adopted to testify the sense of the legislature on this mournful occasion; and that the message received this morning from the executive be received to the committee.

Resolved, That the senate do now adjourn. The speaker named Messrs. Reed, Brown, Pearson and Gibbons, as the committee, and the senate adjourned.

In the house of representatives, when called to order, the message (given in the senate report) was presented, after which Mr. Law rose and addressed the chair as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: The event just announced in the communication from the executive, is one of the most solemn nature that has ever fallen under the consideration of the house. It is an event unprecedented in the history of our country. Other presidents have paid the debt of nature, but it was after their career of usefulness had terminated. We have now announced to us, for the first time, the death of one, who, as we all hoped, was about to set out on a career of glory and of usefulness. Sir, it is an event which appeals to the sympathies of all of us, and before which all party considerations sink and dissolve into insignificance. It is an occasion on which all of us feel only as American citizens, and not as members of this sect or that party, but as common children of our common country. Over the grave of departed excellence, envy, ambition, the prejudices of party, the feelings of religious and the animosities of faction, are hushed into silence, and leave us time to look back upon a long life of misdeeds.

This is not the time or the place to speak of the late president as he deserves. Sir, I do not mean to enter upon his eulogy. I believe we all unite in the most profound regard for his virtues. As a brave soldier—as an enlightened statesman—as an upright honest man, he is entitled to the admiration of this age, as he will obtain that of posterity. I hope the house on the present occasion will adopt without delay, some mode of testifying their respect for this illustrious man. There can be no doubt in regard to the present occasion. It is the offspring of truth, and it comes in such a shape that it cannot be questioned. It demands the immediate action of the house.

Mr. Lusk, of Susquehanna, then submitted the following preamble and resolution, which were unanimously adopted.

Whereas the melancholy information has reached this body by official announcement that an all-wise Providence has suddenly removed from this life, WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, president of the United States. And whereas, the members of this house feeling deeply impressed with the solemnity of this unexpected and painful intelligence, as a testimonial of suitable respect for the memory of the illustrious deceased, be it

Resolved, That a committee of four be appointed to act in conjunction with a similar committee of the senate (should the senate appoint such committee) to report what further measures should be adopted to signify the sense of this legislature under so afflicting a bereavement, and that this house do now adjourn.

The speaker named Messrs. Lusk, Smyser, Flenniken and Cox, the committee, when the house adjourned.

The joint committee, appointed to report the order to be observed in relation to the death and funeral of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, late president of the United States, made report:—That a committee, to consist of four senator and six representatives, proceed to Washington for the purpose of attending the funeral of the late president, in behalf of the people of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania; that Thomas Harrison, president of the United States, proceed to deliver an eulogy upon the character and public services of general Harrison, on Saturday, the 17th inst. in the hall of the house of representatives; that the members of both houses wear the usual badge of mourning; that the remainder of the session; and that the governor be requested to forward a copy of the proceedings to the family of the president.

The joint committee, consisting of Messrs. Pearson, Kinsbury, Stron and Healdy, of the senate, and Messrs. Cox, Broadhead, of Northampton, Smyser, Lusk, Christmas and Hill, of the house, proceeded to Washington and attended the funeral of the president.

All the bells in Harrisonburg were tolled on the 8th, as a manifestation of the sorrow felt by the citizens, without regard to party distinction.

NEW YORK.
Legislative honor to the cause of the late president.
The legislature of the state convened on Tuesday at 9 o'clock, A. M. to receive the official announcement of the national bereavement, and shortly after the prayer had been pronounced in the senate, a message was received from the governor, communicating in appropriate terms, the mournful intelligence. A similar message was received by the assembly. In the senate, Mr. Taylor responded, in touching and eloquent language, to the melancholy announcement. In a house, Mr. Hoffman presented the same sorrowful duty.

The following concurrent resolution was unanimously adopted in both branches of the legislature. Resolved, That the message of his excellency, the governor, communicating intelligence of the lamented death of William Henry Harrison, president of the United States, be referred to a joint committee, to consist of 3 members of the senate, and 5 members of the assembly, to take such measures as they may deem proper.

The two houses adjourned immediately after the passage of the above resolution, to meet at 10 o'clock, on the following morning.

The adjutant general of the state of New York has issued an order from the commander-in-chief of that state, that the usual badge of mourning be worn by all the commissioned officers of the state, as a manifestation of respect for the memory of the late president of the United States. He also directed that the flag be lowered by all the military posts of the state from sunrise to sunset on the day after the reception of the order.

BY THE CITY OF NEW YORK.
The New York Courier & Enquirer of Tuesday, says: "I will be very glad to see the resolutions, proposed as they were, politically, to the late president, have done themselves honor in promptly responding to the general feelings of the people, without regard to party."

The following is the message of the acting mayor of New York, (Mr. Varian, the mayor, being sick.)

Mayor's office, April 5, 1841.
Gentlemen: It becomes my painful duty to announce to you the melancholy intelligence of the death of gen. WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, president of the United States—an event, sudden, solemn and afflicting to the nation. Of his services, civil and military, it is unnecessary for me to speak—they are identified with the history of our country.

I should do injustice to my own feelings, and to the station I temporarily fill, were I not to partake of the general grief that pervades the community, which mourns the loss of a chief magistrate, recently called from peace and retirement to preside over a nation of freemen.

I respectfully suggest that such measures be taken as will evince the respect and affection due to one who has occupied so exalted a station, and shared so largely in the public confidence.

I am, gentlemen, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
ELIJAH F. PURDY, acting mayor.

As there was not sufficient time to make the necessary preparations by Wednesday, the public procession was postponed until Saturday.

The Express of Wednesday, 3, P. M. has the following paragraph:

"At we go to press, solemnity reigns in our midst. We hear the solemn notes of the funeral bell and the deep toned roar of the minute guns, which come booming over our city. The flags upon our shipping are at half mast, and the bells are rung every place in the city. Nearly all the stores are closed, and more than the silence of the Sabbath reigns around us. Our places of public amusement will be closed to-night, and the remainder of the day devoted to a general reflection upon the nation's loss. May God, in his wisdom, bless the land he has afflicted, in the dispensation of his Providence."

The New York Historical society have resolved to wear the usual badge of mourning, and the president of the society has ordered the members to wear an eulogium on the death of gen. Harrison on some day to be fixed hereafter.

The students of Columbia college also resolved to wear the customary mourning for the late president.

A similar resolution was adopted by the N. York chamber of commerce.

On Wednesday, being the day set apart for the funeral solemnities of the late president, the stock exchange boards of both Philadelphia and New York decided it improper to do business, and immediately adjourned.

New York and Brooklyn cities. At a meeting on Tuesday of the joint committee of the common council of the city of New York and Brooklyn on the occasion of the decease of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, late president of the United States, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, it is announced that the funeral of the late president of the United States will take place on Wednesday, the 7th instant, at 12 o'clock at noon. It is resolved, by the joint committees of the common council of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, that our fellow citizens of said cities are requested to close their stores and places of business to-morrow, from the hour of 12 at noon until sunset, and also all places of public amusement to the respective cities to-morrow; that the bells of the several churches and the fire alarm bells in the two cities, be tolled from noon till 2 o'clock, P. M. and that 68 minute guns (being the number of years of the late president's life) be fired in honor of him; and also from such places in the city of Brooklyn as the committee know that city may designate—that the owners and masters of vessels in the harbor, and the proprietors of all public places in said cities, be requested to display their flags at half mast during the whole day, and that our fellow citizens are requested to wear the usual badge of mourning for sixty days: *

Resolved, That the common councils of the cities of New York and Brooklyn will solemnize the death of the late president of the United States by a civic and military procession, to be composed of the military and different societies and citizens of our respective cities—and that such procession take place on Saturday next.

Resolved, That the different societies, trades and associations, and fire departments of our cities, are requested to send delegates to meet a committee of this body on Thursday next, at 12 o'clock, at the common council chamber, to make the necessary arrangements to occur on the day of the procession, the common council in an appropriate manner.

Resolved, That the army and navy of the United States on this station, are requested to co-operate with us in making the necessary arrangements, and that they are requested to send officers to represent them at the meeting to be held at the common council chamber, Thursday at 12 o'clock.

ELIAS L. SMITH, chairman.
JOHN A. UNDERWOOD, secretary.

On Saturday the funeral obsequies of president B. H. H. took place at the city of New York. All business was suspended, and all places of business closed. A procession was formed, comprising all the civil associations of the city, the teachers and pupils of the public schools and seminaries of learning, the various benevolent societies, the officers of the state and city governments, and of the courts, &c. &c.

Nine regiments of infantry and cavalry, with banners and uniforms trimmed with mourning emblems, constituted the military part of the procession. The ex-president of the United States, the governor, lieutenant governor, senate and house of assembly of New York, the society of Cincinnati, gen. Scott, commodore Renshaw and other officers of the army and navy, members of congress, clergymen, and civilians, had appropriate places allotted to them.

The conclusion of these imposing ceremonies, at which many thousands were present, was as follows: prayer by the rev. Dr. Cox, of the city of Brooklyn; funeral oration by the hon. Frederick Frelichshuyzen, chancellor of the university of the city of New York; a requiem written by general George P. Morris; and a benediction by the right rev. bishop Onderdonk—the ceremonies to conclude with the firing of a volley by the U. States troops on duty.

Protestant Episcopal church.—The N. York 'American' of Tuesday afternoon says—We are happy to learn from an official source, that the Protestant Episcopal church in this state is taking the lead in appropriate religious services expressive of the sense of national bereavement, in the death of the supreme executive of the nation. The first affliction of the kind that has befallen us since we have been a nation.

The following is the pastoral letter of bishop Onderdonk, appointing Friday the 23d inst. a day of humiliation and prayer, to be observed in the Episcopal church in the state of New York, in token of reverential submission to the chastening and which has fallen so heavily on the nation, in the death of its chief magistrate.

To the clergy and laity of the diocese of New York.
Brethren: The mournful dispensation of Divine Providence, hitherto without precedent, which has deprived our country by death of its chief magistrate, and its trust, failed to produce in our hearts impressions of a deeply solemn nature. The more whose faith embraces the wise ordering, in all things, of the High and Mighty Ruler of the universe, an event of such moment to a nation cannot, consistently with the dictates of sound reason, be referred to as without leading to reflections on the most serious kind. Nor can we, as Christians, regard any impressions resulting from it, as at all adequate to the demands of our religion, which do not embrace a full recognition of the hand of God therein visible, and a deep conviction, in a spirit of the true faith and devotion of the people, have it overruled to the best interests of our beloved country, and to the spiritual and eternal welfare of its citizens. Therefore, brethren, I affectionately commend the mournful subject to your heartfelt religious consideration. Ponder it well as a dispensation of Divine Providence, which, rightly received, may be availed to be, by His blessing, fruitful of good; but neglected, or lightly treated, or profanely used, may increase our personal and national guilt and punishment. Let, therefore, we wish to consider your way, as individuals, as members of the church, and as citizens of the commonwealth. Let it lead you to increased prayer that God would open the hearts of all orders of men among us to a sense of the responsibility which we are laid under in every department of duty and obligation which may rest upon them; and a personal realizing, each one for himself, of the solemn suddenness with which the call may come to the great account, and the all-mighty power of Him "unto whom all hearts are open, all desires are known, and no secrets are hid." Nor let me forget to commend to your affectionate intercessions with that Merciful God and Heavenly Father, who has taught us in His holy word that He does not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men, and from whose hand the venerated individual for whose loss our nation mourns.

In the humble hope of contributing, by the Divine blessing, to our upholding and receiving this unequalled dispensation, and to the promotion of both public and personal improvement, that the diocese should observe on occasion of it, a solemn day of humiliation and prayer. Appropriate services will be seasonably set forth for its observance, and my revered brethren the clergy are affectionately requested to endeavor, and from whose help to direct their several portions of the flock committed to our charge, to such a practical religious view of the occasion as befit its high and solemn import.

The day which I recommend for this purpose, is Friday, the 23d of the present month of April, unless some other day should be appointed for similar observance by the civil authority; in which event, the laity will sin substituted.

Selecting the station of your prayers with mine that this and all our doings may be blessed to the advancement of God's glory, the good of His church, the welfare of the nation, and the spiritual and eternal benefit of its citizens, I remain, dear brethren, your affectionate director.

BENJ. T. ONDERDONK,
Bishop of the diocese of New York.
New York, April 6, 1841.

Third Presbytery. The subjoined proceedings of the Third Presbytery of New York in reference to the death of the late president WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, have been handed us for publication. The feelings manifested in these proceedings and the course recommended to the churches, we know, will meet the hearty approbation of the people.

At the stated meeting of the Third Presbytery of New York, April 7th, 1841, the committee to whom was referred the consideration of the course proper to be pursued by this Presbytery, in view of the death of the chief magistrate of the United States, and the recommendation of the consideration of the city of New York, made a report which was adopted and is as follows, viz:

"Resolved, 1. That this Presbytery deeply sympathize with their fellow citizens in the recent afflictive dispensation of Divine Providence in the unexpected removal, by death, of William Henry Harrison, the president of the United States, which event occurred on the 4th of April, at about one o'clock, A. M.

"2. That this Presbytery distinctly recognize the hand of God in this solemn Providence, by which He emphatically teaches us that He is the ruler among the nations, and giveth the kingdom to whomsoever He pleases. Whilst at the same time they are constrained to regard this event as a marked rebuke, in view of which of our national sins, we are called upon as a people to humble ourselves before God.

"3. Having received intelligence that the public authorities of this state have requested that, as a token of respect for the deceased, all ordinary business be suspended on and after 12 o'clock that day, therefore resolved, That this Presbytery will adjourn their regular sessions at 12 o'clock until 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

"4. Having also received information that the council of this city have designated Saturday of this week for special services in reference to the death of the president of the United States, therefore resolved, That this Presbytery will cordially accede to the recommendations made by the civil authorities, and will be so united in our efforts in any expressions of humiliation which may be recommended by the authorities of the NATIONAL GOVERNMENT.

"5. That it be recommended to the respective pastors of the churches under our care to make an improvement of this solemn dispensation on the next Sabbath, in such manner as to them may appear proper."

A true extract from the minutes.

EDWIN F. HATFIELD, stated clerk.

AT THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA.
There was a general suspension of business in Philadelphia on Wednesday. The U. S. Gazette says:

The window shutters of the dwelling houses in this city were bowed, as it is customary when there has been a recent death in the family. At an early hour, the stores and places of business were closed, and the doors hung with grape, and at many of the hotels and large stores black drapery was fastened on the windows and doors. At the navy yard, a national salute of twenty-six guns was fired—first a single gun being at twelve o'clock, noon, and continuing at intervals of one minute. The bells of the churches and that of the state house were muffled and tolled, and people passed in the street with an appearance of gloom, as if each had lost a relative or a personal friend.

All feeling of party was merged in the sense of the national calamity, and it was a sublime spectacle to behold the thousands of people gathering together to pay a tribute of respect to the illustrious dead. The meeting at the state house yard was conducted in solemn silence, and as the impressive words of the speaker fell upon the ear, no voice was heard, but the effect might be seen in the countenances of all.

We learn that the third presbytery of Philadelphia was now in session in this city, resolved to suspend the regular business of that body between the hours of twelve and one to-day, (7th inst.) in consequence of the funeral of the late president, gen. HARRISON, and to spend the time in religious exercises.

The Pennsylvania says:
We understand that on Tuesday next, a disconcert in reference to the melancholy event which so painfully affects the American people, will be delivered at Christ church, by bishop Onderdonk.

At a public meeting of the citizens of Philadelphia, over which the mayor presided, appropriate resolutions of regret at the death of the president of the United States were adopted, and a committee appointed to co-operate with the committees of the councils of that city and of the several contiguous corporations in making arrangements to express the sense of the community on the loss the nation has sustained. The meeting was addressed by the hon. John Sergeant and J. K. Kane, &c.

The commissioners of the township of Moyamensing adopted resolutions of regret at the death of the chief magistrate of the union, and determined to participate in the ceremonies about to be performed by the inhabitants of the city and county of Philadelphia.

Similar resolutions were adopted by the commissioners of the Northern Liberties.

The annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, meeting at New York, on Wednesday adopted a resolution expressive of their sense of the national affliction, and immediately adjourned.

The class of the medical institute of Philadelphia resolved to wear mourning, and suspended the duties of the institute on Thursday.

BY THE CITY OF BOSTON.
On receipt of the melancholy news of yesterday, the collector of this port issued the following:

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS.
Port of Boston and Charlestown, April 6, 1841.

It having pleased Almighty God, to remove the president of the United States, by death, and in this sudden and impressive act of his inscrutable Providence, to fill the nation with sorrow and mourning, it will be the spontaneous dictate of his heart to give utterance to the feelings which it is oppressed by the event; and to testify the sentiments of respect and affection, in which his memory will be cherished by a people, just to his character, and grateful for his eminent public services.

To give to the outward manifestations of mourning appropriate to the occasion, a becoming uniformity of expression, I recommend to masters of merchant vessels, within the port of Boston and Charlestown, to wear mourning, and to keep at half mast, their flags through the day to-morrow.

Capt. Sturgis, of the revenue cutter, will fire minute guns, at 12 o'clock, for one hour, with his colors at half mast, in solemn and melancholy recognition of the loss, which the country has so great an occasion to deplore.

LEVI LINCOLN, collector.
In compliance with the above, the flags of the shipping in the harbor were hung at half mast, and minute guns were fired from the cutter.

The April term of the court of common pleas commenced in this city yesterday morning, chief justice Williams presiding.

At the opening of the court, S. D. Parker, esq., rose and remarked that in consequence of the melancholy event which the bells were even now announcing, it was not deemed that a proper tribute of respect to the memory of the chief magistrate of this union, that the court should adjourn for a day, as those of Philadelphia and New York had done.

AT THE CITY OF BATHONE.
The meeting called together by the citizens of Baltimore on the 12th inst. for the purpose of manifesting their deep concern and sympathy for the great bereavement which our country and his family have sustained in the death of late president, WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, was unusually attended, and the spacious hall was being filled to overflowing, notwithstanding the prevalence of a furious northerly storm.

The vast assemblage was called to order by Col. Samuel O'Donnell, esq., who nominated Col. Samuel Moore, to act as president of the meeting, and the nomination was unanimously concurred in. On his nomination the chair, Col. Samuel Moore appropriately remarked in reference to the mournful dispensation of Providence which had deprived the country of its venerable chief magistrate, and the duty which now devolved upon the citizens of Baltimore, as a people, to manifest a most solemn and public manner, their sense of the public services and private virtues of the illustrious deceased.

On motion, Robert Gilmer, esq., and Col. Solomon Hildreth, were unanimously appointed vice presidents, and Samuel T. Thompson and William H. Cole, Jr., secretaries.

On motion of Z. Collins Lee, esq. it was resolved unanimously that a committee, consisting of one from each ward, be appointed to retire and draft resolutions expressive of the feelings of the citizens of Baltimore for the melancholy bereavement sustained by the death of the late illustrious president.—Whereupon the chair appointed the following gentlemen to compose the committee:—1st Ward, capt. James Frazier; 2nd do. capt. William H. Watson; 3d do. capt. Richard Lilly; 4th do. gen. S. C. Lea; 5th do. Isaac M. Denison; 6th do. Wm. G. Bellingham; 7th do. Robert M. Welch; 8th do. gen. C. O'Donnell; 9th do. col. Samuel Lucas; 10th do. Daniel A. Piper; 11th do. Z. Collins Lee, chairman; 12th do. Levi Fahnestock; 13th do. Wm. P. Stewart; 14th do. Henry Snider.

The committee then retired, and on its return to the meeting, the chairman, Mr. Lee, read the following preamble and resolutions, prefacing them with a few brief and eloquent remarks. They were unanimously adopted.

Whereas, the people of Baltimore, participating deeply to the general sorrow which the death of their late beloved and lamented chief magistrate, Wm. H. Harrison, has produced—have assembled in town meeting this day to express their keen sense of the bereavement the country has sustained, at a time when the sage experience, tried patriotism, and unselfish virtues of the illustrious deceased were most needed to conduct the administration of public affairs. And also to adopt such measures as are proper for the expression of their feelings at this mournful event—therefore

Resolved, That as the long life of our late honored and venerated president has been distinguished by the most signal services to his country, the field of battle, and the public councils, a period which "tried men's souls" and his career in private life, illustrated by the exercise of the kindest affections and purest principles of the heart—we now realize more truly his loss, for independent of all official rank and worldly honor, he will be remembered as a good man, whose bosom overflowed with benevolence and charity, and from whose bright example, future generations may derive instruction and encouragement.

Resolved, That after a faithful devotion to his country, in many arduous military and civil capacities, we behold him called by the voice of that country, to preside over her destinies and witnessed the spontaneous and heartfelt applause, which beamed him to that exalted station—as so earnest of the attachment and respect of all classes of the people to his character and person.

Resolved, That but one short month had elapsed since that elevation—alas! too brief; but long enough for his own glory and rewards, already complete and consecrated by a nation's highest honors—when, by an all-wise and inscrutable Providence, he is snatched from the affections of a whole people, and the hearts of a returning circle of kindred to receive yet higher honors and more imperishable glory, among the band of patriots, and saviors of our land, who, like him, having been first in war and first in peace, will ever remain first in the hearts of their countrymen.

Resolved, That we most sincerely condole with the bereaved widow and afflicted family, who now deplore the death of a husband, father, benefactor and friend, and whose tears are mingling in the cup of a nation's grief.

Resolved, That in testimony of our regard for the illustrious dead, the citizens of Baltimore, and the state of Maryland, be requested to wear the usual badge of mourning for ninety days; and that in this office, the ladies of our city and state be also requested to unite.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed by the chair, consisting of two from each ward, to prepare the programme of a public civic and military procession—bearing all the insignia of mourning, and commemorative of the death of gen. Wm. H. Harrison; and to invite all societies and other bodies who may desire to unite in this solemn ceremony; and that the procession and funeral ceremonies shall take place on Monday, 20th inst.

Resolved, That a copy of these proceedings be enclosed to the family of the late president of the United States, accompanied by a letter from the committee expressive of the feeling of condolence and sorrow which the citizens of Baltimore and state of Maryland entertain on the occasion, of this their melancholy bereavement and affliction.

On motion it was

Resolved, That the committee who reported the resolutions and the officers of this meeting, co-operate with the committee appointed to make arrangements, and that the president of this meeting act as chairman of the committee of arrangements.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in all the papers of the city and state.

BY THE CITY OF CINCINNATI.

The news of the death of president HARRISON reached Cincinnati on the 8th, and forthwith business was generally suspended in the city by common consent. In addition to the large spontaneous meeting of the citizens on Third street, a special meeting of the city council was held in the afternoon. In the evening, the theatre and other places of amusement were closed, and the whole city seemed to be absorbed in the most unaffected grief.

From the Cincinnati Republican, April 8.

Meeting of the people. An immense meeting assembled yesterday afternoon, to do honor to the dead. Public notice was given, calling upon the citizens to assemble in front of the Heurich house, at 3 P. M. for the purpose of testifying their respect to the memory of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, Judge Burnett was called to the chair, and J. C. Vaughan appointed secretary. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God to remove, by death, our neighbor and friend, WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, the chief magistrate of the nation, a great and good man, whose whole life has been devoted to the service of the country; therefore,

Be it resolved by the citizens of Cincinnati, in solemn meeting held, That in testimony of our respect for his memory, we suspend all business on tomorrow, and observe it as a day consecrated to the remembrance of the lamented dead.

Resolved, That the mayor of the city be requested to issue a proclamation in accordance with the foregoing resolution.

Resolved, That we unite in tendering to the bereaved family of our illustrious chief, the expression of our deepest sympathy in the melancholy dispensation of Providence, which has taken from them the venerable and beloved head, who was endeared to them and his fellow citizens by his social virtues, his benevolent nature, and the sterling manliness of his heart and character.

On motion, it was further Resolved, That a committee of twenty-six be appointed to co-operate with any committee of the city council, as to any further proceedings on the subject.

Resolved, That the chairman of this meeting, Judge Burnett, be one of that committee, and J. C. Vaughan act as secretary.

On motion, the meeting adjourned.

JACOB BURNETT, chairman.

John C. Vaughan, secretary.

BY THE CITY OF COLUMBUS.

In pursuance of a notice given by a number of the citizens of Columbus, a meeting was held at the state house in said city, at 7 o'clock, on the evening of the 7th inst. for the purpose of testifying their deep regret at the death of the president of the United States; to offer their condolence to his afflicted family, and to deplore the loss the country has sustained by the decease of one of the most illustrious of its statesmen and patriots.

Alfred Kelley was called upon to preside at the meeting, and Joseph Bidgway, sen. and Noah H. Swayze, were appointed vice presidents. John Sloane and A. S. Chew were appointed secretaries.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, a committee of three members was appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the sense of this meeting. Whereupon, Wm. B. Hubbard, Dr. Robert T. Townsend, and John Sloane were appointed said committee.

With the committee were absent, the hon. Jas. T. Morehead, United States senator from Kentucky, addressed the meeting.

The committee appointed to draft resolutions reported the following, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That, with feelings of deep and heartfelt grief, we have heard of the death of our beloved and esteemed fellow citizen, gen. Wm. HENRY HARRISON, late president of the United States.

Resolved, That we sincerely condole with the widow and relatives of the deceased in this rude and afflicting dispensation of an inscrutable but all-wise Providence, which has caused a whole people to mourn.

Resolved, That while we view the death of president HARRISON as a great national calamity, we have reason to be thankful to the Almighty Disposer of events that his life was spared until the peerage with our United States and expressed their gratitude for his services, and the confidence in his integrity and patriotism; until he had been enabled to prove by his official acts the sincerity of his professions; and until he had been permitted to point out, and commence the course leading to the restoration of the vital principles of the constitution, and to national prosperity.

Resolved, That though we deeply deplore the loss of the patriot and statesman whom the American people had chosen as their president—while veneration for his character and memory, as well as love for our country, equally demand of us to assist in carrying out the great principles which he had prescribed as the basis of his administration—still we feel entire reliance in the virtue, ability and patriotism of the distinguished individual on whom the administration of the government is now, by the constitution, devolved; and that in the character of the vice president of our country has a pure guaranty for the faithful and constitutional administration of the government during his term of office.

Resolved, That as a testimony of the high regard which the members of this meeting entertain for the character of the deceased, and of the sincere grief which they feel for his loss, they will each wear a badge on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That copies of the foregoing resolutions be sent to the widow of the late gen. HARRISON, to the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, to the acting president of the senate, to each of the heads of departments, and be published in the newspapers of this city.

On motion of Mr. Lizzell, it was Resolved, That the different clergymen of this city be requested, on an early Sabbath, to deliver a funeral sermon on the subject of the death of the president of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Ware, it was

Resolved, That a committee of six members be appointed to select a suitable person to deliver at the capitol a funeral eulogy on the character of general HARRISON, at such time as they may appoint.

JOHN McELVIN, Dr. N. M. Miller, Wm. Neill, N. H. Swayne, Joseph Ridgway, sen. and Robert Ware, were appointed this committee. The meeting then adjourned.

ALFRED KELLEY, president.

BY THE PUBLIC PRESS.

The public mind has been agitated by a few exceptions—sympathizes with the people under the heavy dispensation with which it has pleased God to afflict the nation, and we have a melancholy satisfaction in transferring to our columns the evidences of a common sorrow.

From the Globe.

All other reflections are absorbed in the thought of the nothingness of life, and the emptiness of earthly grandeur. One brief moment has witnessed gen. Harrison's ascent to the summit of human ambition—and his passage to the tomb. "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue."

From the Albany Argus.

The death of president Harrison. We announced to our readers in an extra this morning, the event which has shrouded all classes and parties in mourning; and we anticipate our publication of to-morrow, for the purpose of adding such particulars from the various newspaper publications, and the proceedings of the legislature, as the event has called forth.

Towards the distinguished individual who has been thus suddenly removed from the high station to which he had attained, we feel that we stand at the threshold of his administration, every feeling of political hostility is buried in the depth and solemnity of the tread of death.

From the Albany Evening Journal.

The president's death. The most painful apprehensions of yesterday are realized. President Harrison is no more. The shadow of death has passed over the glory and gladness of the nation. The hopes of an exulting people are crushed by the inexorable decree of an overruling Providence. The hand of the Almighty chaster has been made visible to all eyes.

His sudden and untimely death, rebuked in the presence of his dark messenger—death. We shall attempt no eulogy upon the departed. The virtues and services of his life praise him. The sympathies of a grateful people that joyously thronged around his funeral stand hand in hand with him. Ambition may envy such a death. Without a stain upon the purity of his public or private fame, he passes to an immortality where temptation, sin and error cannot reach him. Our regrets at this national bereavement are all for the living. To them we dedicate our sympathy—with them we mourn this irreparable loss.

Reform. The Pittsburgh Gazette of April 3, contains the following:

We publish the following for general information. About one thousand dollars a year was, we believe, paid to an individual who held an office which is now declared to be entirely unnecessary.

War department, March 29th, 1841.

SIR: As you have applied for the appointment of military storekeeper in the quarter master's department at Pittsburgh, I deem it proper to inform you that finding the office to be entirely unnecessary, and as a just regard to the public interests requiring its discontinuance, it has been abolished. Very respectfully your obedient servant,

JOHN BELL.

Samuel Hubley, Pitt.burgh, Pa.

MR. CUTHBERT AND MR. WEBSTER. The Globe publishes the following notes which have recently passed between MR. CUTHBERT of the U. S. senate and MR. WEBSTER, secretary of state.

Mr. Cuthbert to Mr. Webster.

March 6, 1841.

SIR: Your friends have declared that you would promptly reply to the inquiry I am now proposing to you, and have invited to its being made. I ask you, then, respectfully, whether in your opinion congress has any authority under the constitution of the United States to prohibit the transfer of slaves from one state to another. As your nomination to the cabinet has been decided upon by the senate, there can be now no indecision in making the inquiry. Your obedient servant,

A. CUTHBERT.

Hon. Daniel Webster.

Up to the 13th March, Mr. Cuthbert had received no answer to this communication. He then addressed to Mr. Webster a note, of which a copy was taken, but which had been nearly in the following words:

Mr. Cuthbert's compliments to Mr. Webster. Mr. C. has received no answer to the written communication which he addressed to Mr. W. on the 6th inst. Mr. W. supposes that his communication may have miscarried, and he therefore directs the bearer of this to know that it is placed in Mr. Webster's hands.

March 16, 1841.

Mr. Webster to Mr. Cuthbert.

Mr. Webster received Mr. Cuthbert's communication of the 6th inst.

Desirous of treating Mr. Cuthbert with the respect due to his public character and station, Mr. Webster thinks nevertheless, that Mr. Cuthbert, upon request, see him under present circumstances. Mr. Webster could not enter into correspondence with him upon the subject to which his communication refers.

Mr. Cuthbert is referred to Mr. Webster's speech at Richmond, in October 1840, a copy of which is herewith transmitted; to the correspondence between John Botton, of Georgia, and himself, dated 17th and 19th May, 1833; published in the newspapers of the day and which will be found in Niles' Register of the 29th June, 1833; and also to his speech in reply to Mr. Hayne of the 21st January, 1839.

March 15, 1841.

Mr. Cuthbert to Mr. Webster.

March 29, 1841.

SIR: Yours of the 15th did not reach me until several days after it date. I have suffered it to lie some days by me, and my reflections still suggest to no sufficient reason why the plain question proposed to you in mine of the 6th, should not be answered.

On the 22d of February, in open senate, Mr. Rives in the character of your public friend and a zealous advocate and defender, voluntarily declared that he entertained no doubt that it should address to you a written communication, proposing the inquiry conveyed in my note of the 6th inst. you would return to that inquiry a prompt and satisfactory answer, and he plainly proposed me to that confidence. On the 1st March, in open senate, Mr. Rives demanded of me whether I had made the inquiry, and in the form which he had suggested, and again intimated me to do so. On both occasions, I pledged myself to address to you such a letter of inquiry as he suggested. I have redeemed my pledge, addressing you in such respectful terms, as your public station and character made proper. You decline to answer, and our correspondence here ends. The world must determine on your manner in declining to answer. Your obedient servant,

A. CUTHBERT.

Hon. Daniel Webster.

THE SENATE. On receiving the resolutions of the legislature of the state of Maine, appealing to the several state governments to support the claim of that state upon the government of the union "to establish the line which that government has solemnly declared to be the true boundary" between the territory of the United States and that of Great Britain, the senate of the state of Maryland referred these resolutions to a select committee, of which gen. B. C. Howard was the chairman. By the committee's report was made, elaborate and able, accompanied by three maps reviewing the whole ground of the controversy with a precision as well as acuteness which could hardly be expected of any one who was less familiar with the subject than the distinguished chairman of the committee, who enjoyed the best opportunity of examining himself acquainted with it during his late service in congress at the head of the committee of foreign relations in the house of representatives. The reasoning of the report is entirely favorable to the claim, heretofore asserted by the executive of the United States, and sustained by the unanimous votes of both houses of congress. It is to the subjoined conclusions, however, (and not to the reasoning of the committee), that we now propose to invite the attention of our readers; conclusions which are entitled to their most serious consideration.

"With regard to the course which ought to be pursued in obtaining a settlement of this controversy, the committee do not feel themselves qualified to express an opinion. The constitution of our government wisely placed our long and arduous the exclusive guardianship of the federal government, whose dignity and power are commensurate to the duty it has to perform. It is clear that all reasonable efforts should be exhausted to accomplish a peace and speedy adjustment of the controversy; and it is also clear that, if they should unfortunately fail, it would be the duty of the states of the union to rally around the federal government and carry it successfully through the struggle that must then ensue.

The following resolutions are submitted to the consideration of the senate:

"Resolved, That the legislature of Maryland entertains a perfect conviction of the justice and validity of the title of the United States, and state of Maine, to the full extent of all the territory in dispute, and that it is the duty of the legislature of Maryland to place herself in the support of the federal government in what will then become its duty to itself and the state of Maine.

"Resolved, That after expressing the above opinion, and transmitting a copy of this report to the request the state of Maine to contribute, by all the means in its power, towards an amicable settlement of the dispute upon honorable terms.

"Resolved, That if the British government would transmit to the title of the state of Maine to the territory in dispute, and offer a fair equivalent for the passage through it of a military road, it would be a reasonable mode of adjusting the dispute, and ought to be satisfactory to the state of Maine.

"Resolved, That the governor be and he is hereby requested to transmit a copy of this report and these resolutions to each of the governors of the several states, and to each of the senators and representatives in congress from the state of Maryland."

These resolutions were unanimously adopted by the senate, and the legislature of the state of Maryland, and must be regarded, therefore, as a deliberate expression of the opinion of that state, as well in regard to what is due to the rights of Maine, as to what the other states of the union have to expect from Maine herself. The part of these resolutions which have attracted the most attention, and especially in France. A report is current among the best informed people, that the British cabinet, wishing to terrify "those republican pirates, as they say, who assume a lofty tone, better to disfigure their fronts," have sent a question to compel the government at Washington, by the mouth of the cannon, to make itself more pliant and accommodating.

The news of this insolence on the part of Britain, caused every French patriot's heart to beat high. He says, "the difficulties between England and the United States attract a great deal of attention in Europe, and especially in France. FRANCE AND THE UNITED STATES. The correspondent of the Courier des Etats Unis, writing from Paris the 7th March, gives the following account of the state of opinion in France in regard to a war between England and the United States. He says, "the difficulties between England and the United States attract a great deal of attention in Europe, and especially in France. A report is current among the best informed people, that the British cabinet, wishing to terrify "those republican pirates, as they say, who assume a lofty tone, better to disfigure their fronts," have sent a question to compel the government at Washington, by the mouth of the cannon, to make itself more pliant and accommodating.

the British lion, the first will not long have flapped its powerful wings, before the French flag will be seen floating by its side. This is our proud conviction. War would not have waged a month between the two nations, before our government would be forced to leave the contest. However, sensuous its disposition towards peace, it would be hurried along by the torrent of public opinion."

THE ARMY.

Harper's Ferry army. The Winchester Republican states that the army at Harper's Ferry will shortly be placed under the control of an officer of the U. S. army with instructions to examine into all its concerns. The administration having determined that every department of the government should undergo the most rigid scrutiny, in order that abuses, wherever they exist, may be corrected, it is proper that the army at Harper's Ferry should not be an exception, more especially as it has been asserted that the mutinies of the late army there has cost the government considerably more than the same kind of arms cost at Springfield; and certainly no one will be better able to obtain the desired information than an experienced officer of the ordnance department.

THE NAVY.

The Norfolk Beacon says:—The following is the armament determined upon for the ship of the line Pennsylvania, at Portsmouth, Va. and which is now taking on board.

Lower gun deck, 28 long 32 pounders and 4 Paixhan guns, and Paixhan shot are thrown from 80 pounder.

Middle gun deck, 30 long 32 pounders and 4 Paixhan guns.

Upper gun deck 32 32 pound medium guns and 4 Paixhan guns.

Spar deck 32 32 pound cannonades and 4 medium 32 pound guns. Total 138.

Weight of metal of one broadside near 2,400 lbs. The U. S. ship Leverett, commanded by Fitz was of Krys West 1st inst. to sail in a few days for Mobile. Officers and crew well.

The National Intelligencer contradicts, on official authority, the report that the U. S. sloop of war Marion had received any material injury by the accident which happened to her some months since at Rio.

The U. S. schooner Porpoise was spoken 29th ult. lat. 33, 10, lon. 75, on a cruise. All well.

The U. S. ship Warren, commander Jamieson, arrived at New York the 29th ult. All well.

The Norfolk Beacon says:—"We learn by a letter from the purser of the U. S. sloop of war Concord, that Lieut. Algeron S. Worth, died at sea on the 3d of February, 1841. He has left a wife in Portsmouth, to mourn his loss."

The Norfolk Beacon speaks thus of a new application of steam power, invented by Lieut. Hunter, of the navy.

A desideratum in the application of steam power to national vessels and to the navigation of canals has been effected and practically proven by the actual and entirely successful operation in our harbor of a small vessel constructed by private enterprise and at individual cost. We have seen a plan in detail of the arrangement of the machinery and the construction of the vessel designed for national purposes, which in our opinion properly withheld by Lieut. Hunter from the general public in order that our government may peculiarly receive all the benefits derivable from its use, and we feel that we hazard nothing in declaring that it will be found to have achieved the object for which it was the creation of a war steamer for harbor defense or as a cruiser, as the moving power by the ingenious construction of the vessel is protected from the effect of Paixhan or any other shot.

Sandwich Islands. The N. York Journal of Commerce has received a file of the Sandwich Island Polytechnic to the 19th December, from which it makes the following extracts:

Honolulu, Dec. 3. The exploring squadron has now left our harbor to cruise in various directions.

The Porpoise has sailed (so it is said) for the Southern groups, to return here in four months.

The Peacock and Flying-Fish to Ascension, King's Mill group, and the Caroline, Archipelago, thence to the Columbia river, in spring, when a store ship will sail from here for that place, with all necessary supplies, which will probably obviate the necessity of their returning here.

The Vincennes has gone to Hawaii, for the purpose of making a thorough survey of the volcano and Mauna Loa, and all the interesting points in that vicinity. She will also go to the Sandwichs in a few weeks.

Honolulu, Nov. 28. By the Julia, from Sydney, we learn that two French frigates, with an emigrant we learn that two French frigates, with an emigrant ship, had arrived at the Bay of Islands, New Zealand. Gov. Hobson had called upon the commodore, who refused to recognize his authority, which circumstance would probably lead to a difficulty, as the French, like the English, claim large tracts of land on the right of possession from the natives.

Passengers in the ship Lausanne, sailed from Honolulu, Dec. 2, for New York: rev. I. Diell, lady and three children; Dr. White, lady and two children, and servant; Miss Mary Smith; lieutenant R. Pinckney, U. S. navy; passagist; J. Lawrence, U. S. navy; and a midshipman J. Lewis, U. S. navy.

From Rio Janeiro. The ship Hibernia arrived at New York on Friday morning from Rio Janeiro, which port she left on the 26th of February. At that date the following United States ships were in port: the Constitution, captain Kearney, retreating for China, to sail in ten days; Potomac, captain Ridgely; Deatur, captain Ogden; Concord, captain Boerum; Marion, capt. Bell, and Enterprise, lieutenant Goldborough, destination unknown.

The brig Male Adhel was to sail for Baltimore on the 27th in charge of lieutenant Ogden, of the Potomac. Among the passengers on board the Hibernia are Messrs. Clary, Mix and Humphries, U. S. N. and thirty-three disabled seamen from the East India and Brazilian squadrons.

STATES OF THE UNION.

CONNECTICUT.

Election. The particulars have not yet reached us. The general election is postponed—the whig candidates are elected throughout.

NEW YORK.

City election. The charter election, held on the 13th, is spoken of as having been one of the most order and quiet elections held in that city for many years. Mr. Morris, the Van Buren candidate is elected mayor, by a majority of between five and six hundred votes. Last April the Van Buren majority was 1,621. At least 10 of the 17 wards have elected Van Buren councillors.

Brooklyn. The charter election has resulted in a sweeping triumph to the whigs. Mr. Smith, the whig candidate for mayor, who was elected last April by a majority of 187, has now a majority of 725 votes.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Governor Porter has vetoed and returned the bill lately passed by the legislature for the relief of the banks of the state. His veto message is in type and will be inserted in our next number.

Upon submitting the bill to the council, notwithstanding the veto, there was not a sufficient majority for it.

Another bill, proposed by Mr. Johnson, was under discussion in the house, when our latest advices left Harrisburg.

An application was also made on behalf of the Bank of the U. States of Pa. for an act to carry out the suggestions made in the report of the stockholders of that institution.

Good old Adams county. It is with no slight degree of pleasure that I commend a fact, which I know will be to the citizens of our county a subject of much gratification. Other counties may boast of their wealth and their population—their furnaces and their coal mines—their finished rail roads and canals—their rapidly increasing power and importance—let them. They cannot boast as we can—that there is not a solitary prisoner in our jail. Not one who awaits his trial for offence against the law of the land—not one, who is expiating the just sentence of that law—not even one who languishes in bondage because he is poor, in debt and friendless. Their boast of their wealth, their motto may be that in which the Roman poet said his countrymen rejoiced—"Virtus post numma." Let them vaunt their power and the number of their population—we cannot; our glory and our being is in virtue and integrity of our people. They are the only true elements of happiness in society—the only firm foundation upon which a nation's greatness can be reared. They constitute true wealth, real power, and genuine importance.

MARYLAND.

The extra session closed. The constitution of the state was so altered during the two last years, as to compel the legislature to close its annual session at the first of March. The very first application of this rule, found the most important business of the session unfinished, and the expedient was resorted to of requesting the governor in council an extra session, in order to complete what was in progress. Ten days were being required, the state has to endure the itinerant expenses of the members going home and returning. The governor summoned them to reassemble on the 24th March, and they closed their session after attending the funeral of president Harrison, on the 7th inst, having elected 34 jurors in addition to those passed at the regular session; amongst them was an act to assess all the taxable property in the several counties and cities of the state, and levying a tax of twenty cents in every hundred dollars of the valuation, for the support of the state treasury and to maintain inviolate the credit of the state. It is expected that this will realize about half a million of dollars annually.

Another important bill passed was the one appropriating two millions of dollars to complete the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to Cumberland.

The congressional election is to take place, according to governor Graesson's proclamation, on the 17th May. Of the late members, Messrs. CARROLL and HILLMAN, (V. B.) who represented the 4th district, Mr. F. T. TOWNE, (V. B.) who represented the 5th district, and Mr. JENIFER, (W.) who represented the 7th district, severally decline being candidates for re-election. WILLIAM COST JOHNSON, esq. is again a candidate for re-election in the 6th district. The parties are making their dispositions for a regular contest, and many candidates are spoken of on both sides.

VIRGINIA.

The governor. Certain grave doubts have been expressed in Virginia, since the retirement from the executive chair of the state by governor Gilmer, as to the person on whom the charge devolved by the constitution. It was contended on the one side that the lieutenant governor, Patton, must be considered the actual governor of the commonwealth during the absence of the duties of governor Gilmer. On the other it was said that the senior counselor, Mr. Rutherford, was the officer on whom it constitutionally devolved, and the attorney general having so decided, Mr. Rutherford has entered upon the duties of the duties of the office, and will continue acting governor of Virginia, until the 31st of March, 1842.

Election. The general election takes place on the 23d instant, and the papers of the state are of executive chair occupied state by governor Gilmer, as to the person on whom the charge devolved by the constitution. It was contended on the one side that the lieutenant governor, Patton, must be considered the actual governor of the commonwealth during the absence of the duties of governor Gilmer. On the other it was said that the senior counselor, Mr. Rutherford, was the officer on whom it constitutionally devolved, and the attorney general having so decided, Mr. Rutherford has entered upon the duties of the duties of the office, and will continue acting governor of Virginia, until the 31st of March, 1842.

TENNESSEE.

Congressional election. Gov. Polk has issued his proclamation for the election of members of congress in Tennessee on the 6th day of May, 1841.

KENTUCKY.

Congressional election. The election for members of congress is to take place on the 4th of May, in the present month.

OHIO.

The wheat crops of this state appear to be very large. The crop of 1839 is estimated at eighteen millions of bushels. Estimating the home consumption at seven bushels to each person, which is a fair allowance, considering the quantity of Indian corn consumed in the state, and eight millions remain for exportation. The production of wheat there yields to the state, not less than six millions of dollars per annum, exclusive of its entire bread consumption. The production of Indian corn is hardly less than thirty millions of bushels. An amount which may give an idea of the vast number of hogs, cattle and horses which are raised in the west.

INDIANA.

Congressional election. The governor of Indiana has ordered the election of members of congress in that state to be held on the 3d day of May, proximo.

At the St. Louis city election, held on the 5th inst, the whig candidates for mayor, recorder, marshal, &c. and a majority of the city council were elected.

The legislature adjourned on the 21st ult. ad vic. A bill has passed the house of representatives prohibiting the circulation of notes of a smaller denomination than five dollars, after July 1841, with a penalty of ten dollars for each infraction. After July 1842, the prohibition will extend to notes under two dollars.

An issue of state bonds, to the amount of $258,261, at 10 per cent. and $12,000 at seven per cent. has been authorized for specific purposes.

Mention is made of the existence of counterfeit Indiana scrip, said to be very well executed.

MICHIGAN.

The legislature of this state, at its present session, passed a relief or stop-law containing the following provisions:

"That no real or personal property shall hereafter be sold by foreclosure of mortgage, on execution, or upon process of any court, until the same shall be appraised by disinterested freeholders.

"That no real or personal property shall be sold by any officer under the name shall be sold at two-thirds the appraised cash value or more.

"That the creditor, his agent or attorney, and the debtor, his agent or attorney, may each select one appraiser; if those appraisers cannot agree, they may select a third, and if they cannot agree in this, the officer having the process is to select the third.

"That there shall be no redemption of any property sold under the provisions of the act.

"That the act shall take effect from and after its passage."

FLORIDA.

The U. S. steamer Brusard, capt. Peck, arrived yesterday from Pliska. We learn from a passenger that on Monday last an express had arrived from Fort King, and stated that while two soldiers were hunting on the 4th inst, about 15 miles from the fort, they were fired upon by a party of seven Indians, and one of the soldiers killed. The other escaped.

Capt. Davidson, with a detachment of troops, on hearing of the murder, immediately started in pursuit of the Indians, but they had vanished. The body of the murdered soldier was recovered.

Dates to the 1st instant, have been received from St. Augustine. The same tale is told of Indians coming in and surrendering. The News of the 1st, says—"A letter received here, from an officer of the army at Tampa bay, expresses the opinion that there will not be another gun fired by the Indians in Florida. God grant that it may prove correct, but we can scarcely rely upon it as yet. The shipment of from two to three hundred Indians is continued at work among the state, several, perhaps 600 Indians of all sorts, have surrendered or been captured, and among them near 100 warriors. It adds—"No impression appears to have been made on the Creeks, and but little upon the Seminole people, of whom Hogachie (not coming in) is the chief. Much, very much, therefore, remains to be accomplished before (after being so often cheated) we can be assured that our troubles are over."

Belt Sun.

The National Intelligencer of the 1st instant, says, "We have read with much pain the published information, showing that the spirit of evil is not yet entirely either quelled or propitiated among the Indians in Florida. Our information, we are sorry to say, lends us to the belief that there is a mischievous influence at work among the state, several, perhaps 600 Indians of all sorts, have surrendered or been captured, and among them near 100 warriors. It adds—"No impression appears to have been made on the Creeks, and but little upon the Seminole people, of whom Hogachie (not coming in) is the chief. Much, very much, therefore, remains to be accomplished before (after being so often cheated) we can be assured that our troubles are over."

The correspondent of the Savannah Republican writes as follows from Florida, under date of the 4th instant:

"An express has this morning arrived at Pliska from Fort King, stating that the Indians have exhibited a hostile attitude this day within one mile of Fort King. A party of seven warriors, suddenly emerging from the hammock, attacked a small party of soldiers who were out hunting, fired upon them, and killed private Thompson, company H, 24th regiment infantry, and another individual, a private citizen. This occurrence took place at 12 M. A detachment of the command at Fort King immediately left in pursuit of the Indians, and the pleasing prospect of closing the war. These Indians are supposed to be of the same party which left Fort Clinch yesterday about the time the express started from that station for Fort King. It is now the full and the moon, and you may expect shortly to insert in your columns an article headed 'bloody massacre.'"

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Report of the committee of investigation, appointed at the meeting of stockholders.

The committee appointed at the meeting of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, held January 4, 1841, to examine the details of the state and affairs of the bank, by the president, respectfully submit the following report:

The committee originally appointed, consisted of Joshua Lippincott, Moses Kempton, Charles Massey, Thomas P. Cope, Richard Willing and David Kirkpatrick. The three last named gentlemen declined to act. Edwin Cole, James S. Newbold and John Bacon having been selected to fill the vacancies, the committee were finally organized, by the election of Joshua Lippincott as chairman, and George Sharswood as secretary; and on the twentieth of February, 1841, commenced the performance of the duties assigned them.

The committee were accommodated by the board of directors, with an apartment in the bank, and were from time to time, attended by a committee of that body, as well as by the officers and clerks of the bank. Every facility was afforded to them in the prosecution of their labors, as far as was practicable, by submitting to their examination, the books of the bank, and by giving such verbal explanations, and furnishing such extracts and copies, as were requested. At an early stage of their proceedings, they were officially notified by the president, that a resolution had been adopted by the board of directors, "that the committee of stockholders be informed, that the board is ready to afford them every facility, in the prosecution of their investigation, which they may be willing to make, of the affairs and transactions of this bank, and the causes of its actual situation, and that it is the wish of this board, that the committee should make such investigation, in order that the results may be laid before the meeting of the stockholders in April next." Conceiving it to be their duty, under the terms of their original appointment, as well as under the invitation thus extended to them by the board, the committee accordingly commenced an examination of "the state and transactions of the bank," and "the causes of its actual situation."

The committee proceeded in the first instance, to verify in detail, the statement of the assets and liabilities of December 31, 1841. The securities in the evidences in the possession of the bank at Philadelphia, were accordingly produced, and on comparison therewith, the same was found to be correct. The cash was counted, on the second of March, and corresponded with the ledger balance of that day. The returns furnished by the several agencies, were read and found to agree with the printed statement. The accounts of the circulation and issues, of the late and present bank, were also examined.

The committee have prepared and herewith submit a still more detailed statement of the assets and liabilities of the bank, on the twenty-first day of December, 1840, than that heretofore presented; exhibiting the particulars of each item of the original statement, in the same order as given, and is therein paraded; omitting, however, the item "Bank United States stock, balance unpaid," and the amount credited as "bonus for charter."

The next object proposed was to make a valuation of the assets. With this view they proceeded to re-examine the items of active and passive debt, stocks, real estate, bonds and mortgages, foreign bills of exchange, and amounts due by state banks. The president of the bank was also requested to obtain an estimate of the probable loss, on the assets at the different offices and agencies; returns from all of which have accordingly been received. The estimates thus made are presented in a column, added to the detailed statement, now submitted and before referred to, (appendix A).

The attempt to make an estimate of probable losses, was found to be attended with considerable difficulty and embarrassment. To adopt the present depressed market value of the several stocks and loans held by the bank, would not be a fair criterion of their actual worth, which, rather than their present availability, was that at which the committee endeavored to arrive. Still they have been necessarily guided, in a great measure, by the price current of the day. Of the real estate and bonds and mortgages, a very imperfect judgment could be formed, without requiring a more diligent and incumbered, from which the committee had not time to make. Many of the securities are of a character to render it almost impracticable to form even a reasonable conjecture of their value. While therefore the committee bespeak for this portion of their labors that regard, which is due to an honest effort, from the best means within their reach, to arrive at the truth, they must be permitted to qualify it with the remark, that it is necessarily only an approximation, in which they cannot ask the stockholders to place entire confidence. The ability of the institution to realize any thing like a fair equivalent for its assets, will depend much upon the course of policy it may in future pursue, and upon circumstances which no one can be expected to foresee. The estimate is presented, however with less reluctance, as from the details now given, each stockholder will be able to form a judgment for himself.

It may be proper here to remark, that it has been thought best by a majority of the committee, not to submit the list in detail of the actual and suspended debt. The injury which would result to the credit of individuals by such an exposition, might ultimately be detrimental to the interests of the stockholders, while no benefit of sufficient importance to counterbalance such a mischief, appeared to present itself. In regard to these two lines, the committee will content themselves with remarking, that but a small proportion consists of regular mercantile discounts. On the active debt, December 31, 1840, are loans to seven incorporated or other companies of 1,311,192 dollars 22 cents, including ones of 602,222 dollars 22 cents, to the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore rail road company. The sum of 740,056 dollars 33 cents, is on obligations having on that day more than six months to run, and of this sum 487,028 dollars 5 cents, had more than twelve months to run. The sum of 279,888 dollars 41 cents, a part of this line entered as "bills receivable," being nominally payable on demand, though really composed of present account conditions, is not included in either of these amounts. Nor is the sum of 66,890 dollars 86 cents, "bills receivable for sale of offices." A considerable part of it is in large amounts, as will sufficiently appear from the fact, that forty-eight individuals, firms and companies, have discounts exceeding 20,000 dollars each, of whom twenty-seven have discounts exceeding 50,000 dollars each, and nine exceeding 100,000 each.

A similar examination of the suspended debt exhibits as the result fifty-two individuals, firms and companies, standing charged on the books of that department, with more than 20,000 dollars each, twenty-nine with more than 50,000 dollars each, and eighteen with more than 100,000 dollars each. There are six individuals and firms whose debts amount to 2,314,500 dollars, two of which are over 650,000 dollars each, a large amount which will be lost; and four others, who have loans amounting to 569,000 dollars. Eleven joint stock companies are indebted on this list 807,881 dollars 22 cents, of which the Philadelphia and Germantown rail road company is indebted 188,000 dollars 76 cents.

The whole result of the valuation made by the committee, may be thus stated in short:

The assets of the bank, amounting on the 21st day of December, 1840, according to the statement of the committee, to 69,531,742 dollars 46 cents, have been estimated at	65,779,794
From which deduct liabilities	36,859,538 63

Leaves the sum of	$14,820,256 11
to represent the capital of	$35,000,000 00
Leaving out of bank of United States stock on hand	2,471,400 00
	$32,528,600 00

To this may be added the sum of four or five hundred thousand dollars for that part of the circulation, amounting on the twenty-first of December, 1840, to 9,336,000 dollars 90 cents, which is probably lost or destroyed.

The committee submit also herewith, condensed general statements of the condition of the bank, on the first day of February, 1836, on the first day of April, 1839, on the first day of March, 1841; with a comparative table of assets and liabilities, for these three periods, and also a general statement of April 1, 1841. (Appendix B. C. D. E. and F.)

The general statement of the condition of the bank February 1, 1836, is a copy of that submitted to the stockholders convened at the bank, upon the nineteenth day of that month, for the purpose of considering the propriety of accepting the charter, then recently granted by the legislature of Pennsylvania, by the late Mr. Charles McKim, and by the institution, after a period of active business extending over twenty years, and including more than one period of serious commercial difficulty, there appeared to the credit of discount, exchange, and interest,	$423,675 15
Profit and interest,	$766,399 84
Contingent fund, exceeding the losses chargeable thereto, by the sum of	1,436,561 65
Foreign exchange account	847,571 03
Fund for extinguishing cost of banking houses	1,104,223 09
Contingent interest	404,854 14
	$9,018,784 40

These sums, after deducting the amount of deficiencies and expenses, formed the surplus funds of the institution	217,194 32
	$7,801,590 38

from which it will be recollected, it was strongly urged upon the stockholders, as its main argument in favor of accepting the charter, and after making the most liberal allowance for probable losses on the suspended debt and real estate, the entire bonus could be paid, without in the least degree impairing the capital.

The origin of the course of policy, which has conducted to the present situation of the affairs of this institution, dates, however, beyond the period of the recharter by the state. When it was perceived that the charter of the late bank of the United States would not be renewed or extended by congress, the president and directors commenced winding up its concerns, and among the first measures taken to that end, was to sell or dispose of, as far and as speedily as could be effected, the assets of its several branches. This was generally done to state banks, who gave for the same, the highest price payable by institutions at distant periods. At the same time, the policy was adopted of converting the active debt into loans upon the security of stocks, by which permanent investments might be provided for the capital of the bank during the long period of its anticipated liquidation. On the 6th of March, 1835, "the president submitted to the board, a general view of the situation of the bank, its means and liabilities, its circulation and deposits, and the probable future demands upon it, showing, its ample resources and power of expansion; whereupon," the committee of exchange, which was composed of three directors, appointed by the president, were authorized by the board "to make loans on the security of the stock of this bank, or other approved security, and under the same terms, at a lower rate than six, but not less than five per cent per annum."

This delegation of power to the exchange committee, was never expensively and formally renewed under the new charter, unless it be considered as included under a general resolution of the new board adopting "the by-laws, rules and regulations" of the former bank, and the committee of exchange of the bank upon the 2d of March, 1835, the whole amount of loans upon bank stock, and other than personal security, was 4,797,986 dollars 55 cents, while by that of March 8, 1836, these loans had increased to 20,446,387 dollars 88 cents. Under such circumstances, the active means of the bank were comparatively small, to pay the immediate demand of the state for the bonus, to settle with the government of the United States for its stock, and to meet its circulation of 20,118,257 dollars 96 cents, which, contrary to the anticipation, expressed at the period of its re-charter, soon began to be rapidly presented for redemption. The bank was of necessity driven into the market as borrowers, and very soon the first step was taken to obtain the interest of the institution abroad, and to negotiate for that purpose. Two loans were accordingly negotiated by him: one in England, of 1,000,000 pounds sterling, and another in France, of 12,500,000 francs, on favorable terms.

In order to provide for the payment of these loans and to negotiate others, and in general to superintend the interests of the institution abroad, it was determined by the board to have a general agent residing in London, and on the 22d of September, Mr. Samuel Jaudon, then cashier, was elected to that post, and his agency there commenced accordingly. At the same time, the bank entered the foreign and domestic markets as borrowers, upon their post notes and bonds payable in Europe; the whole amount obtained in this way at different periods up to July, 1840, being more than twenty-three millions.

From these causes, as well as from the general derangement of affairs, the suspension of specie payments, and the discredit consequently thrown upon American securities, and more particularly from the course of the bank's dealing in foreign exchange, by drawing bills to a large amount without bearing in view the state of the market, and without, and thus subjecting their agent in London to the necessity of obtaining money in haste, in order to maintain the credit of the bank, it was no longer found possible to command funds there upon so many favorable terms as before. Accordingly, upon Mr. Jaudon's subsequent negotiations for loans, to the amount altogether of $12,212,697 46 cents, there is chargeable to losses the sum of 1,149,907 dollars 4 cents, being for discount, commission to foreign bankers, and other charges; not including the sum of 300,000 dollars, which was the expenses of the agency in London amounting up to January 1, 1841, to the sum of 69,344 pounds 17 shillings 6 pence sterling, which at nine per cent, exchange is equal to 335,987 dollars 39 cents.

It may be proper to explain in passing, the origin of this large sum for the expenses of the agency at London affairs. When Mr. Jaudon was elected to the place of foreign agent, he was the principal cashier, at a salary of 7,000 dollars per annum. The bank paid him 100,000 dollars for the purchase of the charter, and the passage of himself and family to London, a further sum of 1,010 dollars. He was to devote himself exclusively to the business of the bank, to negotiate an uncovered credit in England, to provide for the state existing debt in Europe, to receive its funds, to pay its bills and dividends, to effect sales of stocks, and generally to protect the interests of the bank and the country at large." For these services he was to receive a commission of one per cent, charged and allowed to Baring, Brothers & Company, equal to about 28,000 dollars per annum. In addition to which, the expenses of the bank were allowed him, including a salary of 1,000 pounds sterling to his brother, Mr. Charles Jaudon, and his principal clerk. From the increase of money operations, arising from facilities afforded by the agency, the amount upon which commissions were charged was greatly augmented, so that the sum paid him for his services, up to the 31st of January, 1841, amounted at nine per cent. exchange to 179,444 dollars 47 cents, and the expenses of the agency to 35,166 dollars 99 cents.

In addition to these sums, he was allowed by the exchange committee, an extra commission of one per cent, upon a loan effected in October, 1838, of 800,000 pounds, say $38,755 56, and upon his claim for a similar commission, upon subsequent loans in France and Holland, to the amount of $9,337,141 90, the board of directors, under the sanction of a legislative committee of house of commons, and the views of the former president, by whom the agreement with Mr. Jaudon was not anticipated, nor meant to be included in the original agreement, effected a payment of $48,970 37. These several sums amount to $335,937 39, as before stated.

Such were some of the results of the resolution of March, 1833, though it cannot be questioned, that such may be fairly supposed to have been the situation of the business and exchanges of the country, concurring with the unfortunate policy pursued by the administration of the bank. Thus the institution has gone on to increase its indebtedness abroad, until it has now more money borrowed in Europe, than it has on loan on the list of active debt in America. To this has been superadded, extensive dealing in stocks, and a continuation of the policy of loaning upon stock securities, though it was evidently proper upon the recharter, that such a policy should be at once discontinued. In 1837, indeed was its avowed purpose, yet one year afterwards, in March, 1837, its loans on stocks ended, then personal security had increased, $7,821,544, while the bills discounted on personal security, and mercantile exchange, had suffered a diminution of $9,516,462 78.

It seems to have been sufficient, to obtain money on loan, to pledge the stock of an "Incorporated company," however remote its operation or uncertain its prospects. Many large loans, originally made on a pledge of stocks, were paid back in the same kind of property, and that too at par, when in many instances they had become depreciated in value. It is very evident to the committee, that several of the officers of the bank were themselves engaged in large operations in stocks and speculations, of a similar character, with funds belonging of the bank, and at the same time loans were made to the companies in which they were interested, and in others engaged in the same kind of operations, in amounts greatly disproportionate to the means of the parties, or to their proper and legitimate wants and dealings. The effect of this system, was to monopolize the active means of the institution, and disable it from aiding and accommodating any engaged in business, but really speculative, and not to the community; and as might have been anticipated, a large part of the sums thus loaned were ultimately lost, or the bank compelled, on disadvantageous terms as to price, to take in payment stocks, back lands and other fragments of the estates of great speculators.

The loose and irregular manner, in which the business of loaning money was conducted, tended greatly to produce this result, and deserves particular notice and explanation. From March, 1835, the period of the suspension of the bank, as referred to, the chief control and management of the affairs of the institution, appears to have passed from the hands of the directors. The mode in which the committee of exchange transacted their business, shows that they really did no check whatever upon the officers, and that the funds of the bank were almost entirely at their disposition. That committee met daily, and were attended by the cashier, and at times by the president. They exercised the power of making loans and settlements, to as great an extent as the board could do. They kept no minutes of their proceeding—no book in which the loans made, and business done, were entered, but their decisions and directions, were given verbally to the officers, to be by them carried into execution. The entire management of the bank seems to have been, for the first teller to pay on presentation at the counter, all checks, notes, or dno bills having indorsed the order or the initials of one of the cashiers, and to place these as vouchers in his drawer, for so much cash, where they remained, until just before the regular periodical counting of the cash, by the auditing committee of the board on the state of the bank. These vouchers were then taken out, and entered as "bills receivable, in a small memorandum book, under the charge of one of the clerks. These bills were not discounted, but bore interest payable semi-annually, and were secured by a pledge of stock, or some other kind of property. It is evidently impossible, under such circumstances, to ascertain, or be assured, in regard to any particular loan, whether it was sanctioned by a majority of the exchange committee. It can be said, however, with entire certainty, that the very large business transacted in this way, does not appear upon the face of the discount books, was never submitted to the examination of the members of the board, at its regular meetings, nor is it any where entered on the minutes, as having been reported to that body, for their information or approbation. As illustrative of the extent of these transactions, it may be proper to state, that the sum total of the receipts, was

On the 4th of March, 1836, was $6,221,660 85
On the 4th of March, 1837, 8,188,445 01
On the 4th of March, 1838, 7,229,503 25
On the 4th of March, 1839, 6,772,733 80
On the 4th of March, 1840, 4,047,708 84
The amount outstanding on the books of this department, on the 4th of March, 1841, had become reduced to the sum of 176,954 dollars 12 cents. The accounts have been settled in various ways, or by the receipt of the department, and the proceeding resolved to abolish altogether such a proceeding, so pregnant with mischief and loss, and to prohibit entirely, all loans except by the board itself.

Of these stands now upon the books of the superadded debt department, transferred thereto from "bills receivable," still unsettled 1,470,651 dollars 77 cents. A portion is on the list of active debt having been changed into bills discounted, at deferred periods of maturity.

On these loans were generally in large amounts. In the list of debtors on "bills receivable" of the first of January 1837, twenty-one individuals, firms and companies, stand charged, each with an amount of one hundred thousand dollars and upwards. One of these received an accommodation bill, of the kind between August 1835 and November 1837 to the extent of 4,213,875 dollars 30 cents, more than half of which was obtained in 1837. The officers of the bank themselves received in this way, loans to a large amount. In March 1836, when he was sent into operation, under its new charter, Mr. Samuel Jaudon, then elected its principal cashier, was indebted to it, 100,500 dollars. When he resigned the situation of cashier, and was appointed foreign agent, he was in debt 408,989 dollars 25 cents, and on the first of March 1841, he still stood charged with an indebtedness of 117,500 dollars. Mr. John Andrews, first assistant cashier, was indebted to the bank in March 1836, 104,000 dollars. By subsequent loans and advances made during the next three years, he received in all, the sum of 426,880 dollars 67 cents. Mr. Joseph Cowperthwaite, then second assistant cashier, was in debt to the bank in March 1836, 115,000 dollars; when he was appointed cashier in September 1837, 326,832 dollars 40 cents; and in March 1840, he was a director by the board, in June 1840, 72,860 dollars, and he stands charged March 3, 1841, on the books with the sum of 55,091 dollars 95 cents. It appears on the books of the bank, that these three gentlemen, were engaged in making investments, in the stocks, in the accounts, in the hands of the Camden and Woodbury rail road company, Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore rail road company, Dauphin and Lycoming coal lands, and Grand Gulf rail road and banking company.

On the 31st of January, 1841, the accounts of the officers and other debtors for these irregular loans, must not be suffered to pass without notice. These settlements were without the knowledge or approbation of the board, at least so far as appears from their minutes. The large loan to first, in this city, before adverted to, was settled by the receipt in payment of various stocks and real estate, except 224,264 dollars 50 cents, in cash. Another large amount of loans to a single individual of 1,014,977 dollars 80 cents, was settled in like manner. The sum of August, two hundred and fifty shares, at 123 dollars, the bank selling on the same day at 120, less brokers' commission, on the 22d of August, five hundred shares, and on the 23d of August, four hundred shares at 123 dollars, the market price on those two days being 123 dollars 35 cents, the bank selling the day after at 123, less brokerage. Settlements of a similar character with debtors for smaller amounts, were of frequent recurrence.

The first instance in which an officer paid his debt to the bank in other than money, which the committee can find in the March 1836, when Mr. Samuel Jaudon (then in London as the agent of the bank), Mr. Joseph Cowperthwaite, (then cashier), and Mr. John Andrews, (then first assistant cashier), paid a debt of 269,500 dollars, which they had on bank on joint account, in Danville and Potsville rail road company five per cent.

loan, 70,000
Union canal six per cent. loan, 10,000
Philadelphia and Reading rail road company stock, 179,500
West Pelican rail road company stock, 10,000
100 shares, 10,000

$269,500
Of course, the committee cannot say, that the exchange committee did or did not authorize, or sanction this settlement. The paper which contains the only evidence of it, and which the committee have seen exhibits no sign of such authority or approbation, other than the initials of Mr. Andrews, cashier.

Of the residue of the large debt of Mr. Andrews of 463,104 dollars 88 cents, which includes his one-third proportion of the foregoing sum of 269,500 dollars, all except 31,311 dollars 58 cents was settled by the transfer of stocks and loans.

An account of the settlement with Messrs. Jaudon, Cowperthwaite and Andrews, accompanies a report made by the exchange committee, in the board on the 31st of August, 1840. That committee remark in their report, "your committee are unable to set off any authority given by the board under the charter from congress, but are very certain that the boards, under the present charter, have never sanctioned such loans or settlements, and they cannot too strongly condemn such acts. The power of making loans and settlements must be reserved to the board, while the officers must be content with being the executive of its decisions."

The accounts of these officers are herewith submitted, together with some others. [Appendix G.] In order to ascertain the true value, not only of the character of the assets, but of the means by which they came into the possession of the bank, there is attached in this report, a statement showing the particulars of the stocks on hand at the bank, the amount taken in settlement of debt, purchased or subscribed, and a list of the stocks in possession, April 1, 1839. (Appendix H. I.) Of the whole amount of stocks and loans, which the bank has received since its recharter, including those since disposed of, it appears, that more than thirty-one millions of dollars have been taken in settlement of debts and advances.

In the course of the investigation the attention of the committee has been directed to certain accounts, which appear on the books as "advances on merchandise," in which were, in fact, payments for cotton, tobacco and other produce, purchased by the direction of the then president, Mr. Nicholas Biddle, and shipped to Europe on account to himself and others. These accounts were kept by a clerk in the foreign agent's department, this department being then under the charge of Mr. Cowperthwaite, until September 22, 1837, when he was elected cashier, and of Mr. Thomas Dunlap, until March 30, 1840, when he was chosen president.

The original documents, necessary to enable the committee to arrive at all the facts in relation to these transactions, were not accessible, having been retained, as was supposed, by the parties interested, as private papers. A succinct view of the whole matter, sufficient to convey to the stockholders a general idea of the nature of the transactions, and the report of a committee of the board of directors, appointed on the 21st of July, 1840, for the purpose of adjusting and settling these accounts, and who reported on the 31st of December, 1840, which report with the accompanying accounts, is spread at large upon the minutes.

The first transactions were in July, 1837, and appear as advances, to A. G. Jaudon, to purchase cotton for shipment to Baring, Brothers & Co. of Liverpool, the proceeds to be remitted to their brokers in London, then acting as the agents of the bank. The amount of these shipments was 2,182,998 dollars 28 cents. The proceeds were passed to the credit of the bank, and the account appears to be balanced. The result, as to the proceeds, does not appear on the committee had no means of ascertaining them, nor the names of the parties interested.

In the autumn of 1837, when the second of these transactions commenced, it will be recollect-ed, that Mr. Samuel Jaudon had been appointed the agent of the bank to reside in London. About the same time, a co-partnership was formed between Mr. May Humphreys, then a director of the bank, and a son of Mr. Andrew Jaudon, the firm of Biddle, May and Humphreys. This house was established at Liverpool, and thenceforward acted as agents for the sale of the produce shipped to that place, which comprised a large proportion of the whole amount.

In explanation of these proceedings, the committee annex to their report a copy of a letter dated Philadelphia, December 29, 1840, to the president and directors of the bank, from Mr. Joseph Cabot, one of the firm of Biddle and Humphreys, and who became a director at the election in January, 1838. This letter was read to the board, December 29, 1840, but was not inserted on the minutes. (Appendix K.)

This arrangement continued during the year 1837, 1838 and 1839, the transactions of which amounted to $8,969,150 dollars 95 cents. The shipments were made principally to Biddle and Humphreys, were paid for by drafts on Biddle and Humphreys, the funds advanced by the bank, and the proceeds remitted to Mr. Samuel Jaudon, agent of the bank in London.

It appears that there was paid to Messrs. Biddle and Humphreys by the bank in Philadelphia during the months of March, April and May, 1839, the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars and the account was thus balanced. The committee have reason to believe, that this sum constituted a part or perhaps the whole of the profits resulting from the second series of shipments. How, and among whom, it was distributed, they have not been informed, but from the terms of the final settlement to be advertised to-perhaps, each one will be at liberty to make his own inferences.

The third and last account, amounting to $2,411,412 dollars 83 cents, appears on the books, as "bills on London, advances S. V. S. W." These letters stand for the name of S. V. S. Wilder, of New York—Messrs. Humphreys & Biddle to whom these consignments were made, continued their accounts in the name of Biddle and Humphreys, but without the knowledge of that firm, as appears by Mr. Cabot's letter of December 29, 1840. The result of these bills of exchange, was a loss of $62,324 dollars 13 cents. Of this amount the sum of $53,939 dollars 57 cents was for excess of payments by Messrs. Humphreys & Biddle to the London agency, beyond the proceeds of sale, with interest. The parties interested, claimed and were allowed a deduction for loss on $26,000 dollars of southern funds, given in the purchase of cotton, when at a discount, the sum of $10,071 dollars 30 cents, and also this sum, being banker's commission to Messrs. Humphreys & Biddle on advances to Samuel Jaudon, agent, 21,061 dollars 86 cents, making $81,123 dollars 16 cents, and leaving to be settled by the parties the sum of $31,285 dollars 97 cents.

Before proceeding to state the particulars of this settlement, it will be proper to precede it by the remarks of the committee of the directors, by whom it was effected. They say: "A long and difficult negotiation has resulted in the settlement of three-fourths of the balance, and an agreement for the settlement of the remaining fourth. The payment of half the amount, and the agreement for one-fourth, are neither of them such as the committee labored to obtain; yet the terms are better than at any period of the negotiation they could reasonably have expected and although unsatisfactory in themselves, are acceptable under the peculiar circumstances of the case."

The settlement reported to the board on the 21st of December, 1840, was as follows: With Mr. Nicholas Biddle for one-half amounting with interest to $321,220 13 For which there was received from him in payment, three bonds, the receipt of the public of Texas, for five thousand dollars each, and an order on gen. Jas. Hamilton, then in London, to deliver to the cashier, or his order, a bond of the republic of Texas payable in London, for £10,125 12s. 4d. and also ninety bonds of the same, for two hundred and fifty pounds each; with interest upon and exchange, according to a calculation made by Mr. Samuel Jaudon, amount to $31,642 20

Leaving a balance of $119,572 93 For this balance Mr. Biddle agreed to deliver to the bank within one month, Texas bonds, and on the delivery of the last mentioned bonds, the bank agreed to give him a full discharge from its claim on him for his share of the loss on these operations. This contract had been previously made. The committee of the board say in reference to this settlement—"Aware that the Texian securities were much below par in the market, the committee reluctantly agreed to the settlement, under the belief that a better arrangement for the bank could not be, (at least amicably) effected, and in the hope founded on general information, that the bonds might at a distant day, be disposed of without serious loss."

This contract was also acted with Mr. Joseph Cowperthwaite, for one-fourth of the loss, $137,847 74 For which was received in payment Mr. Cowperthwaite's share in certain Danphin county coal land, which cost $120,000, less a mortgage thereon of $10,000 $110,000 Land in Calataung county, New York, which cost, 8,000 Land in Lexington county, Wisconsin and Michigan, 20,000 Boston and Illinois loan company stock, seventeen shares par, 17,000 Commercial and Rail Road company stock, 35,000 Planters' bank of Mississippi, 59 shares par, 5,900 West Feliciana bank, 100 shares par, 10,000 German and Norristown rail road company, 50 shares par, 5,000 Camden and Woodbury rail road company, 100 shares par, 5,000 Loan of Camden and Woodbury rail road company, 12,000 $247,900

And a cash payment, the committee say of "about" 16,000 Making altogether, $263,900

The committee state, in reference to their settlement with Mr. Cowperthwaite, that it was made on the ground, that "with the exception of a few thousand dollars retained to pay other debts, the agreement satisfied all his remaining property." The committee also settled with Mr. S. V. S. Wilder the remaining one-fourth, amounting with interest to $161,793 33 For the purpose of annulling Mr. Wilder's claim, this amount, in cash, the bank of the United States in N. York, loaned to him the sum of $112,000 on the security of

1. Philadelphia county, $20,000
2. Five thousand five hundred acres of "iron land" and two forunces in Colombia county, Pennsylvania, in operation and producing a rent equal to 6 per cent. on $200,000 79,000
3. On his claim upon Wm. E. Robertson, of Mobile, 7,500
4. On his claim on Mr. Biglow, of New York, 5,500 $112,000

The balance was settled by receiving the balance amount from Mr. Wilder in cash, 49,793 33 $161,793 33

Mr. Thomas Dunlap of Philadelphia guarantees under date of December 21, 1840, the faithful and punctual payment of the loans to Mr. Wilder. The committee of the board add "under this arrangement we apprehend no loss to the bank."

Upon the presentation of the report of the committee on advances, to the board on the 21st of December, 1840, no objection was made, to recommend the same for the purpose of having inserted in the name of the party really interested in the one-fourth, for which the settlement was made with Mr. S. V. S. Wilder. This motion did not prevail, but the report was accepted and the committee discharged.

After the report had been read, the following preamble and resolutions were submitted by Mr. James Martin, and unanimously adopted by the directors present, who were Messrs John R. Neff, Joseph Cabot, Lewis Wain, John Connel, Samuel Eyrre, Richard Price, Lawrence Lewis, James Martin, George Hundy and Robert Taylor; Mr. Neff acting by deputation as president pro tem. in the absence of Mr. Dunlap.

"As it appears by the report of the committee on advances, that large transactions have been going on for several years without the sanction or knowledge of the board of directors, and as it further appears, that these transactions were mostly if not wholly for the account and to the profit and loss of the executive officers of this bank at those times, it is due from this board, that their just condemnation of such things should be fully expressed, and recorded: It is therefore

"Resolved, That the business of loaning money exclusively and of right belongs to the board of directors, and that all loans or discounts made by a committee of the board, in concurrence with the officers, should be duly reported to a regular meeting of the board."

"Resolved, That the loaning or discounting on the deposit of collateral security or promissory notes of the officers of the bank is unauthorized, and contrary to the proper administration of the affairs of the bank."

"Resolved, That the large advances made by the officers of the bank, in the periods of 1837-8, and 1838-9, being totally unauthorized and unknown to the board of directors, merits and receives our just censure and condemnation."

By the thirteenth standing rule of the bank, it is provided that its committee on the state of the bank, composed of five members, and elected by ballot every three months, should "at least once during the time of service, examine the evidences of discounted notes, and compare the amount thereof with the balance of the amount of bills discounted in the general ledger; they shall also count the cash, the printed and the unprinted paper in the possession of the bank, and examine the evidences of the public debt and property of the corporation, make an inventory of the same, to be compared with the books, in order to ascertain their agreement and report to the board." The content appears to have been for this committee to confine their examination exclusively to the cash, bills discounted on personal and other security, the issues, and the printed and unprinted bank paper on hand. The second member, of the general state of the bank, submitted to the directors at every stated meeting, contained the items of "bills receivable on bank stock and other security," which included as well the bills receivable for sale of branches as the loans made in the ordinary course of business, and "foreign bills of exchange," under which head was contained the advances on shipments of merchandise. Thus, on the 28th of June, 1838, on which day an examination was reported by the committee on the state of the bank, the sum of $113,064 55 cts. of "foreign bills of exchange," the sum of $7,216,109 34 cts. The committee annex to this report a list of the directors and the several standing committees of the board since the re-charter—(Appendix L.)

Not only in regard to loans and settlements, but in relation to the purchase and sale of stocks, the establishment of agencies and other important measures of general concern, the board of directors were not regularly consulted. Of this, the committee must be permitted to present some instances as illustrative. In September, 1836, the bank purchased the "Merchants' Bank of New Orleans" of the capital of one million of dollars for an advance of 76,250 dollars, and established it as the agent of this bank at that place. On the eighth day of November, 1836, in like manner a purchase was made for $254,000 of the Insurance Bank of Columbus, Georgia. In August, 1837, a purchase was made for the purchase of the charter of "the Hamilton bank," of Baltimore, and the purchase effected, but as the bank never went into operation the advance was a total loss. There was taken from Mr. Joseph Cowperthwaite on the 6th of March, 1839, eighty-nine shares of Bank United States stock at 120 dollars, the bank selling the same day at 118 dollars, less brokerage; and on the 8th of January, 1840, the sum was received from him in cash of one hundred and thirty shares at 100 dollars, the market price of that day being 83 dollars 75 cents. On the 4th of March, 1839, Messrs. Joseph Cowperthwaite, Thomas Dunlap and Joseph Cabot, agreed to purchase of the bank two thousand shares of Philadelphia and Reading rail road company stock, at forty-five dollars per share, on a credit of two years, and on the application of these parties on the 12th of February, 1840, the said contract was annulled. It is stated in a report of the exchange committee of August 28, 1840, and entered on the minutes of the board, that the Philadelphia and Reading rail road company have made a contract with Mr. Jos. Cowperthwaite for a loan of 500,000 dollars in his individual capacity, (which was approved by the company to have been on account of the bank), to be converted into sterling bonds at 4 dollars 90 cents per pound sterling. At this period of that report the sum of 326,000 dollars of this loan had been taken up, which the bank had advanced to the holders of 272,000 dollars, and on that day, (with the assent of the board, assumed the balance unpaid of the contract. Upon the eighteenth day of August, 1839, the bank guaranteed a contract made by Mr. Nicholas Biddle in his individual capacity for the purchase of two thousand five hundred bonds of the state of Mississippi, of two thousand dollars each, amounting in the whole to $5,000,000 dollars. The signature of Mr. Thomas Dunlap, then second assistant cashier, was affixed to the contract in behalf of the bank, upon the verbal authority of the president. Upon the 29th of January, 1839, the bank guaranteed to the state of Michigan, the punctual fulfilment of the obligations of the Morris canal and Banking company, for the purchase of bonds of the state of Indiana, to the extent of $3,140,000 dollars, or $5 cents for 2,700,000 taken at par, and including interest on the instalments payable every three months up to January, 1843. On the 29th of April, 1839, the bank guaranteed a contract entered into by Mr. Thomas Dunlap in his individual capacity for the purchase of one million of dollars of the "Illinois and Michigan canal stock." In regard to these transactions, the committee can find no authority on the minutes of the board, and have been referred to the committee, by the president, upon whom they called for information.

The committee submit herewith (Appendix M.) a statement of the profit and loss account of the contingent fund, and an abstract of the losses chargeable thereto. In this last account there is a charge under date of June 20, 1840, of $400,000 to "parol bank notes account," which has not been explained to the satisfaction of the committee. It must be also mentioned, that among the expenditures of the bank, there is entered, at various dates, commencing May 1838, sums amounting in all to $18,640 dollars 15 cents, as paid on the receipts of Mr. N. Biddle, of "Mr. N. Biddle and J. C. Cowperthwaite," and "cashier's vouchers." As the committee were unable to obtain satisfactory information from the cashier, they have been referred to the books or officers of the bank, application was made by letter to Mr. N. Biddle and Mr. J. C. Cowperthwaite, from whom no reply has been received.

The committee have now performed the task assigned them by the stockholders. They have endeavored to select from the mass of materials submitted to their examination, only such as seemed sufficient to illustrate the general course of the administration of the bank. To have gone more into detail, would have required more time than was allotted to the committee. They have accompanied each particular with full explanations, would have extended their report beyond all reasonable limits. They have given the simple facts without comment; but enough has been presented, it is believed, to enable each stockholder to form his own judgment of the manner in which the interests committed by him to his trustees and agents, the directors and officers, have been managed. To satisfy mere idle curiosity, the committee had no inclination, and would have gladly omitted many of the facts and explanations, they have given. They are confident, however, that they have been reconciled to their sense of duty, to those by whom they were appointed.

DEBATE ON THE PROSPECTIVE PRE-EMPTION BILL.

In Senate, Wednesday, January 29, 1841.

Mr. BUCHANAN said in answer to the remark of the existing land system of the country was that it was based on the soundest principles of wisdom and the truest views of policy. He was as much attached to that system, and as much disposed to adhere to it, as any unbiassed legislator, or senator from Kentucky himself. (Mr. CLAY.) He was in favor of no new experiments upon it, for the wisdom of half a century had proved that no wiser or better plan could be devised by human ingenuity. But, while these arguments were conclusive, he was nevertheless, of opinion that the senators from Kentucky were alarmed at spectres. Mr. B. had witnessed with admiration the gigantic efforts of that gentleman against pre-emption at former sessions, and yet he had never begun to fear, nor did he now indulge the slightest feeling of alarm at the spectre of pre-emption. I think, (said Mr. B.) that the time has now arrived when the pre-emption principle may, with the utmost safety, and with perfect justice, be entrusted to our excellent system for the management of the public domain. Does the introduction of that principle vary, in the least degree, any material portion of that system? No, at all. Does it go to reduce the price of the land? Not, at the utmost, more than three or four cents an acre. What is its nature? Gentlemen should take an extended view of the whole subject before they make up an opinion in regard to its merits. We own a vast wilderness of unsettled lands subject to sale, at times there have been attempts on the part of speculators to monopolize the land, and to sell it at a great profit. No fortunes have been realized in this way, so far as I have heard. In this state of things, it is not our duty, our interest, and our trust policy to encourage the settlement of the new states by the sale of land in small parcels to a general population? And in what does this pre-emption system trench upon, or in the least interfere with the established land system of the country? It only allows the poor man, who wishes to establish himself in a permanent home, to buy for himself a quiet section of land at the full government price. There is the whole of it. In consideration of the expediency and desirableness of filling up this new country with a hardy, and active, and enterprising race of settlers, we do—what? Give them the public land? No, we do not. We do not give them a dollar and an acre, and then give it to them in perpetuity. The difference in the receipts at the treasury from what would have been obtained for the same land at an auction sale has never been estimated higher than six cents an acre, and if assumed to be a dollar and ten more, in expenditure, we are not to be deterred from the subject, that consideration presents no objection in my mind. There is such vast quantities of land, and such a vast and ample choice, that the speculator will never be obliged to give much more than the government price. And as to all the lands taken up by pre-emption rights, they are, when compared to our entire domain, but as a drop in the ocean. Such, at least, has been our past experience. Heretofore, we have been very cautious to pass none but limited pre-emption bills, and we have wisely determined to put down forever the practice of granting what are called "dotas," which was certainly productive of many and great frauds. We have confined the extent of the pre-emption grant to a single quarter section of 160 acres of land, and it is now proposed to make this right of pre-emption prospective and perpetual. The amendment of the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN,) proposes to extend it in regard to every man whose property does not exceed $5,000, not merely to 160, but to 320 acres of land. The senator from Kentucky has proposed a long proposed distribution bill of the senator from Kentucky shall have become a law, (and I presume that day is not far distant,) there will be incorporated into it a provision granting to the actual bona fide settler a pre-emption right to at least 160 acres. Even in his own bill of 1839, unless my memory should fail me, and if it does he will correct me, there was a provision in favor of pre-emption. I repeat that, while I am in favor of the settled land system, such as it now exists, pre-emption has no terror for me.

The honorable senator has thought proper to say something of the "wild, reckless and ruinous legislation" which prevailed under the administration of general Jackson; and said that, during that period in our history, the sessions of congress have been protracted to an unusual length. I was not a member of the senate when he referred to as the longest session ever known took place; but, I ask, what was the cause of the protracted length of that session? I think there is no man who could read, say, six large volumes of "panic" memorials—which were then sent up and flooded both houses. And let him remember the long and eloquent speeches which, for the most part, accompanied their presentation, and he will be convinced that it is not possible that they were the most oppressive, impoverished, and ruined nation that ever existed. And all for what? Why, simply with a view to have the deposits restored to the U. States bank? And are we to be reminded of this, and to be reminded of congress when the true cause is so manifest? General Jackson has now retired to the Hermitage, and may perhaps live to have the judgment of posterity as it were passed upon him. He was an able, sagacious and truly patriotic man, and I now say that those of us who are any such who shall survive during a quarter of a century longer, will live to see the day when Jackson's name and fame shall be cherished alike by persons of all political parties. During the late tremendous presidential canvass, I have heard many a man who was once a friend of him, who denounced him? Not one, at least in my part of the country; and I personally know at least one, and he a man formerly opposed to general Jackson with all his heart, who then lauded him to the very echo. We are thus distinguished man now in power, I would not speak of him the high opinion I entertain.

When he was at the head of the government, I ever obtained from his eulogy. But now, when praise from me or any one else can no longer be suspected to proceed from selfish motives, my heart dictates to me to do him the fullest justice which my tongue can accomplish.

And now, as to the extravagance of the present administration, have we not repeatedly called on gentlemen who are so good as to issue articles, the general charge to specify particulars? Mr. Van Buren inherited the war with the Indians in Florida. He came into power incumbered with an immense debt for the removal of the Indians from the west of the Mississippi, and he transferred the presidency just at the commencement of a great fiscal crisis, which was affecting the concerns of the whole country, dried up the sources of revenue. He had to encounter every conceivable obstacle to a prosperous financial administration of the government. The senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CATTRESS,) can very readily give us the aggregate of expenditure which has accrued, but that is not the question. If the expenditure of a large sum was rendered necessary by the state of the country, who is to blame? No body. The country, who are the cause, who are all open to his inspection, and pointed out, the extravagant and illegitimate charges on the treasury, the administration must answer for it. But, when he merely puts things in the gross without rendering any bill of particulars to prove that the various charges were warranted, and that the aggregate charge falls to the ground. General, indefinite accusations of this kind amount to nothing. If this country is engaged in a just and defensive war, the expenses attending it would no doubt be enormous; would they then be regarded as constituting in itself a just charge against any administration? Surely not. The charge of extravagance in the present case is advanced in the very face of documents going to show that the regular expenditures of the government over which the executive has had any control, have been in a course of gradual diminution from year to year. I sincerely hope that, in this respect, general Harrison may "walk in the footsteps of his predecessor."

I make no war on general Harrison in advance. It is not my nature. I will judge of his acts fairly, and if he should do me wrong, I will do him wrong. He has been in the office of his office for four years, with as little just complaint, on the ground of extravagance as Martin Van Buren will do. I shall consider his administration a most fortunate one in this particular.

On the subject of pre-emption, I find myself sustaining the opinions of general Harrison against his friends here. He gave the strongest evidence, by his action when in the senate, that he was then the friend of pre-emption.

Mr. BUCHANAN, (speaking across.) He professed the same thing in his letters written last summer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not know any thing as to what he may have written last summer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If he adheres to his principles, he is in favor of pre-emption still.

In regard to the secretary of the treasury, although politically his friend, I may say that my intercourse with him has not been very familiar. I shall not enter on the question of the merits of his style as a writer; but I think I can say very correctly, from what he states, how our revenue from imports during the year may amount to $19,000,000. The public papers state that the business of the country is reviving; that there have been more arrivals lately than during the same period for several years past; and as it is otherwise, we would not have a single article of commerce for some time past, it was out of the question to extend our importations. The laws of trade and the interests of individuals alike forbid it. We were obliged to pay up our old debts before we could contract new ones, and we have now no money. We are not now in debt as a people, to Europe, except for the accruing interest on state bonds. The stockholders have fallen off from our foreign commerce, and it now flows freely. The country is exhausted with the war, and the government has now no money to increase to fill up the vacuum. Commerce from abroad will naturally pour into our seaboard, and the revenues of the year are, in my judgment, likely to reach $19,000,000 at least, and I have paid no small degree of attention to the subject. I have no wish to sustain the administration of general Harrison by leaving on his hands an empty treasury. I am free to say that I would rather we had been distinctly informed by the secretary of the treasury, at the commencement of the session, that we must provide for the redemption of the treasury notes, the plain of the issue of treasury notes to this amount? They have now all the benefit of this argument against us, and they will have the advantage of the money also. We shall make provision for giving to great numbers of our citizens the opportunity of purchasing the same, and I think the senator when his friends enter into power, will find that we have swept out the house and left it in a comfortable condition for his reception. [Mr. CLAY, across. Yes, you have swept it clean. A laugh.] And, so far from clearing out the treasury, have given our successors $8,000,000 to commence house-keeping upon.

I conclude by repeating that I am in favor of this pre-emption bill, and equally in favor of the old and long tried land system, and that I have yet seen no new project which will induce me to depart from it.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he should be much obliged to the distinguished senator from Pennsylvania if he would furnish the senate with some of those strong reasons which went to "illustrate the probability of a conjecture" that there would be $10,000,000 of revenue received at the treasury during the present year. The honorable senator, said Mr. C. has referred to the papers of the day as declaring that a considerable revival of business has already taken place. So there has, thank God, since the report of the last election has been known. [A laugh.] But I greatly doubt whether the revenue will at once start up from 13,000,000 to 19,000,000 dollars within a single year. It is too great a leap, considering the condition in which the treasury was left us; and, before I can believe it, I must have the specification of the grounds on which to build such a belief.

The honorable senator spoke of general Jackson, and made that an occasion for pronouncing a eulogy upon his friend. Now, I said no such thing, but directed what I had to say to his administration. The senator, however, has said, and the declaration is to his honor, that the eulogy he pronounced was prompted by his heart. That the late minister to the court of the emperor of all the Russias should have shown emotions of gratitude towards his distinguished patron was to be expected, and the senator would certainly be to blame if he were not so. I certainly shall be the last to find fault with him for giving expression to that gratitude.

It seems, however, according to the honorable senator, that poor Mr. Van Buren came into power under very disadvantageous circumstances. It may be so; and, what is still more unfortunate, these disadvantageous circumstances have continued to exist during every year since by an excess of $8,000,000 a year in our expenditures over the receipts at the treasury. But this was only the poor gentleman's misfortune. The honorable senator tells us not to confine ourselves to general charges, but to go into the specifics of the matter. This will do when we get the papers. We have called on the secretary of the treasury and on the head of the post office department in vain; there is in their possession a great class of papers which are to be seen, but such as the most prodigal administration ever known in England could never have dared to withhold from the investigation of parliament. Give us the papers, and we will present him with items enough, and will show to him and to all the world the immense and extravagant expenditures of the administration now going out of power. But the common sense of the people is guided by no such induction of particulars. They cannot go into all the minute items of a long account. They will look at the footing of the bill; they will compare the present with the past, and promise with performance. But, if the honorable senator challenges us to items, I could occupy days together in showing more than, perhaps, he would like to see. It is true that Mr. Van Buren was not a very good man; but a sort of codicil to a previous administration, and, though most willing to "follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor," has sometimes mistaken the path, and has been unable to save it. Why, our God! can the senator be serious in asking gen. Harrison to follow in the footsteps of an "an Buren"? [A laugh.] If he should one event would follow which the gentleman, perhaps, would be delighted to see; the footsteps would lead him to just such another result as we are now witnessing. But, for myself, I have for general purposes, I trust, been able to show him the way to the right path, and will avoid those devious and downward paths in which his predecessors have walked. I hope he will blaze for himself a new way in the forest. I hope he will put an end to those multiplied abuses which have prostrated the institutions of the country and brought the country itself down to its present low, wretched, and miserable condition. I trust he will better fulfill his promises and pledges as to a wise and prosperous administration of our public affairs.

The senator tells us that he is a great friend to our old and well-tried land system; that he will not disturb it; but is it no alteration of that system to sustain a bill which goes to supersede some of its most important provisions? He tells us that general Harrison is a pre-emptioner, and that he is advocating the doctrines of general Harrison against his friends. But where, I ask, is the evidence of his friendship for our land system and his unwillingness to disturb it, when he opposes such a just and reasonable restriction as is now proposed, and leave the bill almost for shreds in its application and interminable point of time?

The senator over the way (Mr. CLAY, of Alabama), thought no part of my objections worthy of the least notice but that in reference to the loss of the sixteen section reserved in every township for purposes of education. He says my representation of such a subject are groundless, and my representations deceptive, because the sixteen section is already reserved by a provision in the bill. That is matter of construction. It is not reserved by the words of the bill. Suppose a man should settle on the sixteen section, (and how are you going to prevent him!) When it is found that that is a good section, and has been settled on, you will be immediately applied to change the school section in that township altogether. Have we seen nothing like this in time past?

But the senator said that I had always wavered against the new states, and against the people of his state in particular. I deny it; I repudiate the charge. It is his interpretation of my course; but I plead to his jurisdiction, and I deny the truth of his accusation. No, sir; it is the senator himself who is warring against the interests of his own state. It is the senator who is willing to give up that state in the rich and fertile lands of Missouri and Arkansas, and to settle the whole of it, miserable pine barrens. For these he is ready to barter away the inheritance of his own Alabama, in all the rich and abundant regions northwest of the Ohio. No, sir, no, I have been the true friend of the new states, as I hope, of all the states. In offering a just and liberal distribution among them all, of the proceeds of the public domain, and in consideration of the peculiar situation of the new states, I have proposed to add twelve and a half per cent. to the shares in this distribution. Is this the part of an enemy? If the senator chose to say that, in his opinion, I was warring against the interests of his state, it would have been another thing; but I deny his right here, or that of any other senator, to charge me with such a course as to the interests of the new states, and am warring against them. The fact is directly the reverse. I have been consulting their truest interests by urging a just, liberal, generous system of policy, which would at once advance the interests of the new states, and secure the prosperity of every state in the union. I regret that I should have taken occasion to make this remark. It was unnecessary; it was uncalled for. If the senator differs from me in opinion, let him differ like a man, in an open, fair, dignified and courteous manner. Because he opposes my course in reference to the public lands, does it therefore follow that I am hostile to the new states? I trust not, and I hope, in future, that the honorable gentleman will manifest a little more of toleration and of courtesy in his speeches here. The senator chose to use the word "irrevocable," as applied by me to the provision of this bill. I never used the word. I said the bill was interminable in point of time; and in its present form it is interminable, until the requisite authority shall interpose to repeal it.

From a view of the whole subject, I am opposed to the bill, as impairing the amount of revenue to come into the treasury during the present year, thereby engaging a deficit for which provision ought long since to have been made; and as disturbing and availing upon all imagination, and as creating a contest for title among that food of settlers which is invited from all the quarters of the known world to rush in a mass upon our public domain. I have made, and shall continue to make opposition, as heretofore, with this difference, that I no longer merely I opposed pre-emption bills, though only retrospective in their operation, and confined to a particular district, I oppose this the more as being prospective, interminable and reaching to the entire west, and to the public domain. And, most marvellous of all, it is yet said that all this involves no interference whatever with our admirable, our venerable and long-tried land system, which has been so justly lauded on the present occasion.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he did not his purpose to interfere in the dispute between the two senators of the same name, though on opposite sides of the senate and of the question. He should leave them to fight their own battle. I gave my reasons (said Mr. B.) for believing that the revenue during the present year would be greater than that of the past, and in likely to reach $19,000,000.

Mr. CLAY. (Interposing.) Will the senator be so good as to tell us, if the matter stands as he has just represented, how it happens that the secretary of the treasury has estimated the first quarter of the present year at no more than $9,000,000 dollars?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The senator from Kentucky has expressed an opinion contrary to mine. Mine is based on some facts, at least. His, so far as appears, is founded upon nothing.

Mr. CLAY. None except the products of the last year.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; but I have shown a distinction between our circumstances during the last year and this year, and there has been time, as yet, to remedy the first quarter. Why, sir, we have entered but 20 days into that quarter, and what estimate can as yet be formed as to that?

Mr. CLAY. The secretary has made one.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The receipts of this quarter will meet the demands on the treasury for it, not on those of the present year. You cannot, as yet, know what the results will be for this year. There have been great and unusual storms on the occasion, and great destruction of property; but so many arrivals have since arrived, and so many arrivals are expected that the amount of duties at the custom house will be largely increased. Every body can see that the receipts for the first quarter must, of course, fall short, because they depend on the importations of last year, and there has not been time, as yet, to show whether the quarter's estimate for the whole year or my own correct. I calculate that there will be $19,000,000 of revenue, because no reduction of the tariff will occur during the existing laws till the last day of next December. But vast importations, though they increase the last quarter, do not furnish themselves no evidence of national prosperity. On that subject, our history runs one external cycle. One year we import too much, and have more goods than we can pay for. We become alarmed at this, and the next year import too little, and hence the history of our foreign commerce is a history of expansion and contraction, and of perpetually recurring revolutions.

The next thing I shall refer to in the remarks which fell from the honorable senator, was, that his good taste and his good nature, did not induce him to forbear from some remarks upon my poor mission to Russia.

(Mr. CLAY, speaking across.) You filled it so well that you ought not to complain of me on that account.

That, to be sure, is a sugar-plum, which in some measure corrects the acidity of what went before. It comes in very timely, and prevents some remarks in which I might otherwise have indulged. I mean, that great interest that that causes the whole unsolicited by me, and that it was as unexpected as any event, the most improbable, could have been, nor was it desired by me.

(Mr. CLAY across.) No bad thing though—not a word for a man to turn up his nose at.

It was not refused, it is true—but for the reason that it was pressed with so much earnestness by the distinguished man then at the head of the government; to have refused it would have been difficult and ungracious. I accordingly yielded and went abroad; and I can say, for the benefit of any gentlemen (if such there be) who may be looking forward to a foreign mission as some great thing, that he will most assuredly be disappointed, unless, indeed, he happens to be a millionaire. I am glad that I accepted the mission on one occasion, however. I have no doubt general Harrison will in this respect at least walk in the steps of general Jackson. It would be hard indeed should he be deprived of the services of so many distinguished members of congress, by his failure to turn up his nose at it. I prevent their appointment to office. If I read the signs of the times aright, whatever objections there may have existed against gen. Jackson on this score, they will at least be equally well-founded as against his illustrious successor. I have no fault to find should, any of them, happen to be looking out for loaves and fishes, all I can say is that I wish them God speed.

The honorable senator says that the time has not yet come to investigate the extravagance of the Van Buren administration. Well, I hope it may come, and I now venture to say that those who attack it will not be able to show, in the whole course of that administration, any items of censurable extravagance. If any such exist, the opportunity to investigate them is always present. Every penny of the expenditure, down to the last cent, is open before you. What act of congress has Mr. Van Buren violated? In what has he departed from those economical principles we all profess, and which I hope we shall all practice. Every penny of the money we have called on gentlemen to specify particulars, but the senator from Kentucky says that he goes only for aggregates. He looks only at the footing of the bill. Can he defend such a course? With all his ability and eloquence, can he show that this is a fair mode of judging? The question depends not on the gross amount of expenditure, but whether the expenditures have been kept within the proper limit; whether they have been wisely directed. If a man buys what is very valuable he must pay proportionally, and no money has been spent by this administration which was not sanctioned by congress.

On the subject of pre-emption, I think I am perfectly safe, for, although I am a measure, I am the giant arm of the senator from Kentucky, yet I am shielded by that of general Harrison, the distinguished "military chieftain" who is soon to take the head of the government. We have heard that he goes the whole for the pre-emptor, and that he would, then, not be well for the senator from Kentucky to reconsider his opposition? Let him not attack the bill as hostile to the great principles of our land system, because it does not touch upon them at all. It does not reduce the price of the land. It proposes to keep that up at $1 25 per acre. Its whole effect is to give to the industrious and honest settler an opportunity to buy for himself a home, provided he contents himself with a quarter section of land—a small interest indeed on the existing land system—system to which I am quite as much devoted as the senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said he should not protect the debate, but would occupy as little time as possible, for he sought to hasten the engrossment of the bill. He was honored by the remarks of the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY). He had been unfortunate enough to excite that senator's ire because he had controverted the two alleged facts on which the senator relied as objections drawn from the bill. The one was that the bill destroyed and utterly took away the sixteenth or school section in every township; in contradiction to which, Mr. C. had referred to the law of the country which reserved the 16th section beyond the reach of danger. As to the term which the senator had applied to the bill, Mr. C. had quoted it "irrevocable," it was probably "interminable," but Mr. C. considered the two words as much the same. He should like to know the practical difference between them. If the bill was "interminable," did not that deny the power of congress to repeal it just as much as if it was "irrevocable?" Mr. C. said he was disposed to treat the senator from Kentucky with courtesy, but when a measure, in introducing which Mr. C. had taken an active part, was assailed in an unwarrantable manner, he felt bound to defend himself. He complained of Mr. C. for charging him with warring against the own states. He had made such a charge, and he thought himself warranted by facts to do so. The senator, however, was just to his jurisdiction; and yet, in the very next breath, undertook to demand himself against Mr. C. Mr. C. did not claim to be the senator's judge; he was not the judge, nor did he claim jurisdiction over him; he was the complainant, the senator was the party to be tried; the true judge in the case was the country, and its decision Mr. C. would leave to the people. The senator might attempt to constitute himself a judge in this as in many other matters, but Mr. C. should appeal to the people of the United States, and the members of their legislatures. What did they say? They had applied to congress to have the lands of inferior quality placed upon their proper basis; they had remonstrated against and censured the policy which that senator advocated. They had passed upon the question; they had repeated their remonstrances and memorials for fifteen years past, which fully convinced Mr. C. in the matter he had expressed. Had not the senator advocated principles directly in contradiction to the prayer of these memorials? Had he not opposed the reduction of the price even of the swamp lands of Mississippi until the people even of that state had appealed to the justice of this. Mr. C. would be willing to appeal to them; he was ready to make them his judges.—But the appeal came too late; judgment had been already pronounced upon the senator—not by the people but by his constituents, and as such—not by the senators representing the same states.

The senator had talked about the effect of this bill in reducing the public revenue, which he represented as most ruinous; but did the honorable senator forget that he had himself voted to distribute the entire revenue among the states? Would that have no effect in impoverishing the treasury? Mr. C. denied the senator's position to all its bearings. But it was most manifest that the senator's own scheme of distribution was open to the very objection he urged against this bill in its greatest bearing. The senator seemed to have forgotten the policy he had himself been advocating and urging on the country for the last eight or nine years. Mr. C. it seemed, was already judged by the senator for truly representing the interests and sentiments of his constituents; he was not willing, however, that the senator from Kentucky should be his judge on that subject; he was not responsible to him. The senator had implored to Mr. C. the warring against the interests of his own state, when, in fact he was but obeying his voice.

As to gen. Harrison, did the senator doubt that he was pledged, both by his votes in the senate and by his letters since, in favor of pre-emption and graduation? Did the senator doubt that? At one time, in 1828, the senator had a very distinct impression on that subject. When injurious epithets had been used by the senator against the pioneers of the wilderness, the friends of gen. Harrison had deemed it necessary that they should speak for him as to his views on that subject; and the editor of the Commercial Bulletin, a paper published in Missouri, addressed to a letter of gen. Harrison, which was very laconic and to the point, stating that he was in favor of pre-emption, and had always been so. When Mr. C. read the letter he was gratified, and he presumed that he need not assume either the senate or the gentleman from Kentucky that this avowal, together with his former votes in favor of graduation and pre-emption, went very far toward obtaining for gen. Harrison the amount of land he desired. It was very truly said by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) that the professed friends of gen. Harrison were at variance with the votes and opinions of gen. H. himself, and yet they complained of Mr. C. and his friends who were engaged in an effort to establish, in advance, the very principle which the coming president avowed. Mr. C. could not see any plausible objection to the measure; it merely allowed honest settlers to take up a small quantity of land, in preference to speculators and land monopolists, who would otherwise get possession of the lands and hold them up for sale.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he would add but two or three words in reply. Nothing was further from Mr. C.'s mind, my purpose, to what I said when Mr. C. said, to intimate that the worthy senator from Pennsylvania, my chairman in the committee of foreign relations, did any thing improper in accepting the offer of his late mission to Russia; far, very far from it. I know what he has standing with his party, which no doubt in the offer of such an appointment; nor do I doubt that, in accepting it, he yielded to the earnest and pressing solicitations of his worthy chief, a former president of the United States. I said that the motive which led to it was a sense of gratitude, and this feeling must doubtless have been greatly increased by the circumstances to which he referred. Besides, a foreign mission, and that a mission to Russia, is not a thing to be sneered at. No doubt the worthy senator, in fulfilling his distinguished appointment, may have suffered much in his family affairs, and his separation from those to whom he may be bound in tender ties; and if he went, it was merely to oblige his friend and patron, who urged the appointment upon him.

A word to the senator from Alabama. He says that I have been condemned in my views of policy by all the nine new landed states. And the senator no doubt is very correct! What says Ohio? She has been zealous for the policy I advocate for these eight years past. The governor, in his message to the state legislature, sanctions and recommends it. What says Indiana? Her legislature is in favor of my distribution policy by a majority of sixty votes; and she has not voted against it. And I find no conflict, that, where that measure that is presented to this body there will be scarce a senator from the new states but will be in favor of it, recommended as it is by all just and generous principles and considerations which address themselves to the mind of a free people.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, explained. He had referred to the opinions expressed by the new states during the fifteen years last past. He might have been mistaken as to Ohio for a few years. In the course of the fifteen years, however, of the hands of a party openly opposed to graduation, the friends of the present bill could entertain no hope.

The question was now put on Mr. HENTON's amendment, restricting the operation of the bill to two years, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 22, nays 22.

The president of the senate voting in the negative, the amendment was rejected.

A motion was then made that the senate adjourn. Mr. MANGUM said that, if the friends of the bill would give up the question and obtain the adjournment pledged by his previous promise to do so in that effort, and if they insisted, he must vote against adjournment, and repeat that vote as often as they wished it.

Mr. SEVIER said he hoped there would be no adjournment. He was for sticking to it, for, among on the ground. That was the only way in which they ever should get the question.

The motion to adjourn having been withdrawn, the question was put on Mr. HENTON's amendment, to insert an additional section, confining the operation of the bill to two years only, and decided in the negative, as follows: yeas 18, nays 28.

So the amendment was rejected. The question now recurring on Mr. WHITE's amendment, withholding from the section of the bill lands granted for canal purposes; Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, accepted that amendment as a modification of the bill.

The question next recurring on the amendment moved by Mr. PORTER, a motion requiring the pre-emptor to satisfy the register that he had resided on his land for four months—

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, opposed the amendment. The question had been tried already in the vote upon the amendment proposed by the senator from Vermont, (Mr. PAXTON), and rejected. He was astonished that an amendment of this character should come from the senator from Michigan.

Mr. PORTER, though as usual most imperfectly heard by the reporter, was understood to say that his amendment was not the same with that of the senator from Vermont, inasmuch as it applied to land unsurveyed. Without some provision of this kind, credit might have been obtained for five years. His object was to protect the settler from the land speculator. By the law of 1820, if a hundred men went on a quarter section, built a cabin, grubbed a few roots, and slept there one night, each of them would be entitled to a pre-emption. Mr. P. had been opposed to such policy. He did not want the land speculator to come in and try to settle it. The bill would operate injuriously to his state. It would in fact give the land to the log cabin and not to the tenant, for the man who had built his cabin and got his pre-emption would then quit and leave the log cabin to hold the land. Mr. P. meant his amendment to apply only to land unsurveyed.

The question being put on Mr. PORTER's amendment, it was rejected: yeas 20, nays 23.

The bill was now reported from the committee of the whole, and the question being on the senator's concurring in the amendments as reported from the committee—

Mr. TALLMAGE said that one amendment agreed to in committee made the bill read "every white man, being the head of a family &c." Mr. T. had voted for it without discussion, and he regretted that there were some states where a free colored man could not hold landed property. He had since been informed that in every state they could hold it, and might enter the land at private sale, and he should, therefore, change his vote.

The amendment referred to was accepted; and the question recurring upon concurring with all the remaining amendments, it passed in the affirmative.

The question being then put on striking out the word "white," it was negatived.

Mr. CATTENDEN said that he felt extremely reluctant to delay the action of the senate. The subject had been debated for a long time, and he saw gentlemen were very impatient. One senator had intimated that they were never to get a bill till they agreed to encamp on this ground, and sit it out.—Under these circumstances he should not move to adjourn, but a sense of duty would compel him to offer to the senate the amendment he had previously introduced.

Mr. C. thereupon moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to amend it by restricting the pre-emption to settlers not over one thousand dollars, and by adding a provision for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the states. Mr. HENTON, in reply, said that with view to allow the senator from Kentucky an opportunity to advocate his amendment, he would move to adjourn.

After some conversation, the question was put, and decided in the negative: yeas 22, nays 23.

The question was then put on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mangum, Nelson, Nicholas, Nicholson, Norvell, Percer, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Weil, White, Williams, Wright, Young—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rowe, Rogers, Southard—17.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed; and then on motion of Mr. CATTENDEN, the senate adjourned.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The steam ship Columbia, captain Judkins, arrived at Boston, on the 19th inst. She left Liverpool on the 4th.

No news of great importance. The press of England appears to have been discussing the McLaco question with a great deal of ardor.

The arrival of the packet ship Patrick Henry, with general Harrison on board, and of the Britannia, with dispatches for the British government, tended to allay a most feverish excitement which had prevailed in all classes, and our last advices show a much better feeling towards this country and its great advance in the money market.

The Great Western was not to sail till the 8th.—She was at first ordered to call at Halifax, from fear of difficulties arising between this country and England. The intention of calling at Halifax was relinquished in consequence of the procebal advice recently received from the United States.

The greatest anxiety prevailed in England at the time of the departure of the Columbia at the non-arrival of the steam ship president; fearful anticipations were entertained that she had met with some serious accident.

The Britannia arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday the 13th ult. in 15 days from this port.

The packet ship Patrick Henry, capt. Delano, arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday, after a remarkably rapid passage of 15 days and 10 hours. She left that city on the 8th inst. at 2 o'clock, P. M., and took pilot off Liverpool on the morning of the 24th, at 5 A. M.

[London Times.] The Times of the 22d inst., say, "government received despatches from Mr. Fox by the same steamer which brought out letters and papers, and these despatches leave no doubt of an amicable and immediate settlement between the United States and Great Britain as far as regards the question of McLaco. Mr. Fox has received a communication to that effect from the American government—touching in the most conciliatory language.—We think the public mind may be at rest on this point."

The Morning Chronicle of the same date says, "the news from the United States, by the Britannia steamer, may be looked upon in a two-fold character—political and commercial. In regard to the first, the contents are considered very favorable, and the best evidence of that is, that the funds have risen in consequence 4 per cent. The only points considered to be at issue now are, the time and manner of Mr. McLaco's libration, for all fees for his salary, or indeed conviction, are at an end."

The commercial intelligence from America is not so gratifying as the political. The money market was very much depressed; capitalists represented as desirous to limit their liabilities, and the masses as evincing an inclination to hoard. It must be kept in view, however, that when the Britannia nat-ed the Americans were not aware that the bills drawn up on the three London houses by the Bank of the United States had been accepted—we may reasonably look for some revival of confidence and appearance of better things when this shall have become known."

An extraordinary excitement appears to have prevailed previous to the arrival of the Britannia, but it will be seen by these extracts from the leading London papers, that this panic had ceased immediately after her news became known.

A large meeting is announced to take place in Glasgow soon, which will embrace the broad general question of the duties on every description of goods and produce imported into the United Kingdom, including, of course, the duties levied upon corn and provisions.

It is now stated that sir William Parker will succeed admiral Elliot in China.

FRANCE.

Anarchic movement. The French government received the following telegraphic dispatch from Marseilles, March 24th.

"Profet de los Boudes du Rhone to the ministers of the interior.

"Some anarchists of the lowest class attempted a movement last night; we were on our guard. From 12 to 15 individuals, most of them beavers of arms and cartridges, have been arrested. Justice is making inquiries. Every thing is perfectly tranquil."

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

Land office.

Garret Elkin, register of the land office at Springfield, Illinois, vice Marvelous Eastman.

John Beard, receiver of public moneys at Crawfordsville, Indiana, vice Anshure Whitlock, (appointed in the place of Marks Crume), who declines the appointment.

Surgeons general.

William Pelham, for the state of Arkansas.

Benjamin A. Ludlow, for the district south of Tennessee.

George C. Bates, for Michigan.

Baldie Peyton, for eastern district of Louisiana.

Joshua A. Spencer, for northern district of New York.

Marshal.

Silas M. Stillwell, to be marshal of the United States for the southern district of New York.

Collector.

Willis H. Arnold, collector of the customs for the district of Pearl river, Mi. vice Isaac W. Jewett.

CONSULS. The president has recognized the following consuls and vice consuls to the U. States, viz:

Moses Patten consul of Texas for the port of Brown, in the state of Maine.

Janet Winthrop Andrews consul of Greece for the port of Boston and its dependencies, in the state of Massachusetts.

John Lucius Hedley, vice consul of Portugal at Charleston, in the state of South Carolina.

Lawrence A. Edmondston vice consul of Sardinia, for the state of South Carolina, to reside at Charleston.

TYLER: May not the good people of this republic be spared from an idle controversy in regard to the application by which the person now at the head of its executive department shall be designated?—The Richmond Enquirer took occasion conspicuously to style Mr. Tyler as the "retiring president."

The National Intelligencer insists that the vice president in case of the death of the president, succeeds, under the provisions of the constitution to the appellation of, as well as to the powers and duties of, "president of the United States." The New York Post takes part with the Enquirer, and refuses to allow that Mr. Tyler is "the president."

The editor of the Enquirer reiterates, that he is willing to allow Mr. Tyler "all the powers and duties of the office—full powers, and all its duties."

He may ride upon the top of his countryman—but after all, he does not succeed to the title of "president of the United States," and promised his readers more upon the subject as soon as they have leisure!

TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE PRESIDENT, WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

Amongst the papers which now daily reach us from the various sections of the union, we find one many that contain president Harrison's inaugural address, and accounts of the enthusiasm with which he was hailed on his arrival at the capitol to assume one of the most elevated positions in all the circle of human authority; and the next paper which we open is surrounded with all the habiliments of mourning, and its pages filled with melancholy testimonials of a bereaved people, mourning their departed chief. We have received a number of urgent requests already, to register those public expressions. It must be obvious to all, that our tributes can afford but a mere specimen of what has been uttered from almost every community and association in the union—sufficient will be given from which, in the far future, a correct idea may be formed of how this people respect the man of their choice, and how deeply they lament his loss.

The few numbers of gen. Harrison's family that were remaining in Washington, departed from the city yesterday. The sympathies of a nation will follow them, and as soon as that nation can express its disposition through the constitutional channels, we trust the family of gen. Harrison will receive a testimony more substantial than words.

A letter from Cincinnati says, that HARRISON had reached that city on her way to Washington the morning on which the intelligence of the president's death reached there. Her bereavement has been and indeed—but she bears it, I am informed, better than, in her infirm state of health, could have been hoped. Most of her family are near her, to support and comfort her, and if the sympathy of a whole nation can avail, we may hope that her loss will not be altogether irreparable.

Gen. Harrison's wife.

Gen. Harrison, among the songs sung was a plaintive domestic one, happy in its 'tho's and touching in its language, entitled "My Old Wife."

The language was strikingly adapted to the happy life and loves of general Harrison and his "old wife," both of whom found in the society of each other the most perfect happiness which it is possible to enjoy. The music was overpowering at the time, recalling as it did the evan's of years of uninterrupted domestic bliss. Mrs. Harrison went like a child, and as tears continued to flow from the fountains of sympathy are not dried up, the husband of the "old wife" could not refrain from weeping also. The remark of Mrs. Harrison in excuse for what she deemed a woman's weakness, was the demand of change, which of necessity must come—a change of residence from North Bend to Washington, and in a change of condition from the humble citizen superintending his farm, to the president of a nation, with the cares and responsibilities of government upon his shoulders. "I wish," said Mrs. H. "that I had been a woman of more than 100 years of age, and that I had been a widow before I was married. I am now a widow, and before the eyes of the reader are fixed upon the paragraph we write, retaining the similitude of the former, how fully have been the dark forebodings of the wife realized! She who a week since was "the good old wife," is now the lone widow, and before the eyes of the reader are fixed upon the paragraph we write, retaining the similitude of the former, how fully have been the dark forebodings of the wife realized! She who a week since was "the good old wife," is now the lone widow, and before the eyes of the reader are fixed upon the paragraph we write, retaining the similitude of the former, how fully have been the dark forebodings of the wife realized!

There is a tear for all who die.

A mourner o'er the humblest grave; But Nations swell the funeral cry.

And triumph weeps above the bier."

A nation has wept the funeral of the dead. We hope the general mourning of the nation, the sympathies and prayers of the people, will be remembrances for the consolation of "the good old wife" of the deceased patriot who has left us.

The last scene. One of the most affecting incidents of the interment of our late venerated chief magistrate occurred at the moment those who had deposited his remains in the vault ascended from it. His devoted friends, gov. Chambers and col. Todd, stepped from the lower circle of mourners—descended into the vault—stood by his coffin. Thus, as it were, literally descending into the grave with the man by whose side they last stood in the field of battle, in the hour of death, and in the hour of support and aid, in the day of his adversity, they had rallied in the feelings of their affection, with undimmed firmness and untiring zeal.

Nous had rejoiced more sincerely in his triumph, or participated more largely in his confidence. They watched over him with more than brotherly affection in health—stood by his bedside and administered to his wants in his last moments—closed his eyes in death—mourned over his ill-fated body, and descended with it to place of final rest. The many tears which stood upon their faces as they ascended from the vault bespeak their consciousness that their intercourse with the friend they loved had closed forever.

This affecting example of gov. Chambers and col. Todd was immediately followed by the relatives of the deceased, by president Tyler, and each of his cabinet, and by ex-president Adams, and none others who were present. Need I picture the moral sublimity of the scene?

AN EYE WITNESS.

The public feeling. As a steambat was about leaving Wheeling, crowded with passengers, a heartless man observed that he regretted the president's death as a public blessing. The remark startled those who heard it, and, for a time, deep silence was the only answer which was made. At length a man, venerable in appearance and years, in a voice aided with grief, said, such wanton levity was not consistent with a true American, and that he would not travel with any one who could so speak. All the passengers concurred in this opinion, and the vessel was ordered on shore as being unfit to associate with men.

Gen. Harrison's last letter. On Saturday the 10th inst. a happy, weather-beaten, but very respectable-looking woman presented herself to the collector, at the custom house, and inquiring for Mr. Curtis, said, "general Harrison told me to give this letter to your own hand. He told me to give his kind respects to Mr. Curtis, and said, 'Mr. Curtis, as his friend, and would be very glad to see him.' He enclosed the letter, and found it to be, from its date, one of the last, if not the very last I letter, written by gen. Harrison. It bears date of the day when his illness commenced. The words were, 'My dear Mr. Curtis, it is that, amidst all the cares and troubles of his high position, he was true to the humblest of his old friends. Tucker says the general made him come to the dinner table with the great folks, and when he hesitated and intimated that he had better go down for his dinner, the general said, 'Tucker you and I have been shipmates, and a long time together. You are an honest man; come and eat your dinner with me, and come here again to-morrow morning and get your breakfast with me.'"

Tucker says the general invited him to stay in Washington, and told him he would take care of him, but his wife and children being in New York, Tucker preferred to return. He says gen. H. followed him into the grounds to the east side of the white house, and then walked with him arm in arm, that the general had no talon, and when Tucker averred to his liability to take cold, he waived the remark by saying he would take care of him. He received the letter from the general, Tucker says he followed him to the door, and shook him by the hand, saying, "go to my friend Mr. Curtis, and after you have been to him, don't forget to write to me that you and your wife and children are happy again."

Tucker says he had no money in come home by land, but he did not let the general know that, for he knew he would give it to him in a note, and he did not wish to take money from an old one who had been so kind to him. And so Tucker went on board the schooner L. L. Sturgis, at Alexandria, and worked his passage home to New York. When he came to the custom house he had been there thirty minutes, and having first brand the red ribbon of the death of his kind benefactor as he passed up the old ship dock, he almost at tears that left down his hardly earned treasure that his is an ungrateful heart.

We are glad to hear that Mr. Curtis immediately appointed Mr. Tucker an inspector of the customs.

[N. F. Com. Adver.]

Washington, 24th March, 1841.

"DEAR SIR—The late Mr. Thos. M. Thompson, a veteran seaman, came with me from Car-thagen, as the mate of the brig Monimia, in the year 1829. In an association of several weeks I imbibed a high opinion of his character—so much so that (expressing a desire to leave the sea) I invited him to come to New Bend and spend the remainder of his days with me. Subsequent events prevented his doing so, as he was desirous to bring some money with him to commence farming operations. His bad fortune still continues, having been several times shipwrecked within a few years. He says that himself and family are now in such a situation that the humblest employment would be acceptable to him, and I write this to recommend him to your favorable notice. I am persuaded that no one poster, in a higher degree, the virtues of fidelity, honesty and indomitable industry, and I might add, of indomitable bravery, if that was a quality necessary for the kind of employment he seeks—Yours very truly, W. H. HARRISON.

"Edward Curtis, esp. collector, New York."

An incident in the New York procession. The N. York Sun says: "Very creditable to the respectful consuls of England and France, was the method adopted by them to attest their sympathy with the citizens of this republic in their late national bereavement. These two gentlemen, we are glad to notice, appeared in the ranks of the great funeral procession, each bearing the furled flag of his respective country, enshroued in crape. A very happy incident, and one well calculated to promote that good feeling between the citizens of this republic and the governments represented by these gen. consuls, which now exists, and we hope always will exist, and never cease to strengthen with age."

Gen. Harrison and Judge Burnett. At the meeting of the committee in Cincinnati to agree upon suitable resolutions to express their feelings on the melancholy occasion of gen. Harrison's death, a motion was made and unanimously adopted, that judge BENNETT be requested to deliver the eulogy upon the late president. The judge was present before chairman of the committee. He declined the request, and "never," says the Cincinnati Republican, "did we witness deeper feeling or listen to truer eloquence than in the remarks he made." "I cannot accept," said he, "I could not speak. I knew gen. Harrison forty-six years ago, he was a brother to me then; we have been brothers ever since; our souls were knit together, and I would choose to die to attempt to speak of him. He is the last of the little brave men of the olden time, and now come all alone, and I cannot talk of my friend, and now come all alone. And the many tears fell down his cheeks, and the sobbings were heard coming alike from the aged and the young of both parties told the deep sympathy which he felt. The general felt the death. It overcame all who witnessed it."

MAINE. A great and honorable tribute. The members of the legislature of Maine went in the fourth boat of all goodness to find consolation for the loss of the beloved chief magistrate of the nation. The governor sent a suitable message to the legislature announcing the melancholy event, and resolutions were adopted, commensurate the name and services of the illustrious dead. In joint meeting, also, the following order was adopted, creditable alike to the state and the legislature:

Ordered, That in view of the death of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, president of these U. States, the two branches of the legislature meet to alter their adjournment, will repair to the meeting houses of this town, and attend prayers, that this dispensation of Divine Providence may have its proper influence upon the people of this Commonwealth.

NEW YORK. Funeral honors. The citizens of Albany, partaking of the general sorrow for the nation's bereavement, solemnized the event on Friday by a funeral procession. Though the day was rendered unpropitious by falling rain, it did not interrupt the formation of the procession or materially diminish the number of those who participated in the national ceremonies. The day most severely was by the falling of a deluge of water, and the falling of the bells of the churches, and the heaving and places of public resort and most of the stores were dressed in deep mourning; the national flag, shrouded in crape, hung from the principal residences, and the bells of the churches, and the capitol, the public buildings, and the various ships, hung in the harbor. The governor and his suite, the senate and house of assembly of the state, the municipal councils of Albany and city and county, and the various military and civil associations, and the various associations of all descriptions, took part in great numbers on the occasion, swelling the procession to upwards of a mile in length, which moved through the principal streets of the city, and was accompanied by a deep and mournful wailing, and a deep and heart-felt sorrow, to the church which had been selected for the performance of the religious exercises. After the conclusion of these ceremonies, a eulogium on the life, character and virtues of the deceased president was pronounced by the rev. Dr. Sprague, which is described as a masterly display of talent, eloquence, pathos, and well calculated, on an occasion so fraught with all that could touch the feelings or awaken the sensibilities of the soul, to enchain an audience in deep and breathless attention, and to diminish all present of the vanity of earthly greatness and the folly of human hopes.

The torch light procession. This novel and most imposing part of the obsequies in honor of the illustrious dead, says the Albany Evening Journal, took place on Saturday evening. It was arranged under the auspices and direction of the friends of Albany—ever ready at the call of duty or patriotism. The procession was composed of members of the different companies, their firemen's dresses accompanied by a full band of music, and bearing the funeral urn covered with its pall—the whole illuminated by the light of upwards of 600 torches. It passed through the principal streets of the city between 8 and 10 o'clock, and the streets were still and very dark; and the effect produced by the long array of mourners at that unusual hour—the funeral emblem—the solemn music, and the strong red glare of the torches, revealing from the gloom and lighting up with picturesque effect the houses and crowds of spectators which thronged the windows as they passed, left an impression which will not soon be effaced from the memory of those who beheld it.

This striking and effective testimonial of the grief of the people for the lamented Harrison fully closed the week which the tidings of his death had rendered indeed a period of heaviest and mourning.

The procession. The New York Evening Post says—The funeral procession on Saturday, in honor of the memory of the late president, was composed, it is estimated, of about thirty thousand persons. All the torches, revealing from the gloom and lighting up with picturesque effect the houses and crowds of spectators which thronged the windows as they passed, left an impression which will not soon be effaced from the memory of those who beheld it.

PERU. In the Lexander Examiner, we find among the names of the speakers who addressed the meeting called by the mayor of that city on the melancholy occasion, that of senator Buchanan—of whom the account says: "Owing to his peculiar position we were particularly pleased with the sentiments of the honorable James Buchanan. He was truly eloquent, and spoke not only as a statesman and patriot should speak on such an occasion—but as a republican—a true liberal American."

MARYLAND. The Baltimore committee arranged for paying public honors due to the memory of the late president of the United States unanimously voted to request that justice Taney to deliver the oration on the occasion. From the following reply it will be seen that he has been especially obliged to decline the invitation:

Baltimore, April 13, 1841.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the honor of your letter, and to say that it is my power to comply with the wishes of the committee, in delivering an oration at the celebration of the funeral obsequies of the lamented general Harrison, late president of the United States. But I am only now recovering from an illness under which I suffered during the late winter, and have not the physical strength to deliver an oration to a crowded audience. I am ready, however, to unite most cordially with my fellow citizens of Baltimore in the expression of their justly due and deep sympathy for the nation's bereavement, and in the memory of the distinguished dead, in any other station in which the committee may think it proper to place me. I am, gentlemen, with high respect and regard,

Yours very truly, SAMUEL MOORE, S. C. LESQUIER, James Carroll, Z. Collins Lee, and Columbus O'Donnell, esqs.

JONATHAN McKEITHEN, esq. has accepted the invitation to deliver the funeral oration on Monday next.

VIRGINIA. A tribute to the memory of the late president. At a meeting of the citizens of Richmond, convened at Trinity church on Thursday, the 8th inst. general Wm. Lymbeth G. Wayne of the city, presided, and Mr. John M. W. Munford, appointed secretary.

On motion of Mr. B. W. Leigh, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

The citizens of Richmond, assembled in general meeting, on occasion of the lamented death of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, late president of the United States, all hearts united in the desire to pay meed honors to the memory of the common chief magistrate of the people, are sensible that they cannot more effectually render such honors, than by testifying, thus publicly, the respect, veneration and love they bore him, while living; their grateful sense of his exalted services, and private life, as a signal and honorable illustration of his life, and of his eminent and distinguished public services; and their sorrow for the awful dispensation of Providence, that has so suddenly removed him from the high station to which he had been recently called by the well-earned confidence of his country, and bereaved the people of his firmness, moderation, patriotism and wisdom, in the administration of their affairs:

Resolved, unanimously, That the citizens of Richmond be assembled, with themselves, and their representatives, at their fellow citizens shall likewise, put on and wear the usual badge of mourning for the illustrious dead, for one month.

And then the meeting adjourned.

WM. LAMBERT, pres't.

Geo. W. Maynard, sec'y.

The common council of the city of Richmond, also passed on Saturday last, after an appropriate preamble, the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, therefore, That the city of Richmond be recommended to our fellow citizens, to set apart Friday, the 16th day of the present month, as a day of mourning, and that the reverend clergy of all denominations of this place be requested to hold, on that day, at 11 o'clock, A. M. in their respective places of worship, such religious services as they may deem appropriate to the solemn occasion.

2. Resolved, That we also recommend to our fellow citizens on that day, to suspend all ordinary business from the hours of 10, A. M. until 2, P. M.

3. Resolved, That the president of the common council be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the respective mayors of the borough of Norfolk and town of Petersburg.

We have given the very full and graphic account of general Harrison's funeral at Washington, and the details of the National Intelligence. The final destination of his remains most probably awaits the wishes and decision of his distressed family. One rumor is, that they will be brought to his native seat of Berkeley, in this state; another, that they will be carried to North Bend.

The Richmond Enquirer of Tuesday, thus announced the event:

Death of the president of the United States. A new and extraordinary event has taken place in the annals of our country. The struggle is over, and William Henry Harrison, in the 69th year of his age, sleeps with his fathers! Although this venerable man, the president of the United States by a great majority, was not our choice, yet we respect him for his military services—we respect him for his love of country—we esteem him for his kind heart and his social qualities. His sudden loss comes upon the nation as an event, full of regret, full of profound themes for musing upon the instability of all human fortunes, and the weakness of the objects of human ambition. As often quoted from Burke, it shows us "what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue." But twelve months ago, suppose it had been predicted amidst the shouts of excited camps, and amidst the plaudits of a multitude, that this man would be elected to one of the highest offices in the world, and in one short month after his inauguration, he would be gathered unto his fathers!—what heart would not have shrunk within itself, at the idea of passing so rapidly from a private life to the presidential chair, and from that exalted station to the silent tomb? In honor of the chief magistrate of our common country, thus elevated by the voice of the people, and thus suddenly struck down in the midst of his philanthropic enterprises, we have crowded our columns in mourning.

It is indeed, a sudden, most unexpected, and extraordinary event. This confederated republic of the United States has now been in operation for 52 years—during which time it has seen nine presidents elected in succession—most of them old men, five of them serving eight years each—and yet not one of them has died during his presidency, except the last. He has been in office but one short month, from the 4th of March to the 4th of April, when he breathed his last, and his prayers for the success of the true principles of the constitution.

The four Virginia presidents who were living in Virginia, (all serving their eight years) survived till the end of their terms, but now are all no more. The life of the others are still living.

It is more wonderful, indeed, that more of them have not perished in office, than that gen. Harrison should be the first to die. The regret at his death comes, perhaps, with a more awful force, on account of its singularity.

Georgia. The painful news reached Savannah, (Georgia), on the morning of the 8th inst and produced a like sensation among all classes of citizens. A public meeting was held, Judge Wayne, of the supreme court, presided, at which resolutions were adopted expressive of the public feeling under the national calamity, and of sympathy for the bereaved family under the affliction. A committee was also appointed to select a citizen to pronounce a eulogy on the life and character of the deceased, and make the necessary arrangements for the occasion. The city council of Savannah also took order on the melancholy subject. Premising that the death of president Harrison was a national calamity, they did not acknowledge by a without mention of party, and that a meeting of the citizens was about to be held, the council resolved that the board would cordially unite with the citizens in such action on the subject as should be determined on by the town.

Ohio. Referring to the death of president HARRISON, the Cincinnati Gazette of the 10th says—

"We have never before seen the hand of sorrow laid so heavily upon any community, as it has been upon this for the past two days. Yesterday in particular, the tidings of the national calamity had been circulated over the entire city by the newspapers, the evidences of a deep and poignant grief were visible in all countenances. The calamity which has thrown the whole union into mourning, and which with a peculiar and almost touching every heart, but entering every dwelling, and dispensing gloom to every heart. We have lost not merely a great and distinguished countryman, but a citizen, an associate, a friend, a brother; one endeared to us by qualities but seldom found united in the same bosom, and grappled to our hearts by recollections that will go with us to our tombs.

Yesterday most of our stores were closed—the cars of labor retorted—bells tolled at intervals throughout the day—many guns were fired—our public schools were dismissed—and our city was given up to an expression, felt keenly, and openly indignant of profoundest sorrow.

All classes partake in this feeling, yet all bow down to the inevitable dispensation, of Him who chains upon his foes.

MICHIGAN. The intelligence of the death of the late president first reached the city of Detroit, on Saturday, the 10th inst, at 1 o'clock, by the steamboat Gen. Scott, which entered the port from the lake, with her flag at half mast. The melancholy intelligence, was soon spread over the city, and the stores and public offices were at once closed, and a heavy gloom settled upon the countenances of all the citizens. The flags above the capital and the colors of the shipping were lowered to half mast, while the church bells were tolled in mournful union with the feelings of the community.

Public meeting in Washington. The following notice having been circulated in the city, in handbills, on Thursday, the 8th of April, viz:

"General WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, the great president of the United States and the great exponent of whig principles, having departed this life, the whigs of WASHINGTON are requested to meet at the city hall, this evening, at 7 o'clock, in the Assembly rooms, on Louisiana avenue, for the purpose of adopting resolutions suitable to list mourning, which has carried poignant grief to the hearts of every good citizen. MANY WHIGS—The whigs of Detroit, a large meeting, on Thursday, took place at the time and place mentioned. Gen. WALTER JONES was called to the chair, WILLIAM L. BERRY and GEORGE SWENY were appointed vice presidents, and ROBERT FARNHAM and GEO. WATKINS, secretaries of the association. The meeting was opened by gen. JONES, with a brief but eloquent address, explanatory of the objects of the call.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, it was resolved, that the committee be and are authorized to prepare and report resolutions for the consideration of the meeting; and the following gentlemen were thereupon nominated and appointed the committee, viz: Messrs. P. R. FENNELL, D. A. HALL, S. H. HAYST, J. M. HARRIS, J. H. BENDLEY, Jacob Gibson and James F. Hallock.

The committee, after a short absence, reported the following resolutions, which, after some just and appropriate introductory remarks by the chairman, were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That this meeting, with its sympathies with their fellow citizen, throughout the union in the loss of WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, late president of the United States, of whom an untimely death has bereaved a grateful and admiring country, at a moment of deep interest to her prosperity, her institutions, and her destinies, after a life crowded by illustrious services, and adorned by virtues of one elevated and exalted, and earned a life long enough for glory, but, alas! too short for hope.

2. Resolved, That the heart-felt condolence of this meeting be tendered to the family of the deceased; in whose hearts the memory of his domestic virtues has been cherished, and which need not the splendor of his public character to enhance either their love or their grief.

3. Resolved, That the blow which, in the death of president HARRISON, has stricken the whole nation, falls with peculiar severity upon the hearts of the people of the District of Columbia, who have found in him, not the ruler that "felt power and forgot right," but a father and a friend; a chief magistrate who regarded all within his power as being under his protection; and, who, in the face of the world, offered, not only the rights of the people of the District of Columbia as American citizens.

4. Resolved, That, amid their anguish for the loss of their paternal president, the citizens of this District are, nevertheless, rejoiced that the administration is to be administered by JOHN TYLER, who, while a senator of the United States, proved himself their constant, enlightened and efficient friend; and who more recently avowed, publicly and emphatically, his devotion to their welfare.

5. Resolved, That, as the whigs of Washington, together with the whigs of the other cities of the District, were among the first to raise a voice for "HARRISON, TYLER and ANTI-SLAVERY," as it becomes us to be forward in our support, we now do so respectfully, but most earnestly, our political brethren in the several states to rally around the standard of the constitution in the novel and interesting trial to which it is subjected; and to give their unanimous, vigorous, and patriotic support to the administration of president TYLER, on whom the mantle of the illustrious and beloved HARRISON has fallen.

6. Resolved, That in the signal ability with which president TYLER, a favorite son of the ancient and glorious commonwealth of Virginia, has heretofore discharged various high political trusts; in the principles on which he was elected to the vice presidency; in his prompt and cordial invitation to president HARRISON, vigorous and patriotic support to continue their services; in his proved republicanism; in his lofty honor; and in the purity of his life, this meeting feels full assurance that the momentous trust devolving on him will be administered wisely and faithfully, with loyalty to the whig principles that have brought him into power, and with adherence to the administrative policy to which his predecessor stood pledged; and, to express all our fond hopes and unflinching convictions in a single phrase, that "JOHN TYLER, his HARRISON, will be the PRESIDENT OF THE PEOPLE."

On motion of Mr. M. Saint Clair Clarke, it was unanimously resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the several whig newspapers of the District of Columbia.

WALTER JONES, chairman.
ROBERT FARNHAM, secretary.
GEORGE WATKINS, do.

PRESIDENT TYLER. The following letter from governor, now in the city, to Mr. W. Robinson, jr. of Pittsburgh, will be read with peculiar interest, at this moment. His views on the important question of the tariff—the distribution of the public lands, and incidentally on the subject of the currency are briefly and clearly indicated.

Washington, Pa. Oct. 17, 1840.
My dear sir: Your letter and its enclosure reached me a few hours after my own arrival. I confess myself at all surprised at the gross perversion of all truth, on the part of our opponents. This is not confined to Pittsburgh, but is everywhere the case. The administration party are open mouthed against the compromise. They would annihilate it entirely; and this, at the moment the manufacturing interest become deeply interested in its preservation. With you the tone is changed—Wm. M. Van Buren is here sustained as a friend to free trade, the effort is now

If gen. HARRISON will faithfully carry on the government on true whig principles, he will merit and should receive, the approbation of all honest citizens, whatever may have been their party politics in times that are past. He may save millions of dollars that are misapplied under the name of contingencies. The reforming hand should be applied to the army and navy, the Indian department, as well as to the civil list and to the public offices. Those that will not work, neither should they eat.

COMMERCE. A correspondent of the Philadelphia National Gazette has forwarded statement of the number of arrivals at New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, and other ports in the U. States, during the first quarter of the present year.

STATES OF THE UNION.

RATES OF INTEREST. The following are the rates of interest in the states and territories of the union, together with the punishment of usury. It is in all valuable statement, and should be preserved.

Maine, 6 per cent.—forfeit of the debt or claim.
New Hampshire, 6 per cent.—forfeit of three times the amount unlawfully taken.
Vermont, 6 per cent.—recovery in action with costs.
Massachusetts, 6 per cent.—forfeit of three fold the usury.
Rhode Island, 6 per cent.—forfeit of the money and interest on the debt.
Connecticut, 6 per cent.—forfeit of the whole debt.
N. York, 7 per cent.—forfeit of the whole debt.
N. Jersey, 6 per cent.—forfeit of the whole debt.
Pennsylvania, 6 per cent.—forfeit of the whole debt.
Delaware, 6 per cent.—forfeit of the whole debt.
Maryland, 6 per cent.—on tobacco contracts 5 per cent.—usurious contracts void.
Virginia, 6 per cent.—forfeit double the usury taken.
North Carolina, 6 per cent.—forfeits for usury void—usury void by the usury.
South Carolina, 7 per cent.—forfeit of interest and premium taken, with costs to debtor.
Georgia, 8 per cent.—forfeit of three times the usury, and contract void.
Alabama, 8 per cent.—forfeit of interest and usury.
Mississippi, 8 per cent.—by contracts as high as 10—usury recoverable in action of debt.
Louisiana, 5 per cent.—bank interest 6—conventional as high as ten—beyond contract void.
Tennessee, 6 per cent.—usurious contracts void.
Kentucky, 6 per cent.—usury may be recovered with costs.
Ohio, 6 per cent.—usurious contracts void.
Indiana 6 per cent.—on written agreement may go as high as 10—penalty of usury, fine of double the excess.
Illinois, 6 per cent.—three fold amount of the whole interest.
Missouri, 6 per cent.—by agreement, as high as 10—if beyond, forfeit of the whole interest due, and of the usury taken.
Michigan, 7 per cent.—forfeit of the usury taken and one-fourth the debt.
Arkansas, 6 per cent.—by agreement, and rate not higher than 10—amount of usury recoverable, but contracts void.
Florida, 8 per cent.—forfeit of interest and excess in case of usury.

Wisconsin, 7 per cent.—by agreement not over 12—beyond, forfeit the excess.
On the debts and judgments in favor of the U. States, interest is computed at 6 per cent a year.
Thus there is not a single state or territory where an enlightened system prevails upon the subject of interest, for all laws limiting the price of money ought to be repealed. (Louisville Adc.)

NEW YORK.

Legislature proceedings—the McCleod case. The Albany Advertiser furnishes the following abstract of proceedings in the house of assembly on the 17th inst.

Mr. Swackhamer one of the representatives of N. York city, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the governor be requested to communicate to this house what correspondence, if any, has taken place between the executive authority of the United States and this state; or whether any arrangement whatever has been entered into by said departments, in reference to the case of McCleod, now in prison at Lockport on this state.

Mr. Swackhamer briefly explained the objects of the resolution.

Mr. Hoffman in a long speech, justified, under the British government, the attack made upon the Canada, and its consequences. The rebels, said Mr. H., had gained possession of N. York Island—the drafts of men there were made from the United States—the officers in command were over our citizens, and it was to be regretted that the authorities of this state and the United States were not present in sufficient force to prevent the difficulties which followed. By the national law the sovereign whose territory is endangered had a right to repel the danger, and if in so doing (in the language of an eminent person), he built mountains pass the line between the two countries, must be the subject of complaint.

The local authorities of Canada in this case had got out the means to destroy this boat and put an end to the danger which threatened them, and do any one doubt that they thought they were to the exercise of an undoubted right in so doing; and whether in so thinking they judged right or wrong was material now; the object was to repel the danger which threatened them with invasion—the attack was made, and the life of an American citizen lost—for the McCleod steam indicted.

Standing where he did in the face of the whole country, ha (Mr. H.) would ask where the man was in this state who would not have obeyed a similar order of the local authorities. If addition and reason should be seen daily playing round the Canada furnishing those in arms with the means of warfare, and orders should be issued by the authorities of this state to destroy that boat, was there any man who would for a moment refuse to obey that order?

Mr. H. proceeded in great length to comment upon the effect proceeding to extremities would have upon McCleod, but we have not now space to follow him. He concluded his remarks with a motion to amend the resolution by referring it to the judiciary committee of the boat by the bill "to enter a nolle prosequi on the indictment, and to grant McCleod a safe conduct to his own reign."

Mr. O'Sullivan moved in support of Mr. Hoffman's amendment.

Mr. Simmons opposed the amendment in toto, and also the discussion of the subject at the present time in any shape.

Mr. Richmond followed in denial of the positions assumed by Hoffman.
Mr. Fulton spoke in opposition to the amendment, and in favor of the resolution if modified by leaving it to the discretion of the executive to furnish the correspondence. He denied the ground taken by Mr. Hoffman, that the British authorities were prompted to the destruction of the boat by any sympathy expressed by American citizens for their fellow beings in Canada that they wished to punish; they could not, prevent that sympathy—they could not suppress it—it was like a Connecticut beer barrel which would work on a Sunday do what you could.

Mr. L. S. Cliftfield said he should not have thought necessary to have troubled the house, had it not been for the course pursued by Mr. Hoffman. He thought if that gentleman's speech had been delivered in the British parliament, it could have assured for him a reputation but little inferior to that of any country. The arguments of Mr. C. were against the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. L. Hubbell followed in opposition to the amendment.
Mr. S. C. Hawley then took the floor and moved an adjournment, with the view of speaking to the resolution at a future day and at great length.

Mr. Duer hoped the house would not adjourn until it had disposed of the resolution; the debate would go forth to the public on the frontier as well as elsewhere, and produce great excitement.

The house refused to adjourn.

Mr. Hoffman said if no one wished to speak, he had a reply to make to those who had followed him.

Mr. Holly took the floor and was proceeding to debate against the amendment, but gave way to Mr. Keisey, who with the view of Mr. S. C. Hawley and others an opportunity to take a part in the debate at a future day, moved an adjournment, which prevailed, and the house adjourned.

PENNSYLVANIA.

To the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

GENTLEMEN: The bill entitled "an act relating to banks and to provide for the better government thereof," is herewith returned to the senate, in which it originated, without the executive approbation, and with the following reasons why that sanction is withheld.

The bill relates to a subject of deep and universal interest to the people of Pennsylvania; and to its consideration, I have brought all the energies of my mind, and all the light that an experience of upwards of half a century has furnished. I cannot persuade myself, that duty or patriotism could justify my sanction of its provisions. Some things contained in it, I would gladly approve, but I cannot believe that the penalties imposed on the banks, so far as relates to the citizens of this commonwealth, ought to be repealed, or that the issue of notes under the doomination of five dollars by the banks, to an amount of six millions of dollars, for a term of five years, should be authorized.

It would be to go into a discussion of the causes which have led to the present derangement and embarrassment of our monetary affairs. It is enough to know that they exist and that our banking institutions generally, have been unable to meet their engagements. We have had three bank suspensions in less than five years. The result is an almost entire destruction of the confidence of the public in our banking institutions. The intimate connexion existing between our banks, has involved all in one common fate. Those conducted with prudence, are suffering from the misconduct of others. That there have been occasional errors in the mode of conducting our banking operations, must be obvious to all, or those things would not occur so frequently as they have done.

The public will seeking the public good, has required that these errors should be corrected. That correction all must be aware, cannot take place at any time, without cases of individual suffering and hardship. These are to be regretted, but yet ought not to prevent the correction of greater evils to the public at large. The indulgence given to the banks by the resolutions passed on the third day of April, 1840, which suspended existing penalties for not meeting their engagements until the 15th January last, it was hoped would have enabled them fully to resume. When I approved these resolutions, I believed it was necessary to give the banks and the people some time to meet their engagements. That given, however, was greater than I then apprehended to be necessary, or exactly satisfactory to the public. But as we were met, I felt that prudence and duty as well as the public interest, rather than run the risk of having no legislation.

The indulgence thus given, was deemed by a majority of extraordinary forbearance, and the public were expected that at the time appointed, the banks would be fully able to meet their engagements. Such were my own expectations, and the expectations of the public. These expectations unfortunately have proved to be groundless. The banks are now in a state of general suspension, and this bill is designed by the legislature as a remedy for the evil, and a relief to the community. Let us examine how far it seems likely to answer the end proposed.

The principal features of it are, that it repeals absolutely and unconditionally the penalties and forfeitures, to which the banks of this commonwealth are subject, for the non-payment of their liabilities on demand; and requires the banks liable, as natural persons or individuals, to be held to their bills, notes and other liabilities, and also, that after the passage of this bill, for the term of five years receive bills or notes of the denomination of one, two and three dollars, to an amount not exceeding fifty per cent. on the amount of capital actually paid in. It also provides usury regulations, and imposes certain restrictions on the banks. Some of these restrictions and regulations are wise and salutary, but many of them are in my opinion, calculated to produce far more mischief than good.

exertion to which she may put forth her latent energies, and call into more useful activity the elements of her ample resources and growing prosperity." Public sentiment and legislative action, however, would indicate her policy to be to embark in no new enterprise, at least until the works now in progress shall have been completed and the necessities fully tested by experience.

The following statistical view of Kentucky, Ohio and Indiana, derived from official documents of the past year, exhibits some interesting facts in relation to those subjects.

	Kentucky.	Ohio.	Indiana.
No. acres assessed	17,144,899	19,093,575	8,273,130
Value of do.	$187,122,595	363,923,048	58,343,992
Average value per acre	87.45	3.29	7.05
Value of town lots	$24,495,941	20,565,772	12,503,519
Value of personal property	$62,318,889
Value of slaves	$59,412,745	26,949,041	30,908,508
Total value	$272,250,027	112,037,361	117,506,019
Do. per $10,000 value	814	107	140
Am't of state tax	$250,374	562,992	192,787
Tax in cts. per 100	10	30	15
Popular vote for president	91,100	272,937	116,006
Average individual wealth	$2,998	401	795

I may be remarked that, in addition to the state tax of $262,993 dollars assessed in Ohio, there were assessed in 1840, for county purposes, $72,147 dollars—for road, township and poor tax, $29,711 dollars—for corporation, public building and bridge tax, $130,493 dollars, and some other taxes, making the total amount of taxes for the year 1,049,840 dollars; and yet, with this enormous burden of taxation, there is not, perhaps, in the union a more prosperous and flourishing state than Ohio. Indiana has passed a tax law of 40 cents on the 100 dollars, in addition to a poll tax of 75 cents, and the estimated amount of the state tax, for 1841, is $992,526.

From the foregoing comparative statements, it will be perceived that, the assessed value of the real estate of Kentucky, is nearly equal to that of Ohio and Indiana together; that the total value of property of all kinds in Kentucky is more than double that of Ohio, and nearly triple that of Indiana; that our state debt, as compared with our assessed means, is less than one-seventh that of Ohio, and one-fourth that of Indiana; that taxes are lighter, and the individual wealth greater in Kentucky, than in Ohio or Indiana.

I have thus endeavored to show, in a concise manner, the fiscal condition of the state, and her resources—our ability to meet our engagements—our willingness and determination to do so. We have done so heretofore, and so one acquainted with Kentucky, or Kentuckians, will, for a moment doubt that we shall continue to do so hereafter.

Slave law. We learn from the Lexington (Ky.) Observer, that on the 21st ult. Judge Woolley pronounced the law of 1833, which prohibits the introduction of slaves into the commonwealth, unconstitutional. Since this decision, it is stated, several prosecutions, which had recently been instituted, have been abandoned. It is suggested that Judge Woolley, who is said to have displayed "great legal ability and profound constitutional research" on the occasion, will not and publish his opinion; and this it is to be hoped he may do, that the court of appeal may have before them, in a shape which cannot be misunderstood, the grounds of a decision which will create every general surprise, both in and out of Kentucky.

Statistics. J. S. Townsend, esq. of Alton, has prepared from the papers of the United States marshal a tabular statement, exhibiting a view of the population of Illinois from the 1st census of 1800, to June, 1840; and the produce of agriculture, commerce, manufactures, &c. of each county in the state.

The writer says—"The population of the state, as furnished by the deputy marshals, is about three hundred less than the returns of the state census, taken from the first of September. Omitting fractions, and the population of Illinois in 1840, varied but little from 480,000. The popular vote at the presidential election, was 95,040.

He adds, the amount of property, and the number and value of stock, as obtained by the marshal, are at least one-third below the true amount. In multitudes of families no account was given, at least with any correctness. The people, in many instances, misapprehended the marshal's office, and they were to be taxed for every article and refused, and many of the deputy marshals finding it rather unpopular to make so many specific inquiries, preferred to pass over the business, or put down vague and small answers. We should regard it within due bounds to add fifty per cent. to the horses, cattle or sheep, swine, poultry and various kinds of grain, and thirty-three per cent. to all other products as a fair estimate of the property of our young and rising state.

The state census of 1830, gave the population of Illinois a fraction short of 370,000. There has been an increase in five years of more than 210,000. We give the following synopsis of the table:

Population of the state	476,378	do.
No. of slaves and mulattoes	200,741	val. $9,983,345

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The report made by a committee of the stockholders of this institution, inserted in the last REGISTER, has brought out Mr. Bidle, in reply—three letters from whom have been published,—the first of which, explaining the celebrated "action speculation," belongs to the history of the times, and throws considerable light on that transaction. It is inserted in this number, and will be followed by the other two.

In Mr. Bidle's first letter, which we insert in this number, he states that the difficulties which the Bank of the United States now experiences, have been drawn on "by the efforts to break down the banks of New York—a real cause of all the disasters to the Bank of the United States."

That the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania was, in the last instance, compelled to stop specie payments by reason of demands on them from New York and eastward, the public had been informed; and we had heard they had intended to retaliate, by attempting to compel the banks of that city to stop, is a development which Mr. Bidle is the first to announce.

We shall probably find out that it is but an incident in the war between the great money market of Wall street and Chesnut street, in which the first "demonstration"—and, if we are to credit the New York papers, the second—"demonstration" also—failed; but the third was fatal.

Neither Mr. Bidle's other letters make any further explanation on this point. The New York American, of the 20th inst. furnishes us with their version of the affair—as follows:

The attempt to break the N. York banks in August, 1839—now admitted to have been made by the Bank of Pennsylvania, to some of the circumstances of which we adverted yesterday—may be further elucidated by recalling the occurrences of the day.

The Liverpool steamer was to leave this port on Saturday, 24th August, and during the week previous to her departure the famous bills on Hoffinger & Co. were sold by the United States bank of this city.

These bills were pressed on the market with great rapidity, and the rates at which they were sold made it matter of easy calculation to ascertain that loss must result from the operation to the sellers, who were to remit the specie they produced in order to meet the bills. As, moreover, the bank was then a borrower in Europe, inquiry was naturally excited as to what these drafts could mean. The doubt was soon removed by the demands of colic from our banks on Monday 26th, and Tuesday 27th. It is computed that the specie withdrawn by the U. States bank here, on these two days, with the sums demanded in the current month, amounted to about one million two hundred thousand dollars—bringing a balance in its favor created by the sale of the notes and the Hoffinger bills. The circumstances under which the demand of Tuesday was made, that of Monday not having produced the desired effect, turning out as it did, as it seems to us, of the most trifling nature, and being made at a late hour of closing the banks—drafts were sent in from the United States bank here, with a peremptory demand for specie on the spot, and with a note at hand to protest, in case of default, that it was a note.

At the bank of the state of New York, a draft for $850,000 was handed in. The teller said it should be paid as soon as possible. The presenter of the draft replied that it must be paid instantaneously, and explained as he said, that he had no discretion. The cashier being called, he informed of what was going on, said he had a discretion in the matter, and that he should not give back the check, and that it should be paid by 3 o'clock. Orders were explained as he said, in a negotiation, and then the Philadelphia banks,—and especially the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, which forewarn its inability to continue specie payments—could have been preceded, and so far justified, in suspending specie payments.

But the plot failed, and now we have the testimony of Mr. Cowperthwaite, as to how the means selected for its furtherance recoiled upon the heads of the actors. The Hoffinger drafts, which were to ruin the New York banks,—and especially the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, which forewarn its inability to continue specie payments—could have been preceded, and so far justified, in suspending specie payments. Still the bitterness and vindictiveness against New York, which persisted against all odds in honest business men, and which was without limit before the suspension in Philadelphia, the next effort was to stir up the merchants and others here, who felt severely the pressure of the times, to call upon our banks for an extension of discounts,—the certain end, under the circumstances, as the Philadelphia banks had proved, to involve ruin.

Hence the public meeting at the City hotel, on 23d October, which many of our readers doubtless remember, both for its mischievous tendency, and happily for its success. We need not say that it was there that meeting, that endeavored to induce honorable men to take part in it as officers, and urged it on to peremptory calls upon the banks, will now, it is hoped, be exposed; and when this is done, it will be seen that in all the stirring scenes of the United States bank of Pennsylvania, and its officers and agents here, it is to be traced.

It is pertinent to add, that the Bank of the United States here is one of the oldest banking associations; that its whole capital is $200,000, invested in state stock, deposited with the comptroller for the security of its notes; and that the sole partners are Gr. G. Winold, of New York, and Rick'd Shop, of Philadelphia. It was the director of the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania.

Besides Mr. Bidle's letters, the following explanations have been published:

LETTER FROM MR. DUNLAP.

To the committee of stockholders of the Bank of the United States.

GENTLEMEN: Your report to the stockholders of the 4th April inst. contains the following passage, viz: "On the 29th April, 1839, the bank guaranteed a contract entered into by Mr. Thomas Dunlap, in his individual capacity, for the purchase of one million of dollars of Illinois and Michigan land stock."

This statement, without proper explanation, is calculated to produce false impressions. The contract was made by me for the sole use and benefit of the bank. It was entered into with the commissioners of the state of Illinois, on the 29th of April, 1839, at the Bank of the United States, the same day on which the bank guaranteed it, and instantly placed on file with similar documents in the bank, where it has ever since remained. Proper and explicit entries in regard to it were promptly made on the books of the bank where distinct entries also of each of the payments made under it appear. The sterling six per cent. bonds were originally delivered by the authorities of Illinois, not to me, but to the proper officer of the bank, and immediately after their receipt were transmitted by the cashier to the agent of the bank in London, by whom they were subsequently hypothecated, with other securities, for loans to the Bank of the United States, in which position I believe, were soon to have been. They were never in my possession, nor had I any personal interest in them whatever. The payment for them as appears by the contract, was to be made in ten monthly installments, although the whole amount of bonds was delivered to the bank at the interest of six per cent. on these bonds from the beginning, punctually paid to it by the state of Illinois, and the benefit of the funds raised by their deposit in Europe.

As all these facts are of record in the books and papers of the bank, I regret that the committee did not think proper to connect them with the above statement in regard to myself, except that the contract was made in my name. As similar contracts, of record in the bank, were soon to have been made by preceding officers, I had no connexion with or interest in the bonds in question. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS DUNLAP.

Philadelphia, April 8, 1841.

LETTER FROM MR. BINNEY.

The late report by "the committee of investigation appointed at the meeting of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States," contains the following paragraph:

"In addition to these sums, he (Mr. Jaudon) was allowed by the exchange committee an extra commission of one per cent. upon a loan effected in October, 1839, of $800,000 pounds; viz. $7,250 dollars and 66 cents, and upon his claim for a similar commission upon subsequent loans, in France and Holland, to the amount of $,337,141 dollars 90 cts. the board of directors, under the sanction of a legal opinion from counsel of high standing, and the views of the former president, by whom the agreement with Mr. Jaudon was made, that the case of extraordinary loans was not anticipated nor meant to be included in the original agreement, allowed the further charge of $3,970 dollars 37 cents."

It is understood that I am the counsel referred to. Whether the committee read the opinion I gave to Mr. Jaudon, or not it was to Mr. Jaudon that the opinion was given, and not to the bank,—I do not know; but they have been so anxious to know what my opinion was that they have asked me to represent that it sanctioned any particular allowance for the service allowed to. Thus part of the report is not perfectly clear; but the meaning which by some of its readers is attributed to the clause, is inaccurate.

I gave no opinion to Mr. Jaudon, nor to any one, that he was entitled to compensation for the services mentioned, to the amount stated, nor to any particular amount. I was not consulted upon any such question. I was consulted upon what I called my opinion was this and this only,—Whether the service of effecting loans, for the bank, in France and Holland under a power of attorney of 23d August, 1839, was embraced by the agreement in the president's letter of 7th October, 1837, under which he became the agent of the bank in London, so as to be included in the rule of compensation prescribed by that agreement,—and I gave him my opinion. Was it not so; and not being within the agreement, that it stood upon the footing of a retainer which he was free to perform or not at his pleasure, and if performed, for such compensation as might be agreed upon, or as should be just, if there was no express agreement. When in particular it was said to claim for the services, I was asked, and did not say. My opinion was founded upon two writings referred to, and not upon the commisnicalion of views subsequently expressed by any one else.

It must not be understood to imply that Mr. Jaudon was not entitled to all that he received for the critical service of negotiating the continental loans. There is perhaps a known rule of compensation for such services in Europe. But mean to say, that I did not give him or any one an opinion upon any point in his case, but that which I have stated, and that no other point was submitted to me.

HORACE BINNEY.

Philadelphia, April 10, 1841.

LETTER FROM MR. BIDDLE.

Annapolis, Bucks county, April 9, 4841.

Hon. John M. Clayton, Dover, Delaware:

MY DEAR SIR: You are aware that it is now two years since the state of my health compelled me to leave the service of the bank. From that moment I have been wholly occupied with other matters, and have had not the slightest direction of its affairs, as both my inclination and my duty concurred in the propriety of leaving to those who had the responsibility the entire control of its management. This total abstinence of mine does not seem to be understood or appreciated, for, since the misfortunes of the bank, I find myself reproached for things of which I know nothing, and denounced as the cause of all the troubles which have befallen not only the Bank of the United States but every man in the whole country. Being very indifferent to popular clamor, and never suffering myself to be influenced by it to do what I disapprove, I have contradicted nothing and have been mistaken, because I could do neither without injury to the interests of the bank; but its present prostration relieves me from that fastidiousness, for its pecuniary affairs will scarcely suffer from any explanation of mine. Accordingly I now feel at liberty to say and to prove to you that when I left the institution, two years ago, it was in a safe and prosperous situation, and that whatever misfortunes have since come upon it, my administration can in no wise be charged with them.

I was in London from 1835 to 1836, I was president of the Bank of the United States. The great object of my labors was to secure to the whole country the blessings of a sound and uniform currency, and to that end that the subject of the historical, I think I may venture to say that the currency and the exchanges of the United States attained a degree of perfection scarcely known elsewhere. It was of that system the committee of ways and means in the report of the president of the Bank of the United States, in 1830, "It may be confidently asserted that no country in the world has a circulating medium of greater uniformity than the United States." And again, "It gives to the national currency that perfect uniformity, that ideal perfection to which a currency of gold and silver in no extensive country could have no pretensions."

It was of that system that the committee on finance of the senate of the United States said

"That the United States are in the enjoyment of a uniform national currency not only sound and uniform in itself, and perfectly adapted to all the purposes of the government and the community, but more sound and uniform than that possessed by any other country. It is not easy to imagine, it is not necessary to desire, any currency better than this."

The bank closed its affairs in 1836, when a board of valuation of the stock was formed, composed of a committee of the late Bank of the United States, consisting of Caleb Cope, Robert Ralston, Jr. and John Bollen, and a committee of the present Bank of the United States, consisting of Ambrose White, Matthew Newkirk and Richard Price; who called to their aid three disinterested citizens, John Moss, Benj. W. Richards and Robert Tuland.

This committee, in its negotiation with the commissioners of the government, began by offering for every share of $100 the sum of $111 47. The commissioners declared that "they estimated the stock to be worth $115 50 per share, cash valuation," adding "that this was considerably below their former estimates, and positively the lowest point at which they would fix the valuation." Finally, the bank agreed to pay $115 50 per share. This was done by a board of directors, consisting of

Joshua Lippincott, Caleb Cope,
Manuel Lytle, John Bollen,
John T. Neff, Thomas Dunlap,
William Platt, J. J. Vanderkemp,
Ambrose White, May Humphreys,
Matthew Newkirk, Cleyney Hickman,
Richard Price,

Thus far, at least, every thing was safe and prosperous.

The bank then became merely a state institution, and although it had to encounter the hostility of the dominant party of the United States, and the violence of local and rival opposition, still it was able to maintain itself against all these obstacles, its unimpaird resources and credit. This will be obvious by examining the statement of its affairs, prepared about the time I left the bank, as it is reported by this committee.

Deferring any array of figures which would be intelligible, that statement shows clearly the results:

Its whole liabilities were, on the 1st April, 1839	$11,571,412
For circulation	4,473,500
By agencies	19,276
All other debts	$35,421

Its means were—
Stocks, and due by the state	$9,854,064
Real estate and mortgages	1,719,426
State bank notes and debts	$,748,094
M. King and the U. States	45,412
Specie	3,069,580
Resulting balances—any due by agencies	3,617,315

being more than two dollars for one of its liabilities. Comparing this with the last statement of the Bank of England which I have seen, that of the 1st of January, 1841, it is to the advantage of the Bank of the United States.

Thus, the Bank of England had—
Circulation	16,240,000
Deposites	7,365,000
Securities	22,595
Bullion	3,816

23,595,000	26,411
While the Bank of the United States, throwing to make the comparison accurate, the debt on side, and an equal amount of securities on the side would present these points:

Circulation	11,571,124	Securities	52,395
Deposites	4,473,505	Bullion	3,069
	16,044,719		55,464

If the extraordinary revolution of the last two years has caused a depreciation in the state stocks, it is a misfortune, not a fault. They were, at the time of my retirement, worth at least what had been paid for them.

Take, for instance, the rates of American stock at London in January and February, 1839, as it was known here in March.

Pennsylvania 5's	93	Illinois 6's
Mississippi 5's	103	Kentucky 6's
Ohio 6's	99	Louisiana 5's

Add to these prices an exchange of eight or ten per cent. and these stocks were all above par.

In March, 1839, moreover, there was nothing about the repose of the moneyed world. The actual case of moneyed affairs was apparent. England the bank actually reduced the rate of discount to three per cent. and the following quotations from the London Mercantile Journal, which happens to be at hand, will show how uniform was the rate of discount.

January 11.—Discount on banker's bills 3 per cent.

February 19.—Discount on the first paper 10 per cent. 3 per cent.

In the 22d of March, 1839—"Money on bankers' bills has been available at the same terms as last week. First merchants' paper has 1 3/4 to 4 1/2 per cent. discount."

April 2.—"Bankers' bills have been current at 2 per cent. discount."

April 9.—"Money has been rather plentiful; otherwise, and discounts continue at from 3 1/2 per cent."

May 7.—"Money has been more plentiful. discounts continue at 3 1/2 to 4 per cent. on bank bills."

In this country stocks were high, and, what more important, the internal exchanges were and uniform, and the foreign exchanges did not suffer any exportation of specie. Take, for instance the rates of these securities then most sought for and since so much depreciated.

Thus, in March, 1839, in March, 1
Bank of the U. States	116
Pennsylvania	72
Bank of Philadelphia	706
Parkers' bank of Natchez	102
Vicksburg	69
Schuykill navigation 6's	125
Lehigh canal	50
	19

The domestic exchanges were all perfectly safe and very reasonable. That with New Orleans at from par to 1 per cent. premium; that Natchez at par to 1 discount; and the highest rate change for drafts at sight from the most distant part of the country did not exceed four per cent.

Finally, the bank had just closed its struggles with the general and state governments. It had arranged its debt to the United States arising out of its partnership in the bank, and congress had adjourned.

The legislature of Pennsylvania too had finished its efforts to repeal the charter by a report which assured its tranquillity against future attacks, and that legislature had adjourned.

Thus, for the first time during many years, I found a moment when I could seek the retirement I desired, and accordingly resigned.

Collect, now, all these elements of prosperity.—Here was the bank—

With 74 millions to pay 35.

With the highest character and credit.

Dividing nine per cent. yet laying up something every year.

Its stock selling at 116.

The foreign exchanges easy.

The domestic exchanges low and uniform.

All its controversies with the general and state governments settled.

With peace at home and abroad.

And one can see nothing to create a doubt of its stability. So that not so long after the directors of the bank, who, by numerous committees and in successive boards, unanimously united in repeated and strong assurances that the bank was then in a condition of undoubted strength and prosperity.

On the 1st of January, 1839, the board of directors consisted of the following gentlemen:

Joshua Lippincott, Caleb Cope,
John R. Neff, Cheyney Hickman,
John A. Brown, Joseph R. Ingersoll,
Wm. Platt, Lewis Wain,
Lawrence Lewis, John Connell,
John J. Vanderkemp, Joseph Cabot,
John Bohlen.

Of these gentlemen a dividend committee was appointed on the 4th of January, 1839, consisting of Joshua Lippincott, J. J. Vanderkemp, Lawrence Lewis, Joseph Cabot and John Connell.

This committee made a report to the meeting of the board, at which were present Messrs. Lippincott, Vanderkemp, Cope, Brown, Wain, Lewis, Bohlen, Hickman, Cabot and Connell, who unanimously adopted it. Now this report stated that there was "an aggregate of net profits amounting to $1,344,707 99," that declaring a dividend of four per cent. would leave a surplus of $1,344,707 99." "From these several statements," they proceed, "it will appear that the estimated probable loss on real estate and suspended debt is $76,000 51 less than the estimate of July last, and that the contingent fund is $2,681 75 more than the estimate of probable loss." They conclude by saying that the net profits of the last six months were $1,528,020 19, which, after deducting the dividend of four per cent. $1,400,000, "would leave $1,268,020 19 as the surplus profits of the last six months."

Up, then, to the 7th of January, 1839, there was no doubt in the minds of the directors of the perfect safety and prosperity of the bank, since they had a surplus profit on the last six months' business of $1,268,020 19, a total surplus of $1,344,707 99, a decreasing loss on suspended debt, and an excess of nearly $1,000,000 of the contingent fund above the losses it was desired to repair.

On the 7th of January, 1839, came in the new board of directors for that year. It consisted of Manuel Eyre, Joseph Cabot,
John A. Brown, Cheyney Hickman,
Richard Alsop, Lewis Wain,
Caleb Cope, Ambrose White,
J. J. Vanderkemp, J. R. Ingersoll,
Richard Price, Matthew Newkirk.

Now what did these gentlemen declare of the situation of the bank?

On March, 1839, on the day of my retirement, the board unanimously adopted several resolutions—in one of which they describe me among other things as one "who, having performed so much and so faithfully, leaves the institution with which he is identified prominent in all its relations—among its abilities to promote the interests of the communities by which it is surrounded—cordial in its associations with sister establishments, and secure in the respect and esteem of all who are connected with it in foreign or domestic intercourse."

In transmitting to me these resolutions, the committee, consisting of Messrs. Ambrose White, Caleb Cope and J. R. Ingersoll, say: "In every emergency you have given it efficient support, and now to your official connection has ceased, you have the rich consolation of knowing that you leave it entirely prosperous."

Now was this all.

In July, 1839, four months after I left the bank, the dividend committee consisted of Ambrose

White, Matthew Newkirk, Richard Alsop, J. J. Vanderkemp, Richard Price. They reported that the bank had "an aggregate of surplus profits amounting to $1,421,289 32," and they therefore declared a dividend of four per cent. This report was adopted unanimously by the following members then present:

Manuel Eyre, Joseph Cabot,
Richard Alsop, Lewis Wain,
John Bohlen, Ambrose White,
J. J. Vanderkemp, Richard Price,
Cheyney Hickman, Matthew Newkirk.

That these gentlemen should make a dividend of four per cent. unless they believed the situation of the bank justified it, cannot be presumed.

Further than this. In December, 1839, nine months after my retirement, the board submitted to the creditors of the bank the following official statement, published in London:

"A special committee, consisting of five members of the Bank of the United States, (Messrs. Richard Alsop, Lewis Wain, Richard Price, John Connell, and J. J. Vanderkemp), was appointed, on the 12th of November, to examine into the situation of the bank. On the 15th of November (the day before the sailing of the Great Western) they made a report, in which they stated that they allowed them precluded an investigation of all the items of the account, and that they therefore directed their attention to the least perplexing items. The other items, however, had been investigated by the committee on the state of the bank, (on which were Messrs. Richard Alsop, Ambrose White, Matthew Newkirk, and C. Hickman). The following is given as the result."

The details are then mentioned, and the statement concludes thus:

"Probably surplus beyond the capital of $5,000,000 dollars, $1,071,004 24. It should be recollected that the bonus of $2,500,000 paid in cash for the charter has already been charged to the surplus fund, and that, this had been distributed in annual payments over the whole period of the charter, as was done by the late Bank of the United States, this fund would stand $2,000,000 higher than it now does."

Still more. On the 1st of January, 1840, ten months after my resignation, another dividend committee, consisting of Caleb Cope, Joseph Cabot, John Bohlen, Richard Price and Matthew Newkirk, made a report, concluding thus:

"From the foregoing statements, exhibiting a surplus of $5,727,923 71, the committee are of opinion that a dividend could now be declared by the bank; and strong inducements to suggest that course would press themselves on the committee, if they considered only their wishes in meeting very natural expectations of the stockholders of the institution, who have looked with great confidence to a regular distribution of the profits at the accustomed period. But, upon mature consideration of the subject, they are induced to believe that the permanent interests of the institution and ultimate benefit of the stockholders themselves will be promoted by withholding a dividend for the present. The actual condition of the banks of this state, and respect for the legislature now on the eve of assembling furnish additional motives for this course."

This report was unanimously adopted by the board, consisting still of

Manuel Eyre, J. J. Vanderkemp,
Richard Alsop, Cheyney Hickman,
Lewis Wain, Richard Price,
John A. Brown, Matthew Newkirk,
John Bohlen, T. Duolap.

Now what shall we infer from all this? Here are successive boards of directors—dividend committees—special committees, over and over again, declaring the existence of large surpluses and making dividends, and assenting to the soundness and propriety of the bank.

On the 1st of January, 1839, declaring a dividend of four per cent. and announcing a surplus of more than four millions.

On the 29th of March, 1839, asserting that the bank was prosperous in all its relations.

On the 1st of July, 1839, declaring a dividend of four per cent. with a surplus of more than four millions.

On the 15th of November, 1839, after a detailed examination by two committees, asserting still a surplus of three millions.

On the 1st of January, 1840, exhibiting a surplus of more than five millions, and abstaining from making the dividend which they might do, merely from prudential considerations, in respect to the legislature.

After this exhibition, can any one deny what I propose to prove, that when I left this bank, in March, 1839, it was in a safe and prosperous condition?

It remains to show by what causes the whole of that scene changed into the present total prostration of the bank. Some of them are unapparently obvious.

I have just stated that the winter of 1838-9 was a season of great abundance and ease in moneyed concerns both in England and in this country; but England was soon after startled by the discovery that the grain crop had deficient over the demand arose for specie to export for grain combined with some continental loans, that changed the whole surface of affairs. The Bank of England itself, after borrowing ten millions of dollars from the Bank of France, was still in much drained for coin that it was forced into very severe restrictive measures, which raised the interest of money to twice or three times its usual rate. The most injurious effect was on the stocks of this country, which were no longer convertible in England, except at great sacrifices. These causes immediately reacted on this country, producing the usual effects of embarrassment in the community and alarm among the banks. These troubles, such as they were, like any which have been so many times experienced by the bank, might perhaps have been again surmounted by an exertion of the means and the credit of the bank, but for circumstance which is thus described in a letter from the late cashier of the bank, to whom I applied for information as to the causes which had brought on these misfortunes. His answer is as follows:

March 23, 1841.

MY DEAR SIR: The queries you were propounded to me have occupied no small share of my thoughts. The utter prostration of the Bank of the United States passes, I confess, my comprehension. I may, however, point out some of the causes that, in my judgment, have mainly contributed to bring about its present painful and humiliating condition. The consequences of the premature resumption of cash payments after the first suspension by the banks, and the efforts of the Bank of the United States to maintain its resumption, which, I fear, required in the administration of its affairs the utmost wisdom and experience in finance; and in alluding to a measure adopted by those gentlemen most prominent in its management after your retirement, to make it necessary to impose penalties or detractions from their salaries, the morbid excitement consequent on this too speedy effort to return to cash payments had in a good degree subsided, another crisis was anticipated, and it was foreseen that the bank would be obliged again to suspend. This was, unhappily, too soon to be realized, for the storm was then ready to burst, but, instead of meeting its full force at once, it was deemed best to make it fall first upon the banks of New York, and then, for its purpose, large means were necessary, and to procure these, resort was had to the sale of foreign exchange. The state of the accounts of the bank with its agents abroad did not warrant any large drafts upon them, especially that of Alexander Hottelinger in Paris. This difficulty, however, it was thought, might be avoided by shipping the coin to be drawn from the New York banks immediately to meet the bills. Accordingly, large drafts were made, and applications were made, which were then in great demand, were sent to New York to be sold without limit. Indeed, the bills were signed in bank, and so sent to New York; and although a large book was thus forwarded, it was soon exhausted, and applications were made to the agent of the Paris house in New York for a further supply, who drew a considerable amount besides. The proceeds of these immense sales of exchange created very heavy balances against the New York banks, which, after all, signally failed in reducing the contemplated effect. The bills not being provided for, nor even regularly advised, as had uniformly been the custom of the bank, were dishonored; and although the agent in New York was doing every thing which his judgment could accomplish, the credit of the bank was gone, and from that day to the present its efforts upon the institution have been more and more disastrous. Other causes might be advanced for the calamity which has befallen the bank—the over estimates of the value of the charter—and various matters, all, however, attributable to the particular unhappy measure that I have thus hastily brought to your notice, which Mr. Johnson and myself equally disapproved at the time. The cause of the disasters which have afflicted the bank. Very respectfully, J. COWPERTHWAIT.

N. Biddle, ex-Philadelphia.

Here, then, is revealed the real and secret cause of the disasters of the bank. Now, without meaning to say a single word about the object of these drafts, and without intending the slightest censure of any one, it is impossible not to see in this single circumstance the solution of many of the difficulties of the bank. The bank, as I understand, suddenly draws an immense amount of bills on Messrs. Hottinguer & Co. without having a dollar of funds in their hands—without having any authority to draw for a dollar—without a line of explanation as to the nature and extent of these unexpected drafts—and without even the usual commercial notice that such bills had been drawn. Messrs. Hottinguer & Co. could not, as private men, dare to protect their bills; and thus the bank, in the very vitriol of its high credit, was suddenly disgraced in the eyes of all Europe.

The talents of Mr. Jandon repaired to a certain extent this disaster, but it obliged him, in order to protect the drafts drawn on himself as well as Messrs. Hottinguer & Co. to make loans and to pledge stock, which were thus, instead of being sold, locked up to await the depreciation which has since overtaken them. And now, let me ask, in all fairness, whether this secret wound—this neglect, or inadvertence, or omission, call it by whatever name you choose—to appraise Messrs. Hottinguer & Co. of these drafts, a thing which belonged to the interior details of the bank, can be charged upon my administration, which had ceased long before that time. Yet these two officers, as we are in the above letter, regard that as the immediate cause of the disasters which have afflicted the bank."

Even after this shock, such was the vitality of the bank, that I have no doubt it might have recovered and prospered but for the late fall resumption of specie payments.

It is undoubtedly true that the only lawful and proper banking is the payment of specie. But where, by any cause, a suspension once takes place, the resumption is a question, the answer depending on many circumstances—on the position of the bank itself—the position of its neighbors—the position of other banks in other sections of the country, just as health is the natural condition of the body, but if by accident, or disease, or depending on many circumstances, it is not so, we must decide when we may venture out without the danger of relapsing. The Bank of England continued its suspensions for twenty-five years, and, if it had been forced into a premature resumption, it would have certainly failed. It is evident, therefore, neither the banks nor the communities with whom Philadelphia principally deals, were ready for resumption, and in my judgment the project and the execution of it were unwise.
